But there was one in that listening crowd who wished not to hear such words. Corbulo saw the corruption which was then destroying the spirit of patrician and plebeian. Still the General cared not to think that Rome might ever find a grave.

As the orator enlarged upon this theme, Corbulo turned and walked away.

He had not gone far when, just as he entered the shadow of a huge statue, a woman grasped his arm. It was on the Appian Way. The night was now dark; he could scarcely see her face. Only a few moments elapsed, however, when a flash of lightning—for the storm to which reference had been made in the Forum, was approaching rapidly—revealed to the Roman the hard features of the Egyptian to whom Paul had referred in his letter.

Long and sullen hatred had given the woman a scowl which one could easily have seen was not hers by nature. The last known living descendant of the Pharaohs—a fact which had caused her exilement from her native land—she once had been, if not beautiful, at least a pretty, and certainly an attractive child, worthy of her royal ancestors. Now she was one of those hags from whom children instinctively shrink.

"Ha, ha!" she cried, in a bitter laugh, "the Egyptian at last has found the Roman! Corbulo, if yon river were the Nile and not the Tiber, before another lightning flash, thy flesh would be as lifeless as this marble," and the woman raised her bared and bony arm, and with a rusted dagger pointed toward the statue standing cold and spectral-like in the rain. "Though I dare not kill thee—else I would. Yet, torn by thee from friends and home, an exile in this hated city, here I stand and hate and curse thee, curse thee with a woman's, ay, with a hag's curse! Upon thy perjured head shall be wreaked the wrath of fallen monarchs, and beyond the tomb, in caverns of eternal darkness, thou shalt writhe forever in the awful agonies of a deathless dying, for fiends shall hound thy spirit—and to crush thy fated soul with the fiercest tortures of revenge, the very heavens shall join with hades!"

"Egyptian," calmly interrupted Corbulo, "thy curse I scorn. But thy life—I take."

A dagger gleamed a moment in the lightning.

Then a shriek was heard—the steel had pierced the woman's heart. And she, in whose royal veins coursed the proud blood of Egypt's Pharaohs, lay dead on the stones of Rome.

Corea and the Gospel.

The Present Rebellion may Imperil the Missionaries—The Ruling Sovereign.

FOR several months past the mails have brought rumors of an extensive rising in Corea against the government, but without entering into details. Cable despatches have thrown little light on the course of events, beyond recording the fact that considerable fighting had occurred, and that the government troops had sustained reverses. It is known that the Christian missionaries are involved and that a number of native converts have been killed during the hostilities. China and Japan are both exercised over the condition of affairs in Corea and have sent troops to that country. Japan wishing to profit by the trouble to force China out of the peninsula. The latter power, claiming Corea as a suzerain nation, is equally resolved to prevent Japan from acquiring ascendancy in the peninsula, and war is probable between these two on this account.

Whatever peril may have threatened the American missionaries, is believed that they are now amply protected by the arrival of American warships at Chemulpo, which is the port of Seoul, the Korean capital, from which it is sixty-five miles distant. Seoul, sometime ago, was reported by the cable as in the hands of an insurgent mob, with the king a fugitive. Shortly after this, the arrival of foreign warships, American included, aided in restoring tranquility and the monarch returned to his capital. The latest intelligence is to the effect that a large Japanese army has landed in Corea. Should any considerable Chinese force attempt to land there, the peninsula may soon become the scene of a sanguinary war between the two rival invading nations.

The king of Corea whose portrait is given on this page, together with an illustration of the royal arms of the nation, is an absolute ruler, practically a despot. He appoints governors over the eight provinces of the kingdom. The present dynasty has been in power about five hundred years and there is a popular legend that at the end of that time it would fall, the insurrection has been greatly encouraged and strengthened by that superstitious belief. Corea is a country of great antiquity, having a history dating back 3,000 years. There is no state religion, although the people have a system of morality based on Confucianism. For 2,000 years Buddhism was excluded from the country. Considerable progress has been made by the Christian missionaries, and day schools have been established in several places, but the advance of the Gospel has been hindered greatly by the bitterness of native prejudice.

OPPOSITION IN CHINA.

From a report of his work in China by W. J. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission, we take the following incidents, which illustrate the difficulties experienced by missionaries in that land: Two of the leading literati of Ts'in-chau a long time ago vowed that they would keep foreigners out of the city. Last year we bought land and a very old shop, and had soon pulled the old premises down and begun to erect a preaching hall and dispensary, than these two men began to worry. They said we were damaging their walls;

we were encroaching on their property; they would not allow our rain-water to run into their grounds at the back, etc. In fact, they came on to our ground and stopped our workmen, saying that they could not allow the building to proceed. I at once saw the Mayor, who is friendly toward us, and he came to the premises and listened to the objections himself. He pooh-poohed them all; and invited Su and Ren, the obstructors, to an afternoon tea in a cool retreat on the south side of the city, where they accepted his advice to molest us no more.

Both these college graduates live in Fuliang Hien District, forty miles to the north-west of us. One, Mr. Li, heard the Gospel first from Mr. Ren, our member there. Then he came to live a short time with us, to learn more about us and the doctrine we preach. He desired to be baptized at once, but we deferred him for a bit, to see if he would stand persecution. The other B. A. is at present in the Examination College of Ts'in-chau. I first met him four years ago in an inn, forty miles from Lanchau; we were both detained by rain, and while resting, I told him the Gospel. He

MISS NASSAU AT BATANGA.

In a letter received last week at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Miss Isabella A. Nassau, whose portrait and a description of her work at Batanga on the West Coast of Africa appeared recently in this journal, that devoted lady says:

"Thanks for your inquiries about the state of our work at the Batanga coast station. We consider we have but one station at the sea-side, but earnestly desire to have two in the interior in the Bule country; one is already established.

"The work of the American Presbyterian Church at Batanga is not a recent thing. It is more than twenty-four years since itinerations were made to it, from our stations on Corisco Island and at Benita. Within the last few years the German government has laid its claim on this part of the coast and one would assume from the style of their declaration in permitting the American Presbyterian Church to enter their territory and establish Christian work, that our mission had but just arrived. They are, however, sufficiently courteous to us, as our influence on the natives is entirely helpful to them.

"Our native congregation is just now making efforts to raise funds for the erection of a new church building. It is to be of foreign material and to cost $700—one-half of which they will pay. The present church is built of bamboo. A roof of native thatch, but both materials are quite perishable and the people have learned there are better ways of living and doing than those of their fathers. My day school is taught in the present church building. It is now little more than a year since, without a precedent of such fervor of work, I commenced teaching, first from town to town, finally when I found that pupils would come, without the inducement of food given them, I organized the school to meet daily in the church building. We have now more than two hundred names on the record roll. But as there are so many things to hinder these girls, the usual attendance is fifty or sixty. This does not discourage me, however, because the actual number who have attended sewing school a single week, may be more than a hundred, though they have not all come every day.

"It is also a matter of encouragement, that every one of these pupils, has paid for her books and slate, either by working at the Mission station or bringing native food of some kind. All of them have to commence with the alphabet, which, I think you are aware, is just the Roman letters, with this improvement on an English primer, that marks are placed over certain letters, to show the sound and there is but one sound for each different letter; i.e., every sign has always the same sound. The pupils memorize well and repeat in concert Psalms and parts of the Scripture, also hymns. My only helper in this large school is a native young woman. I am in much need of more efficient aid and hope soon to have a well educated young man as assistant. As questions asked by children indicate not only their degree of knowledge, but also their mental training, I will mention some of the questions asked me:

"Ma, was the Apostle Paul a Roman; because he speaks, as if he were?"

"Ma, when Jesus rose from the grave, did he appear to his disciples in the same body in which he had hung on the Cross?"

"Many of my pupils are in the inquiry class, and often when they enter school, after saluting me, they pass to their seats and bow their heads a moment in prayer, as is the custom in church services.

"There are so many pleasant things to tell of, but I have filled my pages.

Respectfully yours,

ISABELLA A. NASSAU."

GOSPEL WORK IN ITALY.

Since Rev. Edward Clarke began his school work among the children of Italy, great good has been accomplished. A clergyman who has been helping in the school wrote that the progress of late has been almost remarkable. To-day, as they looked from Turin and the East of Venice and the Alps, they would see some thirty stations where, Sabbath after Sabbath, God's Word is preached, and where services are also held on the week day. They would see eight Sunday Schools also and nineteen day schools at work during the week. If they looked at these schools they could see them attended by some seven hundred children coming from Roman Catholic homes every day, a fact which certainly would not be without its important influence in the future. God has been graciously multiplying workers and sending them on from village to village. Some years ago there had been a terrible visitation of cholera; it was sad and sudden, and yet good had come of it. Roman Catholic priests went everywhere visiting, and the workers of the Mission did the same. Finally it led to the work being handed over to the Mission who had offered to take care of the children. The offer was made on the understanding that the children should be made clearly understand that the Gospel taught them to come straight to the

BRIGANDS SEIZE A COLPORTEUR.

CN Albanian Christian, M. Kyrias, formerly a colporteur in the employ of the British and Foreign Bible Society, was seized by Greek brigands in the district of Ochrida, hurried to the recesses of the mountains, and there held for ransom till the sum of seven hundred lira was raised by his friends. The Greek government was either unable or unwilling to furnish the amount of ransom or to secure the release of the prisoner. Mr. Kyrias' captivity lasted throughout six months, during which time he was treated with every cruelty and indignity by the ignorant and superstitious Albanian boors who had charge of him. Constantly dragged from place to place for fear of discovery, M. Kyrias was over-wrought and underfed, abused and beaten until life became a burden.

For forty days he was blindfolded, lest he might afterwards betray the hiding-places of his captors. With the same object, his ears were stopped with wax. So terrible were his sufferings during these winter months that his health and strength were permanently broken down. The record is a startling revelation of a condition of things which might have been thought impossible in Europe. M. Kyrias died a few months since.

THE LOVELY GRAVE.

In describing the progress in heathen lands since the missionary went there Rev. J. J. Fuller says: "I remember going into the Cameroons just after landing in Africa, and after I had opened my window in the morning, looking across the river, I saw many canoes with people dressed up in all their war dresses, and their spears and swords were brandished in the sun. They had their war caps upon their heads. I took my glass and looked, and I found that the decoration on the bows of all those canoes was nothing else but human heads. I went up to the chief and said to him, 'What do you do this for?' He looked at me very much astonished that I should ask him such a question. He said, 'What?' Pointing across the river, I said, 'Why do you do such cruel things. It is not right.' He said, 'You people come into this country, and you live here, and you say that you are good people—and that is true enough—but do you tell me that, when I die, my sons are to put me into an empty grave alone, and nobody with me?' When I told him, 'Yes,' he looked at me and said, 'You are a fool.' Then all his sons came up directly and said, 'What is the matter, father?' And he told them. He said, 'This man, who has come to live in this country, says that when I die you boys will put me into an empty grave, alone, with no one with me.' And they looked at me and grinned their savage grin; and then turned away and said, 'Father, do not believe him. He is a fool and he is a foreigner. What does he know? Let him alone.' That same chief lived on until the old custom of burying people with the dead was completely abolished. In his town, about fifty yards from his own house, stood a little chapel; and the preacher in that chapel was none other than one of his sons, who was preaching the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ."

A FUNERAL IN A ZULU KRAAL.

Mr. Wilcox, of Mapumulo, writing to the American Board, reports an incident connected with a kraal which he visited when he first went to Mapumulo, twelve years since, at which time he had a very cold reception. The people did not want the Gospel, and Mr. Wilcox was quite hopeless about them. But when he returned to Mapumulo some four years since he found that a school had been carried on for some time at that kraal, and one young man was already a member of the church. Mr. Wilcox writes: "Soon after another young man from the same kraal joined, and there are other candidates. Moreover the head of the kraal sent for me to come and see him in regard to his making a profession of religion. I saw him, and though I was not satisfied with his views as to polygamy and the selling of daughters for wives, yet I felt that his was far from a hopeless case. To-day his sons came to announce that he had died, and to get a coffin for him. The coffin was obtained, and I went over to perform the funeral service. One of the young men offered an earnest prayer at the funeral, not for the dead, but for the old chief forbade when he was dying, but for all the inmates of the kraal, as he exhorted them to do.

The young man told me that his father died trusting in the Saviour. He acknowledged that he had been a great sinner, but believed that Christ had forgiven him, and he urged all, especially the young men, to repent and believe in Christ.

A TYPICAL CHURCH IN INDIA.

In a letter from a missionary at Dehra, India, published in The Presbyterian, the following interesting description of a new house of worship occurs. It was a house of worship for the homeless church in Dehra to which the late Dr. Morrison had ministered. Contributions were received from America, from England, from China, from Syria and from other lands. The Morrison Memorial church, with its corrugated zinc roof, its walls plastered and whitewashed outside and inside, its two-storied windows of not large panes of ordinary window glass, with its punkas with a coolie to pull them, with its hanging lamps with white shades and the church bearer (as sexton) with his pugree on his head and his shoes off his feet to go up the aisle to light them, with the seats each made of three narrow walnut boards fixed into two moulded, open-work iron ends (one board to sit upon, one to lean the middle of your back against, the third protruding behind at an obtuse angle to the top of the second, forming a book-rest for the pew behind); its Turkey red calico cushions stuffed with cotton; its pulpit, wonderful to behold, that might have been the work of your little brother's scroll saw; its "puckka" (concrete floor covered with grayish white cotton drill for carpet, set down before some of your city churches would attract a crowd.

THE INDIAN'S REPROACH.

In a communication to the "American Missionary," Miss M. C. Collins of Fort Yates, N. D., gives a pathetic explanation of an Indian's reasons for refusing to become a Christian. The old man's name is Thunderhawk and he is the husband of three wives. In his talk with Miss Collins, he frankly admitted that he was wrong, but declared that he could not now put himself right. He said: "I want my people to learn to pray. I ask one thing; that is that you will not make me join the Church. I will attend the meetings, and will have all my people attend meeting, but I am an old man and have three wives and I cannot put either one away. My first wife I took when she was fifteen and I eighteen. We are nearly sixty now. I love her and she loved me—our hearts and minds are one. She never made my heart sad once in all these years, and I never spoke a harsh word to her. It would be like taking my own heart out to send her off. The other one was my brother's wife, and when he died he gave her to me. She is old and helpless and blind, and I feel that it would be unmanly to cast her off. There would be no one to take care of her. The last one has a high temper, always is disagreeable, hard to please and causes me a great deal of trouble. I do not love her, but her husband was as fine a man as I ever knew. He was my friend. He was killed. He loved his wife, and his dying request was that I should take her and care for her. Because he loved her I have been kind to her, and I gave him my word, and so I do not want to break it. Now this is something that I do not like to talk about, but I want to pray to God and to learn the Bible, and I want my children brought up in the light. Perhaps God will be merciful to me. I knew no better when I took these wives, and now I cannot sacrifice them for my own sake. Will you send us a Christian Bible teacher? I am an old man and shall not ask much more of the people; but I am not ignorant from choice, but because no man has taught me God's laws. I grew up without the Bible. Although many people had the light, they left us in the dark, and I pray you to help us to learn to pray."

A COOK AS A PREACHER.

In making his annual report to the Baptist Missionary Society of his work at Baptala among the Telugus, Rev. W. C. Owen writes: The blessing of God has been specially poured over member of our mission who had served as cook under Mr. Bullard and had acted in the same capacity with us

Do You Have Asthma?

If you do, you will be glad to learn that the Kola plant, found on the coast of West Africa, is reported a positive cure for the disease. The Kola Importing Co., 1074 Broadway, New York, have such faith in this new discovery, that they are sending out free by mail, large quantities of Kola Compound to all sufferers from Asthma, who send their name and address on a postal card, and write to them until last May. About sixteen years ago he was one of Mrs. Clough's school boys and received, in the estimation of our Christian people, a good education. Before giving up his cooking work he would ask permission to go and preach in the neighboring villages during leisure hours. In less than two months ten villages were interested in Christianity, and a few professed faith in Christ and were baptized. After this it was not to be doubted that this man was called of God to preach, not so much because of what he could do, but because of what he could not do—he could not keep from preaching, and we could not conscientiously hold him a moment longer in the kitchen. We have lost an excellent cook, but the Lord has gained an excellent preacher.

A HINDOO WOMAN'S FAITH.

A poor woman, the wife of an Indian "bearer," or servant, lay dying. In the days of her health she had been taught much about Jesus and his love, and now she longed to be "sprinkled with the waters of faith" (her own expression) before she passed away. The Zenana lady hesitated to recommend her for baptism, lest it should have a merely superstitious meaning for her; but on removing her to the mission house for nursing it was found that, poor and ignorant though she was, she had a true and living faith in Christ as the only Saviour. Earnestly and lovingly did she plead with her father and mother to accept Christ. "Do take him as I did. He has cleansed my heart, and he will cleanse yours." For a time she seemed to rally, and then quite suddenly the end came. Her mother and father were sitting by her; she raised herself in the bed and said: "There is Jesus—come for me!" immediately afterwards falling back and yielding up her happy spirit to the Lord whom she loved."

AN ANARCHIST'S HOME.

The McAll Mission in Paris works among the Anarchist class which just now all Europe is bent on exterminating. One of its missionaries in going on her round of visits recently called at the home of one of these men, whose feminine relatives attend the mission—the children in the Sunday School and the mother and grandmother in the meeting. "The grandmother sometimes blows the organ for us," says a worker in the McAll Mission. "I gave them candies at the baptism. The husband is a good-for-nothing drunkard. They have always been able, however, to get work and support themselves in an honest way. Mademoiselle opened their door. What a picture presented itself. Before my eyes sat the grandmother, mother and the children all weeping. The oldest girl, Martha, who comes also to our sewing-school, ashamed to be seen crying, went and hid herself.

"For two whole days the whole family had been without one morsel of food, and they said: 'Oh, Mademoiselle, we would have died rather than beg. We would never have gone to ask you for help. We have prayed constantly to God to help us, and now you are here.' Not a word of complaint, but they were sure God would hear and answer their prayers, and they acknowledged to Mademoiselle that if they were so resigned and so calm, they owed it to the meetings on Wednesday. 'It is there,' they said, 'that we have learnt to ask of God for peace of heart in the midst of trouble, and he has heard of our prayer.'

AMEN.

I cannot say
Beneath the presence of life's cares to-day
I joy in these;
But I can say
That I had rather walk this rugged way
If Him it please.

I do not see Why God should e'en permit something to be,
When He is love;
But I can see,
Though often dimly, through the mystery,

I may not try To keep the hot tears back, but hush that sigh,
"It might have been!"
And try to still Each rising murmur, and to God's sweet will Respond, "Amen!"

"What I have seen of God's blessing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may benefit from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Bentham Hill, England

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Laryngitis; together with accounts of many who successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will fail some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

THE BOOK SHELF

HEBREW NAMES.*

THE first nine chapters of Chronicles form, with a few slight exceptions, a continuous list of names. It is the largest extant collection of Hebrew names. Hence these chapters may be used as a text for the exposition of any spiritual significance to be derived from Hebrew names either individually or collectively. It has been well said that names of every nation are an important monument of national spirit and manners, and thus the Hebrew names bear important testimony to the peculiar vocation of this nation. No nation of antiquity has such a proportion of names of religious import. Amongst ourselves the religious meaning of names has almost wholly faded away; Christian name is a mere phrase, and children are named after relations, or according to a prevailing fashion, or after the characters of popular novels. The Israelites made constant use of El and Jehovah in their names, and we have no parallel practice. Were they then so much more religious than we are? Probably in a sense they were. It is true that the etymology and, even the original significance of a name in common use are for all practical purposes quickly and entirely forgotten. A man may go through a lifetime bearing the name of Christopher and never know its original meaning. As we know, the edifying phrase, "God encompasseth us" is altogether lost in the grotesque sign often seen over a tavern of the "Goat and Compasses." Nor can we suppose that the Israelite or the Assyrian often dwelt on the religious significance of the "Jeho" or the "iah," the Nebo, Sin, or Merodach, of current proper names. Yet the names which could be recognized as compounded of El or Jehovah must have had their influence on popular feeling. They were part of the righteousness, so to speak, of the ancient East; they symbolized the constant intertwining of religious acts and words, and thoughts with all the concerns of life. . . . We have become absorbed in the wonderful revelation of methods and processes; we are fascinated by the ingenious mechanism of nature and society. We have no leisure to detach our thoughts from the machinery and carry them further on to its Maker and Director. Indeed because there is so much mechanism and because it is so wonderful, we are sometimes asked to believe that the machine made itself. But this is a mere phase in the religious growth of mankind; humanity will tire of some of its new toys, and will become familiar with the rest; deeper needs and instincts will reassert themselves, and men will find themselves nearer in sentiment than they supposed to the ancient people who named their children after their God. In this and other matters the East to-day is the same as of old; the permanence of its customs is no inapt symbol of the permanence of divine truth, which revolution and conquest are powerless to change.

The East bowed low before the blast
In patient, deep disdain.
She felt the legions thunder past,
And plunged in thought again.

But the Christian Church is mistress of a more compelling magic than even Eastern patience and tenacity: out of the storms that threaten her, she draws new energies for service, and learns a more expressive language in which to declare the glory of God.

A HELPER OF THE POOR.†

The parish room of St. Fabian's was very quiet; unusually quiet, considering that about twenty of St. Fabian's parishioners were assembled in it, and that such an assemblage usually involved considerable tumult. It was a small room. St. Fabian's, poor in everything else, was poor also in its accommodation for its church organizations, and as these latter grew and developed, they were forced to find homes as they could in such rooms as could be obtained in the more respectable part of the parish. Its furniture consisted of as many wooden chairs as it would comfortably hold—some people might have said more—and a long table covered with a bright-colored cloth. It was about five o'clock, and round the table in every variety of heavy uncouthness of attitude that physical weariness could produce, sat some two dozen women occupied, evidently unfamiliarly enough, with needlework; by the side of one large, dull-looking woman, from whose hands she had just received the grimy piece of calico she held, stood Mrs. Custance.

When Aubrey Chisholm had been licensed to the curacy of St. Fabian's about six months before, such a thing as a lady worker had been unknown in the parish, which was, indeed, only just passing out of a long course of absolute neglect. Aubrey's vicar, Mr. Kendal, had himself been only very recently appointed; and though he did all that one man could, he was the wrong man for the place, inasmuch as he was so shy and so reserved as to be absolutely unable to attract helpers to himself. With Aubrey there had come upon the scene his sister; and on his first meeting with Mrs. Custance, it had seemed to him the obvious thing, considering her connection with the parish—indirect enough in all truth—to beg of her some of the help so much needed with the girls and women. To be asked for anything was so rare an experience with Mrs. Custance that she was hardly capable of saying no, and her frightened, hesitating protests producing nothing from the young curate but politely eager reassurances, she found herself, hardly knowing how it had come about, pledged at least to visit one or two of the women. And from those first visits had arisen all that had hitherto given her listless life in London the faintest touch of interest. What it was that attracted her in those miserable lives; why it was that she went again and again to the wretched rooms where poverty-stricken mothers and brutally treated wives dragged through their dreary round of daily life; she could have expressed as little as the women themselves could have told why there were few of them who, after the first, failed to "do" with her, as they expressed it; failed to give her the confidence for which she would never have asked. She had not thought of making their lots easier on any extended scale. Of her confused conviction, with regard to the state of things with which she was thus brought, for the first time in her life, into close contact, the most definite was that of the utter hopelessness of it all. And they, on their part, were well aware that she was poor herself, in her class, and had nothing to give them. Neither party understood the mysterious magnetism and sympathy of fellow feeling.

The "working party" assembled about her on this afternoon was no organization of her own. It had been arranged by Aubrey Chisholm, and she, though shrinking instinctively from the numbers and the formality, and much preferring her own unobtrusive visiting, had not known how to resist. He had spoken of it in the first instance as a "mothers' meeting," and her nervous distress at the idea had made it obviously impossible. He had given it up, greatly disappointed, but a day or two later he had presented the plan in a new guise, evidently not of his own devising, and with a less aggressive title, and she had drifted into it simply enough. If, as he assured her, it was really a rest and a change for the poor women to sit together in the parish room, she could not put difficulties in their way.

It was a sad enough sight that "class" of hers. It was composed entirely of women between twenty and forty years of age, and being so, it should have represented womanhood under under all its most beautiful aspects; at its dawn with all the gracious promise of dawn, in its maturity in all the dignity of that promise fulfilled. And of all those twenty women, young and old, there was not one in whom the womanhood was not debased and marred; not one on whom sin and poverty—her own sin or that of her fellow-man—had not set its mark; not one in whom the spark of God, set in each one of his creatures, was not trampled and thrust down, pressed upon by the constant presence of grinding care, choked by constant contact with all that is most sordid and most earthly in man's life, until its presence was hardly to be traced. They were the best and least degraded of the women of a London slum.

A COMFORTER'S TACT.*

Cannon Farrar says, "When a spiritual fountain is opened in the heart of any living being, it is a source of refreshment, not only to himself, but to all who may come within his presence and influence." This blessing, or refreshment, Miss Spoffard carried with her, wherever she went. Her smile, and laugh, were as winsome as a child's; her fair, smooth face showed few traces of age; how could it, when the spirit that looked out of its windows was so young and fresh? She came into the room in a breezy way, saying in her low, pleasant voice, that always had a ring of gladness in it, "Dear Ruby, I have brought you some pink and white blossoms from the woods, with their sweet messages of the new life and beauty of the spring," giving Mrs. Armitage a tender embrace.

"I found them just peeping out from under the snow, where they have been patiently waiting all winter to give the first greeting. I did not know as you would feel like seeing any company, but I have been absent a few days, and thought that I must come and tell you that you are in my thoughts and prayers all the time," and the bright eyes filled with tears. Then she seated herself, and talked on, in an easy, delightful way, telling of the blue-birds and robins that she had heard singing that morning; of the opening spring, with all its resurrection hopes, diverting Mrs. Armitage's mind with little pleasantries and imparting unconsciously some of her own joy to the stricken heart.

"You must go out, dear Ruby, as soon as you can, and see all these glories of the spring-time; there is a great healing, comforting power in nature; you must ride out every pleasant day."

"O, Miss Spoffard, I cannot; I have never been to ride since my husband's death without Frank sitting by my side; how could I go without him? I could not bear the sight of the horses he loved and petted. I fear such a ride would do me little good."

"I see that would be sad, but I will come with my horses and carriage, and we will have some rides together," a promise which was not forgotten.

There was the same charm of quiet peace about Miss Spoffard that there was about Dr. Earle, and added to that, a sparkle and life that made her very delightful. She did not refer to the harrowing circumstances of Frank's death, and asked no exciting questions, as people sometimes think they must do, in visiting the afflicted, compelling them to go over and over the sad details. She spoke of Mr. Leighton's remarks at the funeral, his beautiful tribute to Frank, adding, "he was a noble boy, and what a joy it is to know that he was all ready for heaven; his life can never be forgotten by his young friends. His earnest consecration to the Master—as expressed to Mr. Leighton—may do more toward winning them to Christ than he could have done had he lived for years. 'He being dead, yet speaketh.'"

Sweetly and hopefully she spoke of all the glory that had been revealed to his wondering eyes, of all the sin, sorrow and temptation he had escaped, and of the happy meeting with his Saviour and with his dear ones in heaven. Easily and pleasantly the conversation flowed on, until Mrs. Armitage found herself speaking naturally, almost cheerfully of her boy, telling of all his sweetness and patience during his short illness, of all his love and thoughtfulness for his mother even to the last.

Our Most Popular Piano

It is really hard to say which is our most popular piano. Our style 3000 B is the one we sell most of. The price of it is $200, and it is just such an instrument as you would pay an agent or dealer $150 for. Everybody knows that there are enormous profits in the retail piano business. We take these profits and give them to the actual user of the piano. We eliminate the middleman. We believe that it is better for us, and we know that it is better for you. Every time an article changes hands, somebody makes a profit. Somebody has to pay for clerks and canvassers and rent and light in the dealer's store. All these things cost money and their cost all goes into the price you pay for your piano. Our system is merely the application of good hard common sense to the business. Our 30 years of success, and our thousands of pleased patrons prove that the system is a good one. If you don't know us, ask any bank or commercial agency about us—ask your own bank. And remember this, you need not pay us one single cent till you have tried the piano in your own home. If it isn't just exactly what you want, you may send it back at our expense—we pay freight both ways. That shows that we're in earnest, doesn't it? Send for our handsome catalogue—it's free. Then look us up. Don't deal with us unless you find that we are thoroughly reliable and honest in all our transactions. We can save you money and we can prove it. WITH SONG AND WITH DRUM.

Some of the Enjoyments and Recreations of Our Young Folks at the Children's Home—Musical Evenings—Their Wonderful Proficiency in Bible Study.

EACH passing week brings its quota of new faces to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack, and takes away from its shady wooded nooks and green sloping lawns those whose holiday term of ten days has expired. It is a shifting panorama of child-life, bright, cheerful and instructive. To the happy juveniles who go there, it is ans to the great dining-hall, where they sit down to meals with hearty appetites, rendered keen by the air of the hills. As their leader gives the signal, the childish feet move together and all are soon in their seats at the well-appointed table, and ready for morning grace.

There are few things in which the average child takes more pleasure than in vocal music. Visitors to the Home have been delighted, at the evening Service of Song ing By," "Rock of Ages," "Jesus, Lover of my Soul," "Yield not to Temptation," "When He Cometh," etc. All of these, and many other hymns, they sing with a vigor and earnestness that show how thorough is their enjoyment of the pleasure. Indeed, next to their play, there is nothing they seem to love so much as these musical hours.

After singing several hymns, they unite in reciting some familiar Psalm, preferably the First or Twenty-first, both of which nearly all our children know by heart. Then, after a little more music, one of the missionaries leads in prayer, and this is followed by the "Lord's Prayer," all joining in the petition. For the next five minutes the lawn to the sound of the drum. The drummer is a bright, little fellow, who has become quite a favorite in the Home with both missionaries and children, and whose nimble fingers can sound out, with his pair of drumsticks, many of the regular military calls with remarkable cleverness. At his summons, therefore, the whole troop of a hundred or more boys and girls forms a great circle around the flag-pole, and there with eyes dancing with excitement and lungs filled with the pure ozone of the hills, they sing several patriotic songs—songs which every American boy and girl ought to know. These songs are printed for our children in a leaflet in the American colors, red, white and blue, and those who prove like a section of heaven let down for their delight, a vacation among kind friends, to be remembered through the after years.

Hardly has the morning sun lighted up the valley below Mont Lawn, when the children are up and the whole of the little community is astir. The use of the gong as a summons to meals has been abandoned and the photograph on this page shows our children assembling at the sound of the drum, to march in columns, like little veter-

(which is held at 7 o'clock in the chapel), to observe the heartiness with which our little folks melodiously carried hymn after hymn, in perfect time. They are furnished with leaflets, printed specially for their use, and containing the words of a number of familiar hymns, such as, "Jesus Loves Me," "Come to the Saviour," "While the Days are Gothe order of exercises is relaxed and the children are at liberty to choose any hymn they please. They then march out again to their own favorite chorus:

Follow! follow! I will follow Jesus:
Everywhere he leads me, I will follow on.

In the afternoon, before going down to "five o'clock tea," the little ones gather on the cleverest in memorizing them accurately, receive a reward. Many have learned the words of the entire series from beginning to end. When a boy or girl succeeds in committing one of these songs to memory, the opportunity is afforded of reciting it under the flagstaff, or singing it as a solo with the whole circle swelling the chorus. This is great fun for our young folks and is heartily enjoyed by their adult listeners.

The TABERNACLE PULPIT

NARROW ESCAPES.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Job 19: 20, "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth."

JOB had it hard. What with boils, and bereavements, and bankruptcy, and a fool of a wife, he wished he was dead; and I do not blame him. His flesh was gone, and his bones were dry. His teeth wasted away until nothing but the enamel seemed left. He cries out, "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth."

There has been some difference of opinion about this passage. St. Jerome and Schultens, and Doctors Good, and Poole, and Barnes, have all tried their torceps on Job's teeth. You deny my interpretation, and say, "What did Job know about the enamel of the teeth?" He knew everything about it. Dental surgery is almost as old as the earth. The mummies of Egypt, thousands of years old, are found to-day with gold-filling in their teeth. Ovid, and Horace, and Solomon, and Moses wrote about these important factors of the body. To other provoking complaints, Job, I think, has added an exasperating toothache, and, putting his hand against the inflamed face, he says, "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth."

A very narrow escape, you say, for Job's body and soul; but there are thousands of men who make just as narrow escape for their soul. There was a time when the partition between them and ruin was no thicker than a tooth's enamel; but, as Job finally escaped, so have they. Thank God! thank God!

Paul expresses the same idea by a different figure when he says that some people are "saved as by fire." A vessel at sea is in flames. You go to the stern of the vessel. The boats have shoved off. The flames advance; you can endure the heat no longer on your face. You slide down on the side of the vessel, and hold on with your fingers, until the forked tongue of the fire begins to lick the back of your hand, and you feel that you must fall, when one of the life-boats comes back, and the passengers say they think they have room for one more. The boat swings under you—you drop into it—you are saved. So some men are pursued by temptation until they are partially consumed, but after all get off—"saved as by fire." But I like the figure of Job a little better than that of Paul, because the pulpit has not worn it out; and I want to show you, if God will help, that some men make narrow escape for their souls, and are saved as "with the skin of their teeth."

It is as easy for some people to look to the Cross as for you to look to this pulpit. Mild, gentle, tractable, loving, you expect them to become Christians. You go over to the store and say, "Grandson joined the Church yesterday." Your business comrades say, "That is just what might have been expected; he always was of that turn of mind." In youth, this person whom I describe was always good. He never broke things. He never laughed when it was improper to laugh. At seven, he could sit an hour in church, perfectly quiet, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, but straight into the eyes of the minister, as though he understood the whole discussion about the eternal decrees. He never upset things, nor lost them. He floated into the kingdom of God so gradually that it is uncertain just when the matter was decided.

Here is another one, who started in life with an uncontrollable spirit. He kept the nursery in an uproar. His mother found him walking on the edge of the house-roof to see if he could balance himself. There was no horse he dared not ride—no tree he could not climb. His boyhood was a long series of predicaments; his manhood was reckless; his midlife very wayward. But now he is converted, and you go over to the store and say, "Arkwright joined the Church yesterday." Your friends say, "It is not possible! You must be joking!" You say, "No; I tell you the truth. He joined the Church." Then they reply, "There is hope for any of us if old Arkwright has become a Christian!"

In other words, we all admit that it is more difficult for some men to accept the Gospel than for others.

I may be addressing some who have cut loose from churches, and Bibles, and Sundays, and who have at present no intention of becoming Christians themselves, but just to see what is going on; and yet you may find yourself escaping, before you hear the end, as "with the skin of your teeth." I do not expect to waste this hour. I have seen boats go off from Cape May or Long Branch, and drop their nets, and after a while come ashore, pulling in the nets without having caught a single fish. It was not a good day, or they had not the right kind of a net. But we expect no such excursion to-day. The water is full of fish; the wind is in the right direction; the Gospel net is strong. O, thou, who didst help Simon and Andrew to fish, show us to-day how to cast the net on the right side of the ship!

Some of you, in coming to God, will have to run against sceptical notions. It is useless for people to say sharp and cutting things to those who reject the Christian religion. I cannot say such things. By what process of temptation, or trial, or betrayal you have come to your present state, I know not. There are two gates to your nature: the gate of the head, and the gate of the heart. The gate of your head is locked with bolts and bars that an archangel could not break, but the gate of your heart swings easily on its hinges. If I assaulted your body with weapons you would meet me with weapons, and it would be sword-stroke for sword-stroke, and wound for wound, and blood for blood; but if I come and knock at the door of your house, you open it, and give me the best seat in your parlor. If I should come at you to-day with an argument, you would answer me with an argument; if with sarcasm, you would answer me with sarcasm; blow for blow, stroke for stroke; but when I come and knock at the door of your heart, you open it and say, "Come in, my brother, and tell me all you know about Christ and heaven."

Listen to two or three questions: Are you as happy as you used to be when you believed in the truth of the Christian religion? Would you like to have your children travel on in the road in which you are now traveling? You had a relative who professed to be a Christian, and was thoroughly consistent, living and dying in the faith of the Gospel. Would you not like to live the same quiet life, and die the same peaceful death? I received a letter, sent me by one who has rejected the Christian religion. It says, "I am old enough to know that the joys and pleasures of life are evanescent, and to realize the fact that it must be comfortable in old age to believe in something relative to the future, and to have a faith in some system that proposes to save. I am free to confess that I would be happier if I could exercise the simple and beautiful faith that is possessed by many whom I know. I am not willingly out of the Church or out of the faith: My state of uncertainty is one of unrest. Sometimes I doubt my immortality, and look upon the death-bed as the closing scene, after which there is nothing. What shall I do that I have not done?" Ah! scepticism is a dark and doleful land. Let me say that this Bible is either true or false. If it be false, we are as well off as you; if it be true, then which of us is safer?

Let me also ask whether your trouble has not been that you confounded Christianity with the inconsistent character of some who profess it. You are a lawyer. In your profession there are mean and dishonest men. Is that anything against the law? You are a doctor. There are unskilled and contemptible men in your profession. Is that anything against medicine? You are a merchant. There are thieves and defrauders in your business. Is that anything against merchandise? Behold, then, the unfairness of charging upon Christianity the wickedness of its disciples. We admit some of the charges against those who profess religion. Some of the most gigantic swindles of the present day have been carried on by members of the Church. There are men in the churches who would not be trusted for five dollars without good collateral security. They leave their business dishonesties in the vestibule of the church as they go in and sit at the communion. Having concluded the sacrament, they get up, wipe the wine from their lips, go out, and take up their sins where they left off. To serve the devil is their regular work; to serve God a sort of play-spell. With a Sunday sponge they expect to wipe off from their business slate all the past week's inconsistencies. You have no more right to take such a man's life as a specimen of religion than you have to take the twisted irons and split timbers that lie on the beach at Coney Island as a specimen of an American ship. It is time that we drew a line between religion and the frailties of those who profess it.

Do you not feel that the Bible, take it all in all, is about the best book that the world has ever seen? Do you know any book that has as much in it? Do you not think, upon the whole, that its influence has been beneficent? I come to you with both hands extended toward you. In one hand I have the Bible, and in the other I have nothing. This Bible in one hand I will surrender forever just as soon as in my other hand you can put a book that is better.

To-day I invite you back into the good old-fashioned religion of your fathers—to the God whom they worshipped, to the Bible they read, to the promises on which they leaned, to the cross on which they hung their eternal expectations. You have not been happy a day since you swung off; you will not be happy a minute until you swing back.

Again: There may be some of you who, in the attempt after a Christian life, will have to run against powerful passions and appetites. Perhaps it is a disposition to anger that you have to contend against; and perhaps, while in a very serious mood, you hear of something that makes you feel that you must swear or die. I know of a Christian man who was once so exasperated that he said to a mean customer, "I cannot swear at you myself, for I am a member of the Church; but if you will go down stairs my partner in business will swear at you." All your good resolutions heretofore have been torn to tatters by explosions of temper. Now there is no harm in getting mad if you only get mad at sin. You need to bridle and saddle these hot-breathed passions, and with them ride down injustice and wrong. There are a thousand things in the world that we ought to be mad at. There is no harm in getting red hot if you only bring to the forge that which needs hammering. A man who has no power of righteous indignation is an imbecile. But be sure it is a righteous indignation, and not a petulance that blurs, and unravels, and depletes the soul.

There is a large class of persons in mid-life who have still in their appetites that were aroused in early manhood, at a time when they prided themselves on being a "little fast," "high liver," "free and easy," "hail fellows well met." They are now paying in compound interest for troubles they collected twenty years ago. Some of you are trying to escape, and you will—yet very narrowly, "as with the skin of your teeth." God and your own soul only know what the struggle is. Omnipotent grace has pulled out many a soul that was deeper in the mire than you are. They line the beach of heaven—the multitude whom God has rescued from the thrall of suicidal habits. It you this day turn your back on the wrong, and start anew, God will help you. Oh the weakness of human help! Men will sympathize for a while, and then turn you off. If you ask for their pardon, they will give it, and say they will try you again; but, falling away again under the power of temptation, they cast you off forever. But God forgives seventy times seven; yea, seven hundred times; yea, though this be the ten thousandth time he is more earnest, more sympathetic, more helpful this last time than when you took your first misstep.

If, with all the influences favorable for a right life, men make so many mistakes, how much harder it is when, for instance, some appetite thrusts its iron grapple into the roots of the tongue, and pulls a man down with hands of destruction! If, under such circumstances, he break away, there will be no sport in the undertaking, no holiday enjoyment, but a struggle in which the wrestlers move from side to side, and bend, and twist, and watch for an opportunity to get in a heavier stroke, until with one final effort, in which the muscles are distended, and the veins stand out, and the blood starts, the swarthy habit falls under the knee of the victor—escaped at last as with the skin of his teeth.

The ship "Emma," bound from Gottenburg to Harwich, was sailing on, when the man on the lookout saw something that he pronounced a vessel bottom up. There was something on it that looked like a sea-gull, but was afterward found to be a waving handkerchief. In the small boat the crew pushed out to the wreck, and found that it was a capsized vessel, and that three men had been digging their way out through the bottom of the ship. When the vessel capsized they had no means of escape. The captain took his penknife and dug away through the planks until his knife broke. Then an old nail was found, with which they attempted to scrape their way out of the darkness, each one working until his hand was well-nigh paralyzed, and he sank back faint and sick. After long and tedious work, the light broke through the bottom of the ship. A handkerchief was hoisted. Help came. They were taken on board the vessel and saved. Did ever men come so near a watery grave without dropping into it? How narrowly they escaped—escaped only "with the skin of their teeth."

There are men who have been capsized of evil passions, and capsized mid-ocean, and they are a thousand miles away from any shore of help. They have for years been trying to dig their way out. They have been digging away, and digging away, but they can never be delivered unless now they will hoist some signal of distress. However weak and feeble it may be, Christ will see it, and bear down upon the helpless craft, and take them on board; and it will be known on earth and in heaven how narrowly they escaped—"escaped as with the skin of their teeth."

There are others who, in attempting to come to God, must run between a great many business perplexities. If a man go over to business at ten o'clock in the morning, and comes away at three o'clock in the afternoon, he has some time for religion; but how shall you find time for religious contemplation when you are driven from sunrise until sunset, and have been for five years going behind in business, and are frequently dunned by creditors whom you can not pay, and when, from Monday morning until Saturday night, you are dodging bills that you cannot meet? You walk day by day in uncertainties that have kept your brain on fire for the past three years. Some, with less business troubles than you, have gone crazy. The clerk has heard a noise in the back counting-room, and gone in, and found the chief man of the firm a raving maniac; or the wife has heard the bang of a pistol in the back parlor, and gone in, stumbling over the dead body of her husband—a suicide. There are in this house to-day three hundred men pursued, harassed, trodden down, and scalped of business perplexities, and which way to turn next they do not know. Now, God will not be hard on you. He knows what obstacles are in the way of your being a Christian, and your first effort in the right direction he will crown with success. Do not let Satan, with cotton-bales, and kegs, and hogsheads, and counters, and stocks of unsaleable goods, block up your way to heaven. Gather up all your energies. Tighten the girdle about your loins. Take an agonizing look into the face of God, and then say, "Here goes one grand effort for life eternal," and then bound away for heaven, escaping "as with the skin of your teeth."

In the last day it will be found that Hugh Latimer, and John Knox, and Huss, and Ridley were not the greatest martyrs, but Christian men who went up incorrupt from the contaminations and perplexities of Wall Street, Water Street, Pearl Street, Broad Street, State Street, Third Street, Lombard Street and the Bourse. On earth they were called brokers, or stock-jobbers, or retailers, or importers; but in heaven, Christian heroes. No fagots were heaped about their feet; no Inquisition demanded from them recantation; no soldier aimed a spike at their heart; but they had mental tortures, compared with which all physical consuming is as the breath of a spring morning.

I find in the community a large class of men who have been so cheated, so lied about, so outrageously wronged, that they have lost faith in everything. In a world where everything seems so topsy-turvy, they do not see how there can be any God. They are confounded and trenzied, and misanthropic. Elaborate argument to prove to them the truth of Christianity, or the truth of anything else, touches them nowhere. Hear me, all such men. I preach to you no rounded periods, no ornamental discourse; but I put my hand on your shoulder, and invite you into the peace of the Gospel. Here is a rock on which you may stand firm, though the waves dash against it harder than the Atlantic, pitching its surf clear above Eddystone Lighthouse. Do not charge upon God all these troubles of the world. As long as the world stuck to God, God stuck to the world; but the earth seceded from his government, and hence all these outrages and all these woes. God is good. For many hundreds of years he has been coaxing the world to come back to him; but the more he has coaxed, the more violent have men been in their resistance, and they have stepped back and stepped back until they have dropped into ruin.

Try this God, ye who have had the bloodhounds after you, and who have thought that God had forgotten you. Try him, and see if he will not help. Try him, and see if he will not pardon. Try him, and see if he will not save. The flowers of spring have no bloom so sweet as the flowering of Christ's affections. The sun hath no warmth compared with the glow of his heart. The waters have no refreshment like the fountain that will slake the thirst of thy soul. At the moment the reindeer stands with his lip and nostril thrust into the cool mountain torrent, the hunter may be coming through the thicket. Without crackling a stick under his foot, he comes close by the stag, aims his gun, draws the trigger, and the poor thing rears in its death-agony and falls backward, its antlers crashing on the rocks; but the panting hart that drinks from the water-brooks of God's promise shall never be fatally wounded, and shall never die.

This world is a poor portion for your soul, oh business man! An Eastern king had graven upon his tomb two fingers, represented as sounding upon each other with a snap, and under them the motto, "All is not worth that." Apicius Cælius hanged himself because his steward informed him that he had only eighty thousand pounds sterling left. All of this world's riches make but a small inheritance for a soul. Robespierre attempted to win the applause of the world; but when he was dying, a woman came rushing through the crowd, crying to him, "Murderer of my kindred, descend to hell, covered with the curses of every mother in France!" Many who have expected the plaudits of the world have died under its Anathema Maranatha.

Oh, find your peace in God. Make one strong pull for heaven. No half-way work will do it. There sometimes comes a time on ship-board when everything must be sacrificed to save the passengers. The cargo is nothing, the rigging nothing. The captain puts the trumpet to his lip and shouts, "Cut away the mast!" Some of you have been tossed and driven, and you have, in your effort to keep the world, well-nigh lost your soul. Until you have decided this matter, let everything else go. Overboard with all those other anxieties and burdens! You will have to drop the sails of your pride, and cut away the mast! With one earnest cry for help, put your cause into the hand of him who helped Paul out of the breakers of Melita, and who, above the shrill blast of the wrathiest tempest that ever blackened the sky or shook the ocean, can hear the faintest imploration for mercy. I shall conclude, feeling that some of you, who have considered your case hopeless, will take heart again, and that with a blood-red earnestness, such as you have never experienced before, you will start for the good land of the Gospel—at last to look back, saying, "What a great risk I ran! Almost lost, but saved! Just got through, and no more! Escaped by the skin of my teeth."

ARCTIC NEGATIVES.

Bishop Bompas, of Athabasca, speaking of his diocese, says: The chief characteristic of an Arctic life consists not so much in what is present as in features that are conspicuous by their absence. No cities, towns, or villages, streets, roads, or lanes; no markets, farms, or bazaars; no flocks, or herds, or carriages; no money, whether coin or notes; no railways, mails, or telegraphs; no government, or soldiers, or police; no prisons or taxes; no lawyers or doctors. In the stern magnificence of Arctic nature, one is brought so near to the Creator as to compensate for the lack of many things.

It has been a matter of frequent remark that Americans, when across the ocean, are rarely found to be capable of singing more than a single verse of any American national song when called upon to do so. On the other hand, the English and others are almost invariably able to sing their patriotic songs from the first line to the last. It can never be said of the boys and girls of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home that they cannot sing the best songs of their native land! They enter into this part of their Mont Lawn experience with the highest enthusiasm, and take real delight in making every word of these songs their own.

Another source of enjoyment, which has already been mentioned on a previous occasion, is the Edison phonograph. At the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in the Bible House, the phonograph is in use in the business, editorial and correspondence departments, and one of these wonderful instruments, with a sound multiplier, and a box of musical cylinders, was lately sent to the Home for the amusement of our children. It was a puzzle altogether beyond their comprehension how such a machine could sing, laugh, whistle and talk; how it could reproduce with rare fidelity and distinctness the notes of piano or banjo, or the swelling tones of a full orchestra of brass, string and wind instruments, playing some of the great masterpieces of Wagner, Mendelssohn or Handel. More than one little tow-headed inquirer, wonderingly asks where the "man was hidden what was a playin' " mark their perfect neatness, the dainty purity of everything in them and the excellent ventilation. Each boy and girl has an individual towel and wash-rag—an arrangement not to be found in any other institution for children, and which awakens in the little ones a sense of individual responsibility for their personal appearance. Many of the boys who come up to the Home are clever with the needle and can sew a patch on their own trousers as neatly as any housewife could do it. Not all come well supplied with garments, for our children come from the homes of the very poor. In many instances we have to fit the little folks out with necessary clothing and shoes, so that they may spend their vacation in comfort. None are sent home in a ragged condition; if the clothing is dilapidated and the shoes worn out, before the child is put aboard the "Chrystenah" for the return trip to the city, it is fitted out with such articles as may be needed. Many of the girls, when they arrive at the Home, receive a well-made and well-fitting gingham dress, which they wear while roaming around, and thus save their own clothing for their return home. Of course it is optional with them to wear their own garments or this more substantial and serviceable frock, but almost all take the latter, as they are then freer to romp and wander at will.

HE STOOD BY HIS FLAG.

AN incident is related that may be helpful to many young Christians in time of trial and persecution by scoffers. A dozen rough but brave soldiers were playing cards one night in camp, when suddenly the whole squad were listening to a low, solemn voice which came from a tent occupied by several recruits who had arrived in camp that day. The ring-leader approached the tent on tip-toe.

"Boys, he's praying, or I'm a sinner!" he roared out. "Three cheers for the parson!" shouted another man of the group as the prayer ended.

"You watch things for three weeks. I'll show you how to take the religion out of him!" said the first speaker, laughing. He was a large man, the ring-leader in mischief. The recruit was a slight, pale-faced young fellow of about eighteen years of age. During the next three weeks he was the butt of the camp. Then several of the boys, conquered by the lad's gentle patience and uniform kindness to his persecutors, begged the others to stop annoying him.

"Oh, the little ranter is no better than the rest of us!" answered the ring-leader. "He's only making believe pious. When we get under fire, you'll see him run. These pious folks don't like the smell of gun-powder. I've no faith in their religion."

In a few weeks the regiment broke camp, marched toward Richmond, entered the Wilderness, and engaged in that terrible battle. The company to which the young recruit belonged had a desperate struggle. The brigade was driven back, and when the line was reformed behind the breastworks they had built in the morning, he was missing. When last seen he was surrounded by enemies, but fighting desperately. At his side stood the brave fellow who had made the poor lad a constant object of ridicule. Both were given up as lost. Suddenly the big man was seen tramping through the underbrush, bearing the dead body of the recruit. Reverently he laid the corpse down, saying, as he wiped the blood from his own face:

"Boys, I couldn't leave him behind—he fought so! I thought he deserved a decent burial."

During a lull in the battle the men dug a shallow grave and tenderly laid the remains therein. Then, as one was cutting the name and regiment upon a board, the big man said, with husky voice:

"I guess you'd better put the words, 'Christian soldier' in somewhere! He deserves the title, and may be it'll console him for our abuse."

There was not a dry eye among those rough men as they stuck the rudely-carved board at the head of the grave, and again looked at the inscription.

"Well," said one, "he was a Christian soldier, if there ever was one! And," turning to the ring-leader, "he didn't run, did he, when he smelt gun-powder?"

"Run!" answered the big man, his voice tender with emotion, "why, he didn't budge an inch! But what's that to standing for weeks our fire like a man, and never sending a word back! He just stood by his flag and let us pepper him—he did."

TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

S.S. Lesson for Aug. 12. Matt. 6: 1-11. Golden Text, Heb. 1: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SEEING then we have a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not a High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." (Heb. 4: 14, 15.) Jesus tempted! If it was a humiliation to him to be baptized, how infinitely more humbling was it to be tempted! But his life was not a farce, the human life which he lived on earth, was not a semblance, the trials and tests which he met with were real, not mere shadows; he trod on every step of ground which it is needful for us to tread on in our human life; and he met the tempter in all points. Wherefore it behooveth him in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in all things pertaining to God, to make propitiation for the sins of the people. For in that he himself hath he is able to succor them that are tempted." (Heb. 2: 9-18, R.V.) In order to understand how real was the temptation of our Lord, we need these words from Hebrews. It was not in the night of his eternal Godhead that Jesus met the great enemy, but as having "emptied himself," and taken on him the form of a servant, and been made in the likeness of men. It was immediately following after his baptism that Jesus, being full of the Holy Spirit, returned from the Jordan, and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, during forty days being tempted of the devil. Led up to the conflict by the Holy Spirit, who, as a dove, had come upon him when he was baptized, Jesus entered into this dark hour. Blessed is he who is found in the hour of temptation led of the Spirit, instead of being led away by his own lust and enticed. Our beloved Lord came, not to do his own will, but the will of him that sent him. This was inviolable in his life on earth. "I do always those things that please him." (John 8: 29.)

During the forty days Jesus was in the desert, he fasted. This must have been a trial to which, as man, he was led by the Spirit. In the Gospel of Mark 1: 13 we read: "And he was in the wilderness forty days, tempted of Satan." Forty days tempted of Satan, yet forty days led of the Spirit in the wilderness! Real intense warfare, but undoubted victory. After the forty days of fasting, "He was an hungered." (Matt. 4: 2.) This was the moment in which the enemy attempted to take advantage, and, if possible, to find him off his guard. He suggests: "If thou art the Son of God, command that these stones become loaves." (v. 3, R.V.) There is no sin in hunger; there is no sin in seeking food to satisfy hunger. But Jesus, as man, was learning from Scripture, and in communion with his Father, what was his will that he might do it. He had entered upon his ministry; the intensity of the situation was dawning upon him. The question of hunger and of food was not one which he would settle. He was the obedient Son, and so, because he was the Son of God, he bowed up for direction, and the Word which he had hidden in his heart (Ps. 40: 8) came to him as his own weapon of defence. It is written: "Man shall but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Led of the Spirit, seeking only the will of his Father, meeting the enemy by Scripture, the Lord conquered, and made a way by which we may conquer too. He suffered being tempted; hunger was a reality to him, as to us, but he chose hunger rather than that he should, for a moment, lose ground for his Father. He, as man, knew from the Word about the manna in the desert, and he who afterwards turned the water into wine, could have found means to turn the stones into bread. But was that a part of his ministry, and of the will of his father, for that hour? This was the question for Jesus. The enemy challenged him as though his failure to work this miracle might be fatal to his vocation as the Son of God on earth. In hours of temptation we never have to consider the consequences of any step we take in obedience to the Word of God, our warfare is never at our own charges, we have but to believe and to obey; he will do the rest. Temptation is not sin; we are not responsible any more than was our Lord himself, for the suggestions of the evil one, but if lust, or our own human will, conceives the suggestion, or gives it any quarter, then "it bringeth forth sin." Every really conquered temptation finds us more out of reach of the enemy on that point, but a temptation is not really conquered so long as there is the slightest working of our own will in the matter; any bias whatever from our own self, any choice but to choose with God. It takes loyalty to God to be victorious over temptation, and a full faith in the truth and reality of the Word of God.

Satan adapts his temptations to us according to our characters, our knowledge, and our experience. Who would have counted it a sin for Christ to work a miracle in which he would not only have manifested his divine origin but at the same time satisfied the hunger from which he was suffering? It seemed a most reasonable thing. But an obedient child has not to reason but to obey. Whenever we attempt to combine things and make them serve our purpose and serve God at the same time, we may fall into terrible things. Probably Judas counted that the Lord Jesus, who had power to raise the dead, would have delivered himself from the servants of the high priest into whose hands he had betrayed him, and would shew forth his power, while he, Judas, would serve his own purpose, and be enriched by the money for which he sold him. The end of this combination of things we need not reter to. Let our eye be single that our whole body may be full of light. "Then the devil taketh him into the holy city and he set him on the pinnacle of the temple and saith unto him: If thou art the Son of God, cast thyself down, for it is written, he shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest haply thou dash thy foot against a stone." Again a suggestion of Doubt about His Origin.

Jesus was lately from Nazareth where, for thirty years, he had led an ordinary artisan's life. There had been nothing to mark his destiny, but the incident in the temple and the testimony of his Father at his baptism. He had emptied himself that he might be touched with the feeling of our infirmities or weaknesses, never for a moment ceasing to be divine, he yet met the enemy on human ground, as the Son of Man, but led of the Spirit. We cannot lift the veil and understand how these suggestions of the enemy worked upon him so that he "suffered being tempted," whether his physical weakness from long fasting, whether his intense consciousness of the utter powerlessness of the nature of man which he had taken, and the fallen condition of mankind pressed him; but we know he suffered, while he "knew no sin."

It must have been a very real part of the suffering of our Lord to have had Scripture quoted by the great enemy of souls. But he was not to be baffled. He had learned the sword-exercise in the Word of God, the law which was within his heart did not consist of a few isolated passages. He could say: "The sum of thy Word is truth." And thus, out of the armory of the Word, he brought forth another weapon:

"It is Written Again

Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." The enemy had intentionally missed the point in his quotation: "To keep thee in all thy ways" was omitted. This, to our Lord, was the most important. To be kept from danger is blessed and precious, and we cannot be too grateful for it. This was the highest conception which the enemy had in his quotation—he appealed entirely to the lower part of Christ's nature. But, as the obedient Son of God, to be kept in the ways and in the will of his Father was more than all else to him, and in his reply to the enemy, he spoke with authority; "It is written: Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." The suggestion was a possible one; Jesus knew the ministry of angels, he said to Peter: Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then shall the Scripture be fulfilled that thus it must be?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SCENE ON MT. QUARANTANIA.

THE temptation of Christ appears to have followed closely upon his baptism. The descent of the Holy Spirit on that occasion, accompanied by the voice from heaven, must have powerfully affected our Lord. Probably not until then did he fully realize his divinity and the character of his mission. Mark's language is significant. He says the Spirit drove him into the wilderness, as if there was a mighty compelling force demanding a period of solitary preparation. Tradition points out a high mountain between Jerusalem and Jericho, as the scene of the conflict. It is now called the Mount of Quarantania, or the mount of the forty days. It contains many caves and deep rugged ravines, where wild beasts lurked. In one place the mountain looks as if it had been cleft by a mighty convulsion and there is a sheer precipice almost perpendicular, twelve hundred feet deep. A more gloomy, desolate, awe-inspiring region cannot be imagined. It is a fit scene for a conflict such as that described in the lesson. The mind of our Lord would doubtless be occupied with the great work before him of manifesting the Father to the world. To him comes the Tempter. It will be well to dismiss from the mind that taint of mediæval times, representing the evil one in repulsive guise, with horns and tail and cloven hoofs. It is not so that he comes to men in the time of his dangerous power. He comes in attractive shape if he would lure them to destruction, with sweet reasonableness and cunning sophistry. Thus to Christ, meditating on his mission, he came with the suggestion that he turn stones into bread. The suggestion was appropriate, for Christ was hungry with long fasting. Perhaps in the thought there was a wider suggestion. If Christ could turn stones into bread how popular he might be, how easily he might win his way to the heart of the world, by providing it with the wealth it is always seeking! But Christ puts the suggestion from him. It is not material food he has come to give. Man has deeper needs which he has come to supply. Man does not live by bread alone. The next suggestion is that Christ cast himself down from a pinnacle of the temple. If he had done so on some feast day, when Jerusalem was crowded, the act would have electrified the city and have attracted the attention at once of all

Judæa to this young wonder-worker. A man imbued with the advertising spirit of our day can see at once the value of so dramatic an opening to a career. But this, too, Christ rejected. The final suggestion showed more effrontery on the part of the tempter. It was that Christ should join forces with him. If Christ would do homage to him, he would give him freely all that must otherwise be won by pain and suffering and obloquy. But not so would Christ gain ascendancy. He was there to overthrow, not to submit, to conquer, not to yield. So it should be now. The Church has forgotten the example of her Lord when she condones the sins of wicked men and honors them for the sake of their wealth and power and the gifts they can give.

Tempted of the devil. An ancient parable describes a mountain at the top of which was a magnificent palace full of treasures and delights of all kinds. There every taste was gratified and each person found in perfection exactly the things he loved. Hundreds were toiling up the hill to reach the castle, but busy among them were frolicsome creatures making attempts to divert them. They were whispering, shouting, dancing, singing entrancing songs, exhibiting wonderful attractions to get the travelers to look away from the palace and stop and turn aside. They were often successful and when a traveler took his eyes from the palace there was a great shout and when he took his first step from his path there was more joy; at the next step a change took place. The traveler was no longer flesh and blood but had turned to stone. So do those perish who tempted of the devil turn aside after pleasure and vanity leaving the straight path to God and heaven.

Fall down and worship me. There is a legend of St. Martin of Tours, that he had been long engaged in meditation in the cell of the monastery when a radiant form appeared to him, with a jewelled crown on its head, a countenance resplendent with glory, and with a manner so impressive that it seemed to demand homage and love. The heavenly vision said to St. Martin, "I am Christ; worship Me!" and the legend goes on to say that the saint looked upon this glorious form in silence, then gazed upon the hands for the marks of that suffering by which Christ won his right to the homage of the world, and asked, "Where is the print of the nails?" Forthwith the vision vanished, and St. Martin knew that it was the crafty tempter who had taken upon him the likeness of the Master but not the marks of suffering.

Him only shalt thou serve. The godly man has often been assailed, like the Hebrew youths in Babylon, by the temptations of monarchs, who demanded homage and obedience contrary to the law of God. It is related of Polycarp, the disciple of the Apostle John, that when he was arraigned before the proconsul, the sight of his venerable face and figure moved the stern Roman to pity and he rejoiced that it was in his power to offer the aged man his liberty on condition of his abjuring his faith, but Polycarp was not to be tempted by promises or threats. The proconsul said, "Reproach Christ, and I will release thee." Polycarp, looking up toward heaven, said, "Eighty and six years have I served him, and he hath never wronged me, and how can I blaspheme my King who hath saved me?" "I have wild beasts," said the proconsul, "and I will expose you to them unless you repent." "Call them," said the martyr. "I will tame your spirit by fire," said the Roman. "You threaten me," said Polycarp, "with the fire which only burns for the moment, and are yourself ignorant of the fire of eternal punishment reserved for the ungodly." Soon after, being bound to the burning stake, he thanked God for the honor of the martyr's fate.

All these things will I give thee. All the things Satan offered will yet belong to Christ. God has promised that he shall rule over all the kingdoms of the world and he is rapidly winning them by his love, the story of which missionaries are carrying everywhere. Dr. T. L. Chamberlain who was in the great Mohammedan mosque of Damascus shortly before it was burned says that he read on the lintel beam of that temple of the False Prophet in Greek characters the inscription, "Thy kingdom O, Christ, is the kingdom of the ages, and thy dominion is throughout all generations." For more than a thousand years the followers of the False Prophet have passed beneath that word carved there when the mosque was a Christian church, the while they have dreamed of world-wide conquest.

“The Wailing Place.”

THE deep descent down which we pick our way to the section of the ancient wall of the Temple known the world over as “The Wailing Place,” is nothing more or less than an accumulation of rubbish hundreds of years old. Ancient Jerusalem lies from fifty to seventy feet below the modern town.

We turn aside from the more direct route to the sacred spot for a look at “Robinson’s Arch.” The celebrated fragment springs boldly from the wall which enclosed the area of the Temple. The bridge of which it was an abutment once spanned the valley between the House of God and Mount Zion. The polished stone pavement below is overwhelmed by nearly fifty feet of earth and stones. This bridge, in the opinion of able commentators, was but one of several arches connecting the two hills, probably the “ascent by which Solomon went up unto the house of the Lord.”

When the eager spirits that direct and execute the work of the Palestine Exploration Society so far prevail with the jealous Government now in despotic possession of the storied precincts as to be allowed to lay bare the bosom of the City of the Great King, what marvels will be brought to light!

In discussing the subject for the twentieth time in three days, we almost fancy that the conscious superincumbent soil thrills and heaves beneath us with a sense of the importance of buried secrets. We recount wistfully the timbers and boards of cedar of a day when silver was in Jerusalem as stones, and cedars as sycamore trees for abundance; the cherubim carved out of olive wood and overlaid with gold; the wrought cornices and wainscots of cherubim and palm-trees and open flowers; the doors decorated in like manner and overlaid with fine gold beaten into the underlying tracery; the three rows of hewed stone; the brass-work of flowers, of lilies, lions, oxen, cherubim and palm-trees, knobs and pomegranates, the marble and ivory, the ceilings of cedar, and walls of vermillion. Nebuchadnezzar and his imitators in unholy demolition and robbery must have overlooked much in sacking Temple and palaces; the flames and Roman conquerors spared, because they could not destroy the wonderful stones or Herod’s building.

Day and scene are in unison with this train of thought. The alleys we have traversed since leaving David Street, twist in and about the Jewish quarter. The last twist brings the Wailing Place into view.

A blind wall lifts high above our heads the great stones we have learned to recognize as belonging to Phœnician and Jewish architecture—some twenty, some thirty feet long. They were built so “compact together” that but a few crevices give foothold to hyssop and other clinging plants; they are darkened by rain and drip with moisture which we fancy is unclean. Close against the base of the wall is ranged a row of figures—men, women and even children. Women, for the most part past middle age, wear bedrabbled skirts, and faded shawls drawn cowl-like over their heads. Nearly all hold tattered copies of the Hebrew Psalms and the babble of intoned reading is broken, to the attentive ear, by sobs.

We know what they are saying, and, withdrawn a decent space from the throng, open the “International Teachers’ Edition” of our “Palestine Baedeker,” and follow the service silently.

O, God! the heathen have come into Thine inheritance:
Thy holy Temple have they defiled:
They have laid Jerusalem on heaps.

We are become a scorn to our neighbors;
A scorn and derision to them that are round about us,
How long Lord, wilt Thou be angry forever?
Shall Thy jealousy burn like fire?

Pour out Thy wrath upon the heathen that have not known Thee,
And upon the kingdoms that have not called upon Thy name:

For they have devoured Jacob,
And laid waste his dwelling-place.
O, remember not against us former iniquities;

office, are conducting with him a responsive service quite irrespective of the readings going on about them. A learned friend in our little party translates the litany made familiar to him by many hearings:

For our temple that is destroyed,
Chants the leader. The response follows:
Here sit we down lonely and weep.
Then,

For our walls which are torn down,
Here sit we down lonely and weep!
For the glory that has vanished,
Here sit we down lonely and weep!
For the goodly stones that are dust,
Here sit we down lonely and weep!

A roughly-laid stone wall closes the area at one end; a door set in it is slightly ajar, and withdrawing still further from the mourning crowd, we push it back and step into a sort of court-yard where are several trees. Beneath a branchy olive a woman sits flat upon the damp earth, her forehead laid against the trunk of the tree. A soiled and ragged book is upon her knees; her hands are clasped below her chin, and tears roll slowly down her withered cheeks upon the worn pages. Her lips move soundlessly in prayer, or penitential Psalm. She does not notice our intrusion, but a young girl standing behind her and looking up through tears at the wall, starts nervously aside, turning her face away in timidity or distress. A baby is in her arms; both are wretchedly clad and look half-starved. The guide knows her by sight.

“She is but thirteen years old,” he tells us, as, aware that we are trespassers, we

the outcome of custom and superstition and unworthy of respect. Is it reasonable?—I go further—is it possible?—to believe that these people come here every Friday ready to shed tears of genuine distress over a story almost two thousand years old? It is all done for effect—pumped up to order. It nobody ever came to look at the show, and travelers never wrote up “the wailing place,” the exhibition would go out of fashion in less than five years.”

Dr. L. Zwinglius Sharpe is, of course, the speaker. He is robed in a mackintosh which owes something of its exceeding glossiness to the Scotch mist thickening in the valley. His wife’s gray cloak and hat have a conventual touch; her placid face might be that of a Dutch Madonna.

“We have seen nothing finer, more elevating than this, my love,” she sighs blissfully. “Everything harmonizes so consistently! The hoary old walls, the bright colors of the women’s shawls toned down by the wet—the solemn sound of the chanting—and oh, Doctor dear! will you look at the delicious dull olive of those old velvet coats? And that woman, over there sitting on the stones—the one in white, who is locking this way—doesn’t she remind you of ‘By the rivers of Babylon we sat down?’”

From the rising ground about a stone’s cast from the “wailing place,” we glance back. The crowd is thinning, and we cannot avoid seeing that some of those who mourned most volubly are most brisk or indifferent by the time they reach us. There is no difference in the aspect of those who were but now apparently plunged into the depths of hopeless sorrow and others of the race who are buying and selling at the stalls in the Jewish quarter.

While we say it, the grandmother and the child-wife we surprised at their devotions, come slowly up the narrow way. The baby has fallen asleep upon the mother’s shoulder. The load is heavy for the little creature, and stopping to get her breath halt way up the hill, she turns for a last look at the grim wall below. Tears well afresh into her eyes, and again she averts her face, as if ashamed of the weakness.

The old woman has drawn her dingy shawl over her head; trudging weakly onward, she keeps her regards fixed upon the ground; the sadness of a long-trusted desire is in the drooping lines of the wrinkled face. She is not artistically “harmonious,” but we believe her to be the type of a class. Her figure and visage come between us and the page upon which we read, when we shed our damp wraps and sat down before a glowing fire in our hotel-quarters:

The Lord was as our enemy:
He hath swallowed up Israel:
He hath swallowed up all her palaces:
He hath destroyed his stronghold,
And hath increased in the daughter of Judah, mourning and lamentation.

MARION HARLAND.

“THE WAILING PLACE,” IN JERUSALEM.

(Photographed by Marion Harland for “The Christian Herald.”)

Let Thy tender mercies speedily prevent us:
For we are brought very low!

“Very low!” we interrupt ourselves to comment.

Among the dwellers in fallen Jerusalem, they are the most degraded, and to human eye, the most hopeless. The Psalm they chant might have been penned yesterday, so graphic is the portrayal of their present estate. For eighteen centuries the cry now upon their lips has been sobbed to heaven. Well may they iterate:

Wilt thou be angry forever?

As our ears accustom themselves to the intoned clamor, we discover that three or four men stationed beyond one whose long robe and furred cap proclaim his priestly withdraw, pulling the gate shut after us. “That is her grandmother, and young as she is, the child is hers. Her husband left her before the baby was born. They are very poor and almost friendless.”

“Are they Jews?”

“Of course; but not natives of Jerusalem. From Poland, I think.”

Nothing in the strange scenes of the hour will linger more distinctly in our minds than this little episode. Compared with the unfeigned grief of the aged exile bemoaning her nation’s fate in the one retired spot from which she could gaze upon the sacred stones, the loud lamentings of the line ranged against the wall, seem artificial and ostentatious.

THE DURATION OF LIFE.

FOR ages, and until within a few years, human life grew shorter and shorter. The race started out with a generous endowment of years. The time was when, according to Bible accounts, people five hundred years old were not a curiosity. I suppose that parents mourned over the untimely departure of their children, dying three hundred years old. Methuselah, celebrated in all nurseries and Sunday Schools and in common parlance as the oldest man who had ever lived, was not the oldest. Nahor, as mentioned in Genesis, was seventy years older. Methuselah was only 600 years, but Nahor was 1,039 years old. Yet life, chiefly through the sins of the ages, got smaller and smaller, until in the time of Pliny there were only forty persons 135 years old. Shorter and shorter became the average of human life until the cradle and the grave were so near together that hardly had the race got out of the one than it fell into the other. But the tide has turned, and, thanks to God and thanks to medical science, the average of human life is enlarged. The human race has so much more to do than the brute creation, and yet many styles of brute outline the man. An elephant has lived 300 years and a whale 400. A tortoise in the archbishop's palace at Lambeth lived 120 years. Why such creatures should outlive the human race I cannot understand. But diseases are being driven back and the laws of health are being more thoroughly understood, and I think many men and women who see the dawn of the twentieth century will see the dawn of the twenty-first century. The time is going to come when it will be no rarity to see nonagenarian poets, philanthropists and historians. When I see such men working clear on, almost across the century, I conclude that the aged ought to change their theory about the best time to quit. Considering the increased prolongation of human life and the additional means for protecting it, men and women ought not to put off their armor as soon as did our immediate ancestors. In the time of our fathers and grandfathers, doctors wandered around with a lancet and if a man had a fever, bled him, and if he had a cold, bled him, and if he had fits, bled him, and if the disease had not developed into anything special, bled him—when the tact all along has been that most men want more blood instead of less blood. And I am glad to know that except for here and there when used for a child's swollen gum or a boil, the lancet is a banished instrument. But now the medical science is full armed against all ailments and even cancers and consumptions and hydrophobias are having their last cruel round with the human race. My advice to all is lay out your plans for a prolonged lifetime, while you are particular to be prepared to go any time the Lord may call. Some of the best work the world has ever seen was done after the time when most people think they must quit. Izaak Walton wrote some of his best biographies after he was 85. Christopher Wren kept on with architecture until he was 86. Cato learned the Greek language when he was 80. Hobbes, at 87 years of age, translated "Iliad." Fontenelle wrote vigorously at 69 years. Monaldesco penned the history of his times at 115 years of age. But I am glad for the human race that life is being prolonged. Take off of it the years we are getting ready to work and the years we are getting ready to die and instead of life being, as in the time of the Psalmist, a handbreadth, it got down to a finger breadth. Beside the additional opportunity that is allowed for work by this prolonged longevity there is an increased opportunity for enjoyment. It is far more interesting to live now than in former ages. What the old patriarchs did with four or five hundred years on their hands I know not. There was so little to see, life must have become awful monotonous. There were no railroads to take them to any other place. They had no better light than a dull candle. Their next neighbors had lived there as long as from the time of the discovery of America until now. But in our day there is so much to see and hear as well as so much to do, that life is filled with novelties and entertainments, and while I would not ask for an earthly residence as long as that of Nahor or the shorter lived Methuselah, I would risk, if I had the opportunity, a couple of centuries. But the healthiest mood and the most Christian mood is to be ready to stay or go, as the Lord decrees it and there is nothing that I know of that can put one and keep one in such a state of composure and placidity as the Christian religion. We want to wait for sailing orders if to move to some work in this world, cheerfully to go at it, and if to move to another world, to embark with glowing expectation of a safe arrival in a port where we shall be greeted by those who have gone before and where we shall wait for those who come later.

BLOSSOMS AND CHILDHOOD.

DO not let our young people begin the world cowed down. If a tree does nothing but blossom it does gloriously. It is not a waste of beauty if, in a tree's history of a year, it get no further than the first chapter of blossoms. A blossom is a complete flower and who dare say that a complete flower is a failure? No one but the Omnipotent could contrive the architecture of a blossom or hang its upholstery of color or compound its aroma. If the tree does its work up to the end of blossom week, and does nothing more for a year, it has done well. For it has laid out a hanging garden, it has opened a picture gallery, it has written a paradise regained, it has swung the censor of worship before the throne of God, it has thrilled the souls of all intelligent spectators. Correct the botanical error that because many blossoms do not culminate in fruit, they are, therefore, not worth having, and you correct at the same time the human error which implies that those who die young are wasted and might almost as well never have been at all. A cruel heresy it is. They who die in a week or a month or a year or a few years as certainly fulfil their mission as do septuagenarians and octogenarians. The babe fulfilled its mission of duty, its mission of love, its mission of innocence, its mission of life, its mission of making heaven attractive by its going there, its mission of developing the parental heart; and the six missions I mention are only a part of what a child accomplishes, though it live only a week or a month or a year.

Blossoms that never become fruit are not failures. Children early dead are not failures. Thank God for the lessons of blossom time. What a rich Lord is our Lord that he can afford for so short a time such elaborate wardrobe for the orchards. If they were to have the robes of hearts, these embroideries of all colors, these crowns of arborescence, these draperies spun out of sunshine and shower, for all the year, it would not seem so lavish; but they are only for blossom week. How numerous and deep must be the King's vats from which he dips these colors—the crimson, the pink, the green, the blue, the gold, the purple, and all this garniture to scatter after six or seven rising or setting suns. As though the Louvre and Luxembourg of Paris and the picture galleries of Dresden and of Venice and of the Vatican were, after a week of exhibition, thrown into the sea. Not in wastefulness, but because they could be fully replaced and could be restored. And how this expenditure of color and gracefulness for only one week magnifies the resources of the great God. And this God is ours. Blessed be his glorious name. If this God so clothes the grass of the field and the trees for blossom week, will he not take care of us, his children immortal? Will he not do as much for a soul as for a leaf of a cherry tree? And then from the glories of the blossoms take some hint of what heaven must be.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Margaret Rutherford, St. Louis, Mo. Can you tell me anything about Prof. Fall's prophecy of a tidal wave which he says will sweep over New York City? His predictions regarding the recent earthquakes in Greece and Constantinople (according to a London account) were verified, one within a day of the time specified and the other within an hour.

He made no such prediction; inquiry has shown that the story originated with some sensational correspondent.

Old Farmer, Harbeson, Del. I take a great interest in Mr. Moody's Institute. Please state in "The Mail-Bag" the cost and the time required to train a Christian worker. I would like to pay the cost of a personal worker in my stead.

The cost of training a Christian worker in the Moody Bible Institute is $100 a year. The time required is two years—making the total cost $200.

G. W. Hughes, Everett, Pa. How is Easter reckoned? Is it possible to tell otherwise than by the almanac on what date it will fall?

It is dated from the Spring Equinox which is on March 21st. Easter Sunday is the Sunday after the next full moon. It follows the Passover reckoning which was regulated by the lunar months.

A. B. K., Clintonville. Is it right to close an ice cream supper held in a church for the benefit of the Y. P. S. C. E. with a cake-walk, and for members of the same to take part, each paying five cents per chance?

We have repeatedly replied to such inquiries by stating that entertainments of this character had better be held elsewhere than in the Lord's house, which should be reserved for praise and worship exclusively.

Old Subscriber, New Mexico. 1. Is "The Royal Road," the last continued story in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in booklet form, and where can it be obtained? 2. Are we to hear anything from Dr. Talmage this summer through the columns of your paper?

1. Yes; we understand it will soon be published in book form. 2. Certainly; his sermons appear as usual, and his letters from abroad will be found intensely interesting and valuable.

D. L. C., Verdon, S. Dak. 1. I note in "The Mail-Bag" some discussion about Christians having a badge to distinguish them from the rest of the world. Christians themselves should be the badge of Jesus Christ. If Christians cannot reflect the likeness of Christ in their hearts so that the world at a glance may see and know that they are not of the world, but are the children of God, of what advantage would such a badge be? Instead of being a benefit to the world, it would be a grievous wrong, and more especially to the cause of Christ. Where the world cannot see the likeness of Christ reflected in every act, thought or deed of the persons that profess to represent him, it turns away with a sneer. 2. Is there any missionary work being carried on at present in Old Mexico, and if so to what extent and by what denominations?

1. The badge proposition is now under consideration. 2. Yes, by the American Baptist Society; the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions; the M. E. Church South, and M. E. Church North, and several other organizations.

D. G. Selma, Cal. 1. Does the warning to the watchman (Ezekiel 33:8, 9), imply that those who do not warn the wicked will themselves be lost? 2. Is the passage Ephesians 5:4, a warning that a joke is wicked?

1. Ezekiel refers to a man charged with a special duty, such as a prophet sent with a message. It would apply to a preacher or a pastor or a Sunday School teacher now. It is a warning against unfaithfulness. In a measure it also applies to every Christian. It does not imply that the negligent pastor will lose his own soul. If he has really been converted and yet does not do his duty in his office, he would belong to the category to which Paul refers. (1 Cor. 3:15). 2. The warning is against a flippant, frivolous manner especially in dealing with sacred things. There is no wickedness in a cheerful, merry disposition. Bright, happy Christians do more good than the gloomy morose ones.

A. Crossley, Bayside, L.I. 1. Can you tell me where I can get particulars relating to the authorship and the circumstances in connection with the writing of that beautiful hymn, "I will sing you a song of that beautiful land, the far-away home of the soul"? 2. What is the latest work on Hymnology, and where can it be procured?

1. The author of the words is Mrs. Ellen M. H. Gates; the composer of the music is Philip Phillips, the famous Gospel singer. We know nothing of the circumstances. 2. John Julian's Hymnology is probably the most suitable for your purpose. It can be had of Scribners, New York.

Victoria Dodd, Denison, Ia. How should Sunday be spent by those who profess to be Christian people?

They should obey the Divine command to refrain from all labor, and secular things, and devote the day to the service of the Almighty and to physical rest and recuperation. To spend the whole or even part of the day in the reading of newspapers or secular literature is a violation of the spirit of the injunction. Attendance at the house of worship and a hearty compliance with the religious ordinances instituted by the church, are among the privileges that should never be neglected. These are among the "means of grace."

Abiam Jones, Hazel Patch, Ky. 1. What are the post office addresses of the headquarters of the three organizations of Christian young people? 2. Which would you recommend in a small community?

1. The address of the Christian Endeavor Headquarters is 646 Washington St., Boston, Mass.; of the Baptist Young People's Union 122 Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.; of the Epworth League, 57 Washington St., Chicago, Ill. 2. In a small community where there are probably young people of different denominations you need an organization in which all can unite and would find the Christian Endeavor the one best adapted to the need. The other two are respectively for Baptists and Methodists.

W. F. Price, Langdale, Ala. 1. How did the heathen King Nebuchadnezzar come to use such an expression about the being he saw walking in the furnace as that he was like the Son of God? 2. Is there any Christian Church in existence the members of which are all Jews? 3. Why was the late Rev. C. H. Spurgeon described as Pastor or Spurgeon? Was he not an ordained minister?

1. He probably meant a supernatural being. The ancients believed in there being families of the gods as is shown in the mythologies. In a later verse (Daniel 3:28), he speaks of the being he saw as an angel. 2. There are several churches composed of converted Jews. The Hebrew Christian Church, 17 St. Mark's Place, New York, is one. 3. Mr. Spurgeon was never ordained, but it was customary to address him by the ministerial title of "Reverend" until he expressed his dislike of it. He did not wish, however, to ignore his profession as a minister and expressed a preference for the title of "Pastor" as more precisely indicating the character of his ministerial functions.

G. C. Holt, Burling Creek, Va. 1. I have in my possession a book entitled, "The King of Glory," in the beginning of which the author gives a sketch of the life of the Virgin Mary. All her marriageable relations were advised to appear at the temple and bring their rods and when they presented their rods to the High Priest, a white dove flew out of Joseph's rod and lit on his shoulder as an emblem of his purity, and he at once went home and made arrangements for the marriage with Mary. Please tell me through "The Mail-Bag" if there is any reliability about it. 2. Also tell me whether there is such a branch in the United States Treasury as a "Conscience Fund," and to what purpose the money is appropriated.

1. The story to which you refer is one of the many legends or traditions with which monkish imaginations have surrounded the early life of the Saviour on earth. Beyond the simple narrative given in the Gospels, nothing is accepted as authentic, although the Roman Church has adopted many of the legends as part of its teachings. 2. Yes, there is a "Conscience Fund," which grew out of the fact that many persons who at different times had defrauded the government in evading revenue tax, etc., afterwards regretted their act and forwarded the money anonymously to Washington. The fund, which is not very large, is applied toward defraying the expenses of the government, just as would have been the case had the money been paid regularly in the first instance.

M. G. Johnson, Elmview, N. C. This has already been repeatedly answered in "The Mail-Bag." I. Glanville, Chicago, Ill. The President pays his own physician, of course. His salary is supposed to cover all requirements.—A. L. Howell, Mich. The story of "Zerola" is a historical narrative based largely on events occurring in the time with which it deals and designed to illustrate the life and manners of the people of that period.—Subscriber, Mr. Muller's address is Bristol, England.—Lux, N. Y. City, writes: "The present population of Melbourne, Australia, is nearly if not quite 600,000."—S. R. B. No.—E. A. Eggers, New York. Write to Dr. Dowling, 118 East 45th street, New York City.—W. J. Smith, Townsend Centre, Ont. No. If such a transfer were made within a certain period, defined by law, it would be declared invalid.—Frank J. Robertson, Wilber, Neb. Address him care of Eglow & Main, music publishers, Ninth street, New York.—G. W. Gray, Adel, Ia. We cannot undertake what you propose at the present time, but think the idea an excellent one. Why not begin your society on a small scale locally?

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

CHINA'S GRASP ON KOREA.

KOREA'S revolt has unexpectedly involved difficulties far beyond her own borders. China and Japan have both interfered with military forces, and England and Russia stand in the background watching the struggle for supremacy and encouraging the rival powers. That the revolt is a much more serious matter than the Korean government is willing to admit seems certain. The discontent of the people is widespread and the government being weak is tottering to its fall. Japan has many and important interests in Korea. Five thousand of her merchants are permanent residents in the country and every year many more go there to make collections, advance money to Korean farmers on the security of their crops, take orders for merchandise and transact other business. Whatever affects the peace and order of Korea must be severely felt in Japan; it was therefore natural that she should send an armed force to Korea when the outbreak occurred. But China has an old claim on the suzerainty of Korea, and considers herself charged with responsibility for the maintenance of order there. She therefore sent a large force into the country, and professing to be perfectly able to restore tranquility, requests Japan to withdraw. The Japanese refuse to comply, doubting China's ability to perform what she has undertaken, and doubting still more the benefit to Korea of China's supremacy. A fight between the two powers appears to be imminent. The gravity of the situation is increased by the fact that Japan is supported in her claims by Russia, who has long desired to control the peninsula, or, in any case, to obtain a port there which she may use as a naval station, which, unlike her present most southern port on the Pacific, shall be open all the year round. By helping Japan to enforce her claims on Korea in defiance of China, Russia will create an obligation which Japan will have to recognize, and will be paid, if she succeeds, by the cession that Russia has so long coveted, and which she has long been intriguing to gain. England, aware of Russia's design, is encouraging China to insist on her antiquated claims and maintain her position in Korea. Thus the rising of the Korean people has set two Asiatic and two European powers in antagonism, and has aroused the latent antagonism between them to a white heat. With nations, as with individuals, the Bible dictum holds true that none of us liveth to himself. (Rom. 14: 7.)

Peril in Caves.

Timely advice to travelers is given by M. Martel, the eminent French explorer of caves. He says that it is dangerous to penetrate during the summer months into these subterranean regions because they are liable at any time to suddenly become reservoirs of water. The melting snows enter them by a thousand fissures and as there is usually only one exit and that too small to allow the water to pass out as quickly as it enters, the caverns may be filled with water in a short time. The explorer, if he is on the lower levels, is liable in such a case to be drowned, and if he is on the higher levels, he may find his escape cut off by a large body of water lying between him and the entrance to the cavern, in which case he may die of starvation. He therefore advises travelers to avoid the exploration of these subterranean regions during the period of danger. Similar advice might well be given to young men who have a craving to go into those dark places in great cities where vice and immorality hold revel. Curiosity is often the motive which prompts the visit, but it has often happened that escape has been cut off and the explorer pays the penalty of the loss of his soul, which is a greater disaster than the loss of his life. (Prov. 4: 14, 15.)

A Charm that Failed.

A traveler in New Mexico reports the death of an Indian, who was the victim of his implicit faith in the assurances of the priests of his tribe. The Indian had attended the annual snake dance and in common with others had been promised, as a reward for his zealous dancing, immunity from death by snake-bite for exactly one year. A few weeks later he acted as guide for a party of hunters to which the traveler belonged. On their journey they saw a rattlesnake and were about to kill it, when the Indian interposed. He said that the death of the snake would break the charm over him and to show the potency of the charm, he deliberately trod with his moccasined feet on the snake. In an instant the snake had planted its venom in the fleshy part of his leg. The Indian was surprised, but insisted that no harm would come to him from the bite. The journey was resumed, property. The case was carried from one court to another with varying results, but has now been decided in favor of the lawyers by the Court of last resort. The decision was based on the ground that the penalty of the murderer's crime was death, and the law had no power to add to the penalty the deprivation of property. Apart from the crime the property was legally his, and the crime did not prevent it passing to him. He therefore had the power to transfer it. Thus the murderer did really secure the property by his horrible deed, but, as often happens with criminals, it was of no benefit to him. Our sense of justice demands that it should never benefit him. Yet the murder of our Lord, the most appalling crime in the world's history, brought the greatest boon to the human race, and by his own order, its benefits were offered first to the men who had been most prominent in committing it. (Luke 24: 47.)

A Life-Saver Rewarded.

One of the smallest rewards for saving life so far recorded is quoted by a Connecticut newspaper. It says that a man who lives near Wallingford, while walking along a road which skirts the edge of a deep pool, missed his footing and fell. He was unable to recover himself as the bank was slippery, and he rolled into the pool. He might have scrambled out, but unfortunately his foot became entangled in the weeds at the side, and he was held fast. He clung to the trailing branch of a tree that was just within his reach and shouted lustily for help. It was begun to fall and there are indications that it may continue for some days. The people are now beginning to hope that for the first time in five years some of the food products can yet be raised this season. The suffering among the lower classes on account of the prolonged drought has been intense, and there have been many deaths from actual starvation in remote localities where assistance did not reach them. The range has been entirely depleted of cattle and all other live stock. As there has been no rain, the earth has yielded no increase, although the people have plowed and sowed every year. It is so in the spiritual world. The lives of men and churches are barren of fruit, no matter what advantages of wealth and energy they may have, unless the grace of God is imparted. (1 Cor. 3: 6.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Viceroy of China, Li Hung Chang, has invited Dr. Mackay, a physician of the London Missionary Society, to attend him personally when he is ill.

The New Mission House of the Home and Foreign Mission Board of the Presbyterian Church to be erected in Fifth Avenue, New York, will be twelve and a half stories high, occupy an area of 92 by 190 feet, and will cost about $750,000.

A Recent Letter from Japan says that at the close of last year of the 377 churches in Japan, 78 are wholly, and 299 are partially self-supporting. The additions during the year number 3,636. The present membership is 57,534. The largest part of these are men.

At Lake Keuka, N. Y., where an increasing number of visitors go every year, a series of Bible conferences will be held, commencing August 2, under the charge of Rev. A. C. Dixon, D. D., Pastor of the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn. These meetings, which are known as "The Assembly," were very profitable last year, and promise to be still more so this year. Among the speakers will be Rev. H. L. Wayland; the Hon. E. B. Fairchild, of Michigan, who was several years our Consul at Lyons, France; Rev. Cornelius Woelflin; Dr. Tunham, of Utica; Dr. Edmund M. Mills, of Elmira; Col. Copeland; Rev. Arthur Copeland, and Rev. A. J. Smith, of New York.

Mr. Henry Varley has been holding very remarkable meetings at Plymouth, England. At the evening meetings numbers have been brought to decision for Christ. In the after-meeting on a recent Sunday between 60 and 70 confessed Christ.

The Lutherans of the General Synod and of the Ohio Synod were represented in an important conference at Springfield, O., recently. The object of the conference was to arrange a basis of union between the two Synods, which are the Liberal and Conservative branches of the church.

W. A. Sunday, who is Well Known in Christian Association work, has resigned his position in the Chicago Y. M. C. A. and will assist Dr. Chapin in his work, going in advance of him to perfect the organization and then having in charge the personal workers, who will be trained to do the most efficient work in and out of the meetings.

The Death of the Eminent German Pastor of St. Louis, Dr. Adelbert Van der Lippe, is announced. He was sixty-seven years of age, and had been thirty-four years in the ministry. During the past four years he has been the Professor of Theology in the German Theological School at St. Louis, but it is by his twenty-seven years of successful labor at St. Louis that he will be best remembered.

A Noted Bible Distributor Dr. [Name] lately in New Hampshire. For forty-five years he made it the chief business of his life to disseminate the Scriptures. During that time no fewer than 120,000 copies of the Scriptures were given out by him; and although he was seventy-six years of age when he died, he canvassed in the two years preceding his death 230 towns, and visited over 80,000 families.

Dr. W. H. Roberts, the Stated Clerk of the Presbyterian Assembly, publishes the complete record of additions, on confession of faith, to the Presbyterian Church, showing that the total is 74,701, instead of 71,479, as was previously reported. The largest additions were, in Pennsylvania.

but in a short time the Indian was too ill to proceed. The party had no remedies with them and as nothing could be done to save him, he died before night. He must have bitterly regretted placing so much faith in the assurances of his priests. There is reason to fear that still more acute regret will be experienced by some who are basing their hopes of eternal life on equally unwarranted promises. It is not by absolution, nor baptism, nor confirmation that safety comes, but in a living faith in Christ as the Saviour of the sinner. (Gal. 5: 6.)

A Criminal's Rights.

The Supreme Court of Nebraska has just decided a case which has been in litigation in various forms for over six years. It appears that in 1887 a man in that State murdered his step-daughter in order that he might obtain a valuable piece of property which he had persuaded her to bequeath to him by will. He was placed on trial for the crime and was convicted. As there seemed to be a possibility of his sentence being commuted through political influence, the people of his town who knew the circumstances and were deeply incensed against the man, took him out of the jail and lynched him. He had previously deeded the property he had acquired by his crime to the lawyers who defended him at his trial; but when they attempted to take possession, they were opposed by some relatives of the dead girl. Their plea was that her father could not profit by his crime, and therefore had no power to dispose of her a lonely place, and there was no response. The man grew terrified, for the branch, which alone kept him from sinking, was small and looked as if it was separating from the limb. He was beginning to think he would surely be drowned, when he heard to his great joy a distant answer to his shouts. He called again and in a few minutes a stranger appeared at the edge of the pool and at some risk to himself rescued the half-drowned man, and assisted him to reach his home. On the way, the man thanked his rescuer warmly for saving his life, and when he arrived at his home asked him to accept a small reward. The stranger, who seemed to be poor, made no objection, and the man after turning over some loose coins gave him a dime. He would probably have been offended if he had heard some one saying that his life was not worth more than ten cents to the world. Yet he gave ground for such an inference when he paid that sum to the man who had saved it. Ministers and Christian workers, whose efforts are crippled for the lack of funds, are often tempted to ask whether the gifts they receive from those whose souls Christ has saved, really represent the value at which the givers estimate the value of those souls. THE VOICE IN THE GARDEN.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Pastor

A. J. Gordon, D.D. Text: Solomon's Song 8: 13, 14: "Thou that dwellest in the gardens the companions hear thy voice; cause me to hear it. Make haste my beloved and be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of spices."

I HAVE no doubt that the song of Solomon is a rich poetic celebration of the excellency and beauty of our Immanuel. The name which was put upon our Lord at the Jordan: "This is my Beloved Son," is the name which everywhere abounds in this Oriental poem. The Bride—the Church of Christ—is pouring out perpetual tributes of affection upon him: "My Beloved is mine and I am his." Just as Jesus said a thousand years later when speaking of his Church, "All mine are thine, and thine are mine." "It is the voice of my Beloved that knocketh, saying open to me." How perfect an echo of what we hear in the Revelation: "Beloved I stand at the door and knock, if any man will open unto me I will come in." My Beloved spoke unto me and said, "Rise up my fair one and come away." Oh, how constantly since his departure to the Father has Christ been saying this. "Wherefore he saith, awake thou that sleepest and arise from the dead and Christ shall give thee light." The rich communion between Christ and his Church—the holy interchange of love and service, where can we find it so glowingly exhibited as in this divine poem of the Bride and the Bridegroom?

"Thou that dwellest in the gardens; the companions hear thy voice." Is it not literally true of Christ that he dwelleth in the gardens?

The Garden of Temptation.

1. First we meet him in the garden of temptation. When Jesus had finished his last discourse and prayer we are told that he "went forth with his disciples over the brook Kedron where was a garden," and came "unto a place called Gethsemane." Then we are told that "he prayed and was in such agony that he sweat as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." Now, "Gethsemane" means an "olive press." All summer long the olive-fruit is ripening on the tree, the grape-cluster on the vine. Then in the autumn, they are cast into the press that the oil and wine may be forced out. Oh, good Samaritan! who wilt pour oil and wine into the wounds of our suffering race, thou hast come to the wine-press now. The weight of the world's iniquity is on thy heart, and as its awful pressure weighs thee down, thou dost bleed at every pore. Where are thy disciples now, of whom thou didst say a little while ago: "Ye are they that have continued with me in my temptations?" Yonder are Peter and James and John, sleeping in the midst of their Master's agony, while he cries out, "I have trodden alone, and of the people there was none with me." The wine-press! "What is this pressure on the heart that forces blood from every pore? It is the struggle and shrinking of the human will. The inward crucifixion must precede the outward crucifixion. The hardest struggle is not under the surgeon's knife, but in bringing the will to submit to the operation.

And now is the hour and the power of darkness. As he entered into the world he said: "Lo, I come, I delight to do thy will O, God!" But now the dread of pain has seized him; now a shrinking and reluctant human nature faints; now the sensitive body draws back from the rude detilement that is about to be put upon it by wicked hands, and now the delicate nerves quiver before the sound of the hammer and the tearing of the heavy nails through the flesh, and he prays that it be possible the cup may pass from him. "Thou that dwellest in the garden, thy companions hear thy voice." And what did you hear, oh, Simon, Son of Jonas, when you were in the garden with your Master? Alas!

says Peter. I heard him say, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death: tarry ye here and watch." And I remember how he went forward a little way and then fell down as though crushed by a burden that was too heavy for him. And there he lay for nearly an hour on his face. I kept watch for some time, but being very tired I finally fell asleep. I remember very distinctly, however, and how he repeated it over and over again: "Father if it be possible let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not my will, but thine be done." But, alas! I was very tired and heavy with sorrow. I never can forgive myself for it, that even while he was praying I fell asleep; and I remember how he came and touched me, not roughly, but gently, and softly said, "Simon sleepest thou, could'st thou not watch with me one hour?" And then he added: "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation. The spirit truly is willing, but the flesh is weak." And then he went away again and knelt down and prayed once more. Oh, sorrowful night, would that it were possible for me to live it over again, how differently I should do. But the opportunity is gone forever.

John who leaned on his bosom at the Supper, you were one of those whom he took with him into his garden, what did you hear him say? Alas, I, too, slept! I heard his prayer and when it seemed as though he would die under his weight of agony, I saw an angel come and strengthen him, but I was so oppressed with sorrow that I fell asleep. And the thing which now smites me to the heart as I remember it, is to think how patient and tender he was with us. He did not chide us, but just when he needed our watchful care so much he came to us and said, "Sleep on now and take your rest; behold the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners." "Thy companions hear thy voice, cause me to hear it!" Christ is still in Gethsemane; still in the person of his body which is his Church, is he "exceeding sorrowful even with death," because of the sins of the world; else what means the injunction that we are "to fill up that which is behind: for his body's sake which is the Church?" And what is his command to us? "What I say unto one I say unto all: Watch." And again speaking by the Holy Ghost he says, "Ye are not of the night nor of the darkness. Therefore, let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch and be sober." Oh, you whose eyes are heavy with sleep—soothed into guilty slumber by your ease and prosperity so that you no longer have any fellowship with the suffering of Christ. Behold what is passing! Souls are perishing in sin by the hundreds every day and you reposing in cushioned ease and luxury not even dreaming that you have any responsibility for their loss. And may it be that the crisis is already past; that Jesus has given you up and said, "Sleep on now and take your rest." Never did that sacred opportunity to watch with Christ return to his disciples. Lost then, it was lost forever. And it now when Jesus is still beholding the travail of his soul in the redemption of the world, if you fail to be with him watching for souls as they that must give account, remember that the opportunity will never return. "Watch therefore," says your Lord, lest coming suddenly, he may find you sleeping.

II. Again we meet Jesus in the garden of his burial. John says, "Now in the place where he was crucified there was a garden, and in the garden a new tomb wherein was never man laid. There they laid Jesus, for the sepulchre was nigh at hand."

And now he sleeps there, wrapped in the winding sheet of burial—angels keeping guard about the tomb. His companions have come early to his sepulchre. Shall they ever hear his voice again? Oh for one touch of that gracious hand! Oh for one greeting from those holy lips. But alas! the sepulchre is empty! and there stands Mary Magdalene before its entrance, weeping. But hark! "Thou that dwellest in the gardens, thy companions hear thy voice." "Jesus saith unto her, Woman, why weepest thou?" Oh mother, who hast followed thine only son to the grave, and there buried all thy dearest hopes! Oh wife, widowed now who wast once unspeakably happy;—the strong staff and the beautiful rod on which thou didst once lean, broken!"

"Why Weepest Thou?"

"The Lord is risen and become the first fruits of them that slept." And only a little while, and he will come and open the grave of your beloved as he opened his own. Never shall I forget a scene which I witnessed in yonder cemetery. There was one solitary mourner bearing an only child to burial. I stood by his side and offered the last prayer, and then he shut the lid of the casket and locked it, and putting the key into his pocket turned away. Instantly I seemed to hear from the garden of God where Jesus is, the words "Why weepest thou?" "Fear not for I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold I am alive forevermore, and have the keys of death and the grave." That father could turn the key that shut in his child, but not the key that opened the door back to life. But Jesus has the key that openeth, and yet how slow of heart to believe! "Mary, supposing him to be the gardener, saith unto him: Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him and I will take him away. Jesus saith unto her, Mary!" The good Shepherd is calling his sheep by their names.

She turned herself and saith unto him, Rabboni! which is to say Master. Jesus said, "touch me not for I am not yet ascended to my Father."

"Touch Me Not."

"Touch me not." Henceforth we are to know Christ no longer after the flesh. Not that he is any more remote from us than ever. He can still be "touched with the feeling of our infirmities." But now it is by faith and not by feeling. Now it is by our sins and sorrows that find healing in his wounds that we are to know him. "I ascend to my Father and to your Father, to my God and to your God." No longer does he say as he said in the garden, "My Father, let the cup pass from me." No longer does he say as on the cross, "My God why hast thou forsaken me?" Now he has reconciled us with God, and put away all enmity. He has brought us into the same place in the Father's heart which he holds himself. So that now he can say, "My God and your God. My Father and your Father." Cause me to hear this thy voice, oh beloved, and to know that now as "through him we both have access to the Father." And now while Mary Magdalene and that other Mary ran to bring the disciples word, behold, Jesus meets them, saying, "All hail." Once more his companions hear his voice, "And they came and held him by the feet and worshipped him." "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, of good that publisheth salvation." They held him by the feet and in those wounds they clasped the token and pledges of their forgiveness.

Look to the Wounds of Christ, oh sinner; look to the wounds of Christ for the evidence that your sins are put away. No wounds in your conscience will suffice; no wounds of deep and piercing penitence in your heart will do. "He was wounded for our transgressions—he was bruised for our iniquities." And now as he comes forth from the grave with the scars of his crucifixion upon him, his companions hear his voice, saying unto them "Peace," and when he had so said he showed them his hands and his side, and even unto this day those wounds in Jesus' glorified body are a surer token of our forgiveness than all the feeling or spiritual evidences that we can experience in a life time.

III. Once more we find our Lord in the garden of glory. Just before he yielded up his spirit on the cross he said to the dying thief, "This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." Now paradise means a garden and into that place of eternal beauty the Lord has entered, and though it is "a land that is very far off," we still hear the voice of the Lord walking in the garden, Hear Jesus speaking from

His Ascended Glory:

"To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life that is in the midst of the paradise of God." That eternal deathless life from which Adam was debarred by sin, Christ by his death has again made accessible. The flaming sword which guarded it from man's approach has been bathed in the blood of Immanuel and now it can no longer shut us out of paradise. "Blessed," says our glorified Lord, "Blessed are they that wash their robes that they may have right to the tree of life." "Right!" Oh wondrous transformation! The sword of justice has actually been turned to our defence, so that instead of driving us from the tree of life it guards our approach thereto. "Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, Oh Immanuel, and in thy majesty ride forth prosperously, saying unto a world dead in trespasses and sins—"I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." "I will meet thee again at Philippi," said the ghost of Julius Cæsar to Brutus. "I will meet thee again at Calvary!" said the Prince of life to Satan when he had brought death to our first parents in Eden and he has met him; and when on the cross he yielded up his spirit, he inflicted a mortal wound on "him that hath the power of death even the devil." And when he had paid the penalty of our transgressions, he said to justice who had been barring the way to life—"Put up thy sword into its place for I have found a ransom." And now in a paradise regained his companions hear his voice and the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne doth feed them and doth lead them unto living fountains of water. And what is he now saying in

That Garden Above?

—"Behold I come quickly." Oh that we may hear his voice and answer, "Even so, come Lord Jesus." "Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of spices." Is he the Bridegroom of the Church, and is it nothing to us that he be absent from us in the body though he be present in Spirit? The Lord himself has given us our true attitude, "Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn so long as the bridegroom is with them? But the days will come when the Bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." And this is our condition now. Christ rejected, the whole world living in the Wicked One; iniquity abounding and the love of many waxing cold. It is a time for fasting and not for feasting. There is a very beautiful piece of statuary which I have seen described, that of "The blind watcher." A young maiden has been betrothed; and her affianced has gone over the sea on a voyage. Each day at evening she goes down to the sea-side and looks out for some sign of his return. Her father who is opposed to her attachment chides her for her conduct and taunts her for her folly in thinking that he will ever come back for her; and being provoked by her constancy, in a fit of passion he one day strikes her in the face in such a way as to destroy her eyesight. But still she is there. And though she can see no longer, she yet goes out upon the beach to listen if she can catch some sound of his coming. Most true picture of the Church—of Christ! Blind, she may be as to the times and the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power. But she is not deaf to the voice of her Beloved. She hears the sound of his voice in the Paradise of God, saying: "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." "Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments." And if we really love him, instead of joining with a scoffing world in the cry, "Where is the sign of his coming?" We shall respond with all the ardor and intensity of our souls—"Make haste, my Beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of spices."

Hawaiians Greet Dr. Talmage.

A Letter from Honolulu, Telling of his Cordial Reception in that City.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received from a gentleman in Honolulu, the following interesting letter concerning Dr. Talmage's visit:

Rev. Dr. Talmage arrived here, accompanied by his son, on the steamship "Alameda," on Thursday, June 7th, at 5.30 a. m. Even at that early hour, the people came down to welcome him. Hardly had he stepped ashore when the Chamberlain of Queen Liliuokalani requested him to call upon her Majesty, and shortly afterward Chief Justice A. F. Judd headed a delegation requesting him to preach. The morning was spent in sight-seeing and in visiting the noted precipice of Pali, where some ninety-five years ago, King Kamehameha I. repulsed the armies of Oahu and drove a great host of over 50,000 warriors over the rocks to their death.

After lunch, in company with President Dole and the Chief Justice, Dr. Talmage was taken through the old palace of King Kalakaua and visited the other public buildings of the capital. He sat for a short time with the Provisional Council which was then in session. He also visited the old Hawaiia-hoa Church (the first stone church built here, some fifty years ago) the Kapiolani Park, the Kamehameha schools, etc. Dr. Talmage was surprised and pleased at what he saw and regarded with evident astonishment the extent of our beautiful city, and more particularly the Christian spirit he discovered among the people.

The news of his arrival having spread rapidly, he was asked to speak in some public place, as many residents of Honolulu wished to have the pleasure of hearing him and to this he readily consented. About the same time the Hawaiian Evangelical Association composed of all the native ministers of the Polynesian Islands, whose members were holding their quarterly meeting, conveyed a request through Chief Justice H. F. Judd, that Dr. Talmage should address them in the Congregational Church. It was, therefore, arranged that at 3 o'clock p. m., the Doctor should give an informal talk. The people flocked into the church until the aisles, doorways and even the steps were blocked.

The church was never more crowded, and this in spite of the fact that the announcement of the meeting could only be made by blackboard, there being no time to make proper publication. However, it would seem that the whole city knew of it. The occasion was a remarkably pleasant and agreeable one for all who went there. Half the audience was composed of dark-skinned natives, the remainder being Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, English and Americans. Such an audience probably no living preacher ever before faced. Yet they were not all strangers to Dr. Talmage, for his sermons have been published week after week in the Honolulu newspapers. He spoke for an hour in English and the Rev. S. L. Desha, of Hilo, interpreted in Hawaiian, for the benefit of the audience, which alternately laughed, and cried, and applauded. After the benediction, there was a public reception. The people were enthusiastic in their praise for his kindness and masterly eloquence. Dr. Talmage was invited to visit ex-Queen Liliuokalani, by Mr. J. O. Carter, who had been his fellow-passenger from San Francisco on the "Alameda."

The Doctor was genial and kind, and from the hour of his arrival here until that of his departure for Samoa, he did not seem to have a moment he could call his own. The unanimous sentiment in Honolulu was that the experience was a most pleasant and delightful one, and all would wish Dr. Talmage to come again, when we would make his stay as agreeable as possible.

UGANDA SYNAGOGUES.

A suggestion to missionaries comes from Mr. Fisher of the Church Missionary Society. He says that in Uganda where he is abiding, much good has been accomplished by what he calls the synagogue system. His station is at Mityana and he has a large circuit around it under his charge. At about twenty places from five to ten miles away he has secured a garden, or a hut, to which he sends a boy who can read. The boy reads the Bible on certain evenings to all who will come to hear, and he frequently has all the village as auditors.

IN TIME OF NEED.

WHEN all around the way
The shadows seem to lie,
When morning-beams delay,
And darkness lingers nigh—
Thy Face, thy Name, thy Word I plead,
O Christ, my Hope in time of need!

I cannot see the road;
The storm-winds round me sigh;
The floods have overflowed,
And waves are surging high;
But Thou my trembling prayer wilt heed,
O Christ, my Refuge in my need!

Let me not doubt thy love,
Thy pity, and thy power!
Thou who art throned above
Hast known Earth's shadow-hour.
Thou for my faith dost intercede,
O Christ, my Strength in time of need!

Nearer than cloud art Thou,
And closer than the thorn;
Shine through the darkness now,
O Light, more blest than morn!
O Shepherd kind, my footsteps lead,
Thou present Help in time of need!

Oh, be at rest, my heart!
What though the path be dim,
Nor life nor death can part
His needy ones from Him.
Shall he not prove, whate'er befall,
My Lord, my Rock, my All in All?

REST.

Lord, I am weary—very, very weary—
I am with care oppress.
And life appears so very, very dreary:
Canst thou not give me rest?
How hollow seem the words my friends have spoken,
How false the peace they gave!
I find the reeds on which I've leaned are broken—
My Lord, wilt thou not save?
If thou art near, oh, who can then oppress
No enemy I'd fear; [me]
If thou art by in times of care to bless me,
What can so sweetly cheer?
And when my tired eyes in death are closing,
O Jesus, let me rest
In perfect happiness and peace, reposing
Upon thy gentle breast.

THE COMING REGENERATION.

What the Scriptures Teach about the Characteristics of the Millennium.

BY REV. CHARLES K. IMBRIE, D.D.

DOUBTLESS, time will be needed, after the Lord comes to introduce the millennial reign, before his glory is completed. God's word declares so. Peter speaks, not merely of the Restitution, but of the "times" of the Restitution—a vast period. And the Apostle Paul testifies "He must reign till he has put all enemies under his feet, and that "the last enemy which shall be destroyed is Death." (1. Cor. 15: 25, 26.)

It would seem from this that during the Millennial reign which is, indeed, a far brighter and more blessed era, and immeasurably more glorious than the present; and as Isaiah declares, the longevity of God's elect shall be "as the days of a tree" (Isa. 65: 22), yet Satan is not completely overthrown until its close, and while other enemies are not destroyed Death must still continue. For, as Paul declares, Death is the last enemy to be destroyed. At the close comes Satan's final effort, his overthrow, the general judgment, the banishment of the wicked dead to hell, and last of all, Death and Hades are destroyed. And then the kingdom is seen in its final form of perennial blessedness—the Regeneration is completed.

What a contrast between the earth at its best estate now and the redeemed earth then! It is true, indeed, that even now, while the curse still hangs as a blight upon us, God's mercy does soften the curse. Like a bright star hung on the horizon, when clouds cover the sky, still giving token of the glories of the concealed heaven, so God's mercy-drops sweeten the bitter cup even of the present. But what will it be when the light fills all the heavens! Think of the households, for example, of the earth redeemed. Ye mothers of the present world, tried and anxious, think of them. There will be then no fear for that lovely circle around the mother's knee, for the inhabitants of that world shall never say, "I am sick;" no tear of evil passions springing up within those young hearts, for all temptation and sin will be gone; no doubt of their future character, for "all their children shall be taught of God:" no days of watching or nights of anxiety and weakness. All the earth filled with homes of holiness and peace. Oh, glorious day begin!

Think of the intercourse of the nations in that day. Even, now, indeed we have Christian civilization, and this has meliorated the condition and the intercourse of the world. But what a brotherhood will the holy nations of that day present! The wanderer from his own home will only exchange one home and welcome for another. From North to South, from East to West, all nations sing the same song of redeeming love. All bow in fealty to the same glorious King; all show the same fruits of the Spirit. Every appointment of government shall be in conformity with the righteous rule, to do honor to the King of all the earth and to bless all under its sway.

What God will do with this earth, regenerated, and with its saved race, we know not. One thing we know: He who will sit as King over all in human nature, our brother, is appointed of the Father, head over all things—the head of creation. God's word reveals no more. Only let us be sure that a world redeemed by the blood of God's own Son, and bound to him, through the requirements of the covenant of mercy in everlasting fellowship, is not saved without some object worthy of God who redeems it.

Let us then, brethren, hear the voice which comes to us through all God's holy prophets. Amid the temptations, and the vain show, and the sorrows of this world, let us cheer our hearts with a believing view of the coming glory, when all the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord. Let us beware of having "our hearts surcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and the cares of this life, and so that day which shall come as a snare upon all the earth," come upon us, too, unawares. Let us rejoice over our dying ones, that they are soon to come again with the Lord and see the glory of the Regeneration. And let us never cease to pray, as our only hope for the approach of that day of glory, "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly!"

CHRISTIAN SERVICE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 12. Ephesians 6: 5-18.

TRUGGLE and service are the two views of the Christian life presented by the passage selected for the Topic. Evidently the Apostle did not look at the life from the modern standpoint of a simple and easy method of escaping perdition. His address reads like a proclamation to an army. Every man is to remember his obligations as a servant of God. Whether he is a servant of another man, or an employer of other men, the consciousness of his relation to God is to be continually before his mind regulating his conduct in the other relation. The servant is to put his heart and conscience into his work doing it thoroughly because he is serving his Lord, who recognizes faithful service and rewards it. How this idea ennoble the most menial occupation! The common, dreary round of every day labor is raised to a religious level. It is the Lord whom I am serving by what I do. Is the thought that transforms common life. Is the employer capricious, ignorant, unreasonable? Do we know that he does not know good work when he sees it? Is he incapable by nature and education of appreciating excellence? Does he charge us with carelessness and negligence when we have been really earnest and careful? Does he visit upon us with angry and unjust censure the irritation of ill-health or the resentment of some injury inflicted by some other whom he cannot punish? What does it signify to the man who is serving his Lord in what he has done? Looking up to his real Master he sees his approving face, and none can disturb him by his frown or elate him with his smile. Carlyle tells of his Ancient Monk that he was patient when unjustly imprisoned, and was not elated when capriciously favored—a man who did his whole duty in the service required of him and was indifferent to praise or blame—"a man whom no severity could break to complain and no kindness soften into smiles or thanks." Such service is sure to be faithful, though the employer drops out of sight as an unimportant incident. A more lowly instance of the same kind is found in the story of the household drudge, who, being questioned by the deacon for the evidences of her conversion, when she applied for admission to membership, answered simply, "I sweep under the mats now." It was a simple duty, but she had the penetration to perceive in it a change in the moral fibre of her being. The employer has his duty too. If he remembers that he too is a servant, he learns to exercise the kindness, the patience, the forbearance that he hopes to receive from his Master in heaven. So the principle penetrates to the performance of every duty, makes every occupation a religious service, and all life a sublime act of worship.

THREE KING'S DAUGHTERS.

The Order of King's Daughters has spread to many lands and wherever its branches are organized it carries a blessing to place and people for its paramount object and effort is to carry on the beneficent work among the poor and afflicted, to which our Lord gave so much of his time when upon earth. We are enabled this week by the courtesy of "The Silver Cross," to publish portraits of three ladies, who in their own neighborhood are taking active part in the work of the Order.

Miss Mary S. Balabanian is the secretary of a Circle in Smyrna, Turkey, which bears the significant title of The Light in the East. In writing of the circle, she says that it is prospering in that far away land both in deeds and zeal. "Our chief way of earning money," she explains, "is to sew, embroider, and do any kind of work we can to get money in return. This year we also obtained quite a sum of money by making and selling cake and candy. We give two entertainments yearly, but we could give only one this year. It was an entertainment of recitations, music and stereopticon views; we raised from it twenty-five dollars. We have been carrying on our chief work of visiting the sick poor; we pay their doctors, carry to them food and refreshments. Our Father gave to our charge this year two patients especially that we might be a help and comfort to them in their last days; a consumptive young woman and a dyspeptic man; the latter we had removed to the hospital." The circle also did good work in the winter by paying for the repair of the roofs of some cottages where poor persons live, and in supplying coal to several needy families.

Miss Mary M. Morrill, whose portrait is in the centre of the group, was the organizer of a circle at Nashua, N. H., which is doing valuable work in that town. They have, among other good deeds, established a nursery and have furnished a room in the local hospital which is regularly visited by members of the circle.

The third portrait in the group is that of Miss Anne Lewis, who organized the Loyal Circle of Carrollton, Mo. In the three years of its life the circle has grown in membership from the original nine to fifty-five, and is still attracting new members. The needy of the city are its chief care, but the circle has extended its hands with gifts to many in other places. Twenty-nine families were assisted by it during the year, and clothing, provisions, coal and medicine of the value of $372 were distributed among other distressed people. Besides this work the circle has contributed gifts mainly articles of its own manufacture to institutions in Louisville, Ky., and other cities, and has responded to appeals for help from circles whose work was greater than their power.

Miss Hattie A. Averill, the President of the Circle, and Miss Emma Blankenship, the Treasurer who send the report of its work to headquarters give a testimony which may encourage others to enter on the same mission. They say; "As we have entered homes where poverty, sickness and distress were found, and where also death had entered, we have heard the Master's voice, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me,' and when, in His Name, we have tried to help and comfort and cheer, we have felt a blessing ourselves in the service."

THE B. Y. P. U. A. CONVENTION.

Telegrams from Toronto announce the brilliant success of the convention of Baptist Young People's Unions. It appears to have surpassed even the sanguine expectations of the officers and committees. Fully four thousand delegates were at the opening meeting on July 19. President John H. Chapman, of Chicago, took the chair promptly at half-past 10 o'clock. Among those around him were Governor Northern, of Georgia; the Rev. Henry W. Hunt, Toledo, Ohio; Frank Harvey Field, Vice-President of the Union and President of the New York State Union, and the Rev. Dr. Lawrence, of Chicago. Devotional exercises were led by the Rev. Dr. Hall, of Georgia, and then the President delivered his opening address, thanking the people of Toronto for their warm welcome, and declaring the convention open. D. E. Thompson extended a welcome on the part of the Young People's Societies of Toronto, and the Rev. Elmore Harris made a similar speech on behalf of the Baptist churches of the city.

President Whitman of Colby

est. The banner for the Sacred Literature Course fell to the Maritime Provinces of the Dominion. Amherst, N. S., will have custody of the flag for the most successful local Union. The Missionary Conquest Course banner fell to Michigan.

At Saturday's sessions addresses were given by Rev. George E. Horr, editor of "The Boston Watchman," and Rev. Dr. Calvert, editor of "The Christian Inquirer," New York; Dr. Wharton of Baltimore, the popular evangelist also spoke and sang. One of his solos concluded with the refrain, "We'll Meet in Baltimore in '95," which was greeted with great applause by the audience.

Some interesting statistics were handed in by the Secretary as to the attendance at the Convention. The total number of delegates and visitors registering was 5,330, but a considerable number have not registered. Of those registered, 2,427 were from Ontario; 462 from Pennsylvania; New York, Michigan and Illinois came next in size of their delegations. There was one delegate from Palestine; two from China; one from India; and two from England. The Rev. R. P. McKay and the Rev. Dr. McTavish extended greetings to the delegates on behalf of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, which were suitably acknowledged.

The Board of Management said that it had considered the question of next year's meeting, but was as yet undecided between Baltimore and Dallas. The afternoon was devoted to State rallies and the evening to religious exercises.

The Convention closed on Sunday evening with a great mass-meeting in Massey Hall. Dr. Ellis of Baltimore, expressed the pleasure of the delegates at the manner in which Sunday was observed at Toronto. The Rev. Dr. Johnson of Columbus, gave an eloquent address on popular amusements being followed by the Rev. Dr. Wharton, of Baltimore, who preached an eloquent sermon. A rally of junior workers was held in the afternoon under the presidency of the Rev. R. F. Pierce, of Rockford, Ill. All the meetings were remarkable for the enthusiasm and large attendance.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The first delegate registered at the Christian Endeavor Convention at Cleveland, was a Pueblo Indian.

St. Albans, Vt., District Epworth League has twenty-three Chapters, with an aggregate membership of 1,037. Twenty-five members of the League joined the church during the past year.

There are now one hundred and twenty Young Men's Christian Associations in France. The National Council is offering aid to the churches in the respective Districts by volunteer speakers for aggressive work directed chiefly to young men.

The Floating Christian Endeavor Society on the U. S. steamer "New York," which was the first one organized in the navy, has held its meetings regularly, even although on some occasions, during the rebellion at Rio Janeiro, shells were flying unpleasantly near the vessel.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Joplin, Mo., has lately conducted religious services in the camp of the Missouri National Guards. The regiment was camped in a grove near the city. During the summer months the Association holds afternoon Gospel meetings out doors.

The local union of the American Railroad Union which controls the roads centering in Cleveland, O., pledged itself in response to an application from the Christian Endeavor Society that there should be no interference with trains during the sessions of the Christian Endeavor International Convention.

The Young Men's Christian Association at Galt, Ont., has been greatly helped by a series of union evangelistic meetings held in the town by Major Hilton and Mr. Grant C. Yullar, a large proportion of the converts being young men. Noonday meetings were conducted at some of the foundries, and a strong interest was thus aroused.

University, Maine, replied in an address full of eloquence and humor. He spoke, he said, as one who had been born under a British flag, but who had lived under the Stars and Stripes the greater part of his life. The Rev. Dr. Wilkins, the General Secretary, read the annual report, which showed that last year had been the most prosperous in the history of the Union, with a large increase in the number both of members and of Unions. The Founding Fund had passed the $20,000 mark.

On Friday the most important business was the election of officers. The following were elected on report of Nominating Committee: President—John H. Chapman of Chicago; Vice-Presidents—Frank Harvey Field, New York; J. N. Shenstone, Toronto; the Rev. George Braxton Taylor, Georgia; Recording Sec'y—A. M. Brinckle, Philadelphia; Treasurer—Frank Moody, Milwaukee; Managers for three years, until 1897—Rev. E. M. Potea, Connecticut; Rev. C. E. Nash, Kentucky; A. M. Brinckle, Philadelphia; Rev. W. F. Taylor, Washington; Rev. R. S. MacArthur, New York; Rev. L. L. Henson, Maryland; Rev. Wm. A. Lawrence, Chicago; H. J. Reynolds, New Jersey; Rev. F. D. Penny, Massachusetts; Rev. G. P. Wright, Nebraska; Rev. Kerr B. Tupper, Colorado; Rev. W. K. Penrod, Arkansas; W. M. Roache, Jr., South Carolina; Rev. R. R. West, District of Columbia; Rev. R. B. Chaffee, Indiana; Rev. E. P. Lovett, Iowa. To fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Rev. F. E. Hannington of Colorado, whose term expired in 1896, J. Lewis of South Dakota was nominated.

The presentation of banners during the afternoon was the occasion of much inter-

LOST TREASURES.

THERE'S a beautiful song we dare not
As sung in the olden way; [sing,
The ages far past have left us this pledge,
Too precious to breathe to-day.
Faultless rhythm, a note sublime,
Has this song of the long ago,
ts to ones o'er the heart with sorrow entwine,
It is tuneful, sad and slow.

here are beautiful scenes we dare not view,
They're pictures on memory's wall;
hey sadden our thoughts of the long ago,
When their vision we recall.
here are faces of loved ones, now no more,
And familiar woods and bowers, ll seem a fast fleeting story—our life—
As marked by the passing hours.

here are beautiful words we dare not speak,
Sacred to those gone before;
hese words they in parting bade us to keep Till tears and partings are o'er.
ut when we in heaven our dear ones meet,
When the end of earth is told, hese words will be greeting from those we Within that City of Gold. [love,

Pisa's Leaning Tower.

one of the Architectural Marvels of the World, Which Travelers Flock to See.

ALTHOUGH there are many architectural wonders in the great cities of Southern Europe, Pisa, in Central Italy, on the banks of the river Arno, possesses a structural curiosity which has the merit of being absolutely unique. Pyramids and palaces, pillars and obelisks, even the greatest among them, have their duplicates somewhere, and the hanging gardens of Babylon have been produced to some extent in other Oriental cities, but the "Leaning Tower" of Pisa is, far as known, the only architectural oddity of the kind in existence. It is a Campanile or round tower and was designed by two famous mediæval architects, Bonino and William of Innsbruck, but the marvel is that, although fourteen feet out of the perpendicular, it still stands, apparently as solid and substantial as the day it was built. Its walls are thirteen feet thick at the base and fully six feet thick at top, the construction being marble throughout. The basement is surrounded by a range of semi-circular arches supported by fifteen columns, above which rise six arcades with thirty columns apiece. In the eighth story, which contains a chime of bells, there are only twelve columns, that story being shallower than the rest. The entire height of the column is 183 feet, but the ascent by a stairway in the wall is so gentle that the visitor hardly perceives the inclination until the top is reached.

This tower is as beautiful as it is extraordinary, and its delicate colonnades are graceful and elegant. It has been leaning in its present position some 600 years; but architects pronounce it entirely safe, although visitors confess to a feeling of nervousness. There is no reason to suppose that the peculiar inclination of the Leaning Tower was the result of intention on the part of the architects, and the probability is that it obtained its oblique position while the work was still in progress.

Pisa has other and even more famous buildings than the "Leaning Tower." Near by is the great Cathedral of white marble, seven hundred years old, some of whose interior decorations are said to be the work of Michaelangelo. To the north lies the Campo Santo, or place of the dead, also about 700 years old. One of its builders is said to have made the place sacred by bringing thither fifty-three shiploads of earth from Mount Calvary. This famous cemetery is a cloistered structure, adorned with many statues, and enriched with mediæval monuments and magnificent tombs. The city itself is one of the oldest in Europe, its origin being founded in obscurity. According to Roman legend, it was founded by Greek colonists and as early as the third century B. C. it was a powerful ally of Rome, which finally governed it. It afterwards had an eventful history full of wars and conquests, in all of which it held its own by virtue of its high military spirit and splendid resources. Its warriors fought the Saracens in Europe and under the walls of Jerusalem, and on one occasion a Pisan fleet of 300 ships successfully attacked the Balearic Isles where the Moslems held 20,000 Christians in bondage, and released the prisoners.

After wars innumerable and many vicissitudes of fortune Pisa is to-day one of the most flourishing cities of Tuscany. It has one of the best universities in Italy and its commerce and manufactures are steadily improving. It is one of the pleasantest old-world towns a tourist can visit. Mrs. Talmage and daughters are passing a portion of the present summer at Pisa, during her husband's tour of the Antipodes.

Early Impressions.

A mother once said to a clergyman, "When should I commence the religious education of my child?" He asked her, "How old is your child?" She replied, "Four years old." The clergyman answered, "Madam, if you have not begun already, you have lost four years.

I know it was the custom of a certain mother, who raised a large family, to let the child have its own way the first year, but after that she made it do her own will." An eminent statesman once said, in a public lecture, that the man was made between the ages of two and six years. Another great and good man once said: "Children always write with indelible ink; if they are wax to receive, they are adamant to retain impressions."

A Lesson in Patience.

A young woman whose life was full of lofty ambitions found herself occupied day after day with disagreeable household tasks. As the future seemed to shut down hopelessly around these homely duties, the girl grew complaining and bitter. One day her father, who was the village doctor, said to her: "Do you see those vials? They are cheap, worthless things in themselves, but in one I put a deadly poison, and in another a sweet perfume, in another a healing medicine. Nobody cares for the vials themselves, but for what they carry. So with our duties, insignificant and worthless in themselves, but the patience, or anger, or high thinking, or bitterness which we put into them, that is the important thing, the immortal thing." A celebrated Frenchman said: "Perfection consists, not in doing extraordinary things, but in doing ordinary things with an extraordinary spirit."

The Oldest Doll in the World.

Mrs. F. A. Hitchcock relates an interesting story of the famous doll known as the Bambino di Ara Coeli. It is the oldest doll in the world, and if tradition is true, almost as old as the Christian religion, for it is claimed to have been carved out of a tree from the Mount of Olives in the time of the apostles, and to have been painted by St.

philes, and other precious stones, while its neck and wrists were entirely covered with strings of the purest oriental pearls."

FLOWERS FOR THE SICK.

IN choosing flowers for the sick, it is not necessary to pick out the most choice or the most costly, says a writer on floral topics. Every flower is beautiful, and often the common old-fashioned ones are preferred; they suggest pleasant thoughts of former days. As a rule, pretty flowers are preferred. "Oh, give me something cheerful," is often the request at the hospital, and big marigolds, calendulas and zinnias are the first chosen. It is a good plan to have as large a variety in the collection as possible when one is getting ready for a trip to the hospital. If invalids find their favorites among the flowers their enjoyment is much greater; besides, the opportunity to choose is in itself a pleasure. "It is a great privilege to choose," I heard an old lady at one of the asylums say as she bent over a box of flowers trying to decide which box to take. Very fragrant flowers are not always acceptable in a sick room. "I love them, but I cannot breathe so well when they are near me," I heard an invalid once say while trying to decide which bouquet to choose. There are times, however, when the fragrant flowers have a special mission. There is often a blind patient among the invalids. He, too, enjoys choosing his bunch of flowers, and can only be guided in his choice by their perfume.

Flowers that last a long time are generally popular at the hospital. Invalids who are not seriously sick like to keep their flowers and to care for them from day to day. "Which will last longest?" is often a question with them. Marigolds are not only gay but they answer this requirement also; pansies, petunias, mignonette, forget-me-nots and sweet alyssum have this same attractive quality. Buds that will open in water are pleasant to have in a sick room. It is interesting to an invalid to watch them develop. If a few slips are mixed with the flowers they may make the bouquet still more valuable. I saw a sick girl some time after she had received a bouquet from the flower mission and she told me with a happy smile that she had sent home the heliotrope which was in her bunch of flowers, and it was still alive.

Growing Old.

Bishop Weaver, in a beautiful address in the presence of a number of intimate friends on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, not long ago, said: "Now they tell me that I am growing old. But it is no sin to be old, neither should anyone be ashamed of it. The grandest things in the universe are old—old mountains, old seas and stars. Unless one is older than these, he need not be ashamed. No snow falls lighter than the snow of age, but none is heavier, for it never melts. One thing I know, that the days of the years of my pilgrimage must be nearing the end. From a rift in the clouds I now and then catch a glimpse of the sun, and know it is not where it was when I first saw it. I notice, also, that the shadows, which for a time fell westward and then northward, now fall eastward, and putting this and that together, I conclude that the evening time of life is no longer coming, but is actually here. Did not some one at some time say, 'At evening time it shall be light?' If it please the Master, I could ask no richer boon than that it may be light to me when the sun goes down."

Mother's Eyes Speak.

A dear little child about two and a half years old was lying in bed one morning, looking into her mother's face, who in turn was gazing fondly on the child. Neither spoke for awhile, when the little one smilingly said: "You is talkin' to me, mamma." "No, darling," said her mother, "I did not say anything." She quickly replied, "Yes, mamma, you is talkin' to me wiv' your eyes, and you say, 'O you dear little girl, how I do love you!'" We must always remember that our eyes speak for us.

THE FAMOUS "LEANING TOWER" OF PISA.

Luke. Be this true or not, it has been in the Eternal City many hundreds of years, and is called "Ara Coeli Bambino" (baby), because the church of that name, one of the oldest and most interesting in Rome, is its home. "The church is built on the site of a very ancient pagan temple, and its nave is formed of twenty-two columns, the spoils of the ancient buildings, the inscription on the third on the left proving it to have been brought over from the palace of the Cæsars. I shall never forget the first day we visited this vast and solemnly picturesque edifice. It was just at sunset, and golden shafts of light illuminated the mosaic floor, lighted up the richly gilded ceiling above, and flashed in wondrous brilliancy over the Presèpio, or manger, where lay the miraculous Bambino in swaddling clothes, literally crusted over with diamonds, emeralds, rubies, sap-

CHAPTER VI.

OUT OF THE SEPULCHRE.

IN those days it would have been difficult to make Corbulo admit that he had committed murder. He was a Roman general and many a man had fallen by his hand in battle. The instinct of the man was to kill an enemy. This woman had been his enemy and had freely admitted that she thirsted for his life. More, she was armed and had declared with almost her last breath that she would have killed him had the circumstances been propitious. How then did she differ from the enemy whom Corbulo would have killed as a soldier in battle? True, she was a woman and so was entitled to forbearance and consideration. But she was dangerous and the Roman had not the chivalrous feeling for womanhood that was to come at a later day. Then, too, the teachings of the Prophet of Nazareth were opposed to so ruthless a deed. Corbulo remembered hearing that the Christ had commanded his followers to love their enemies, but it he made that the law of his life, his occupation as a soldier was gone. Yet the small voice within him whispered that there was a difference between an act of private and personal vengeance, and a fight on a battle-field with an enemy of his country. Still, he was a soldier not a casuist, and he did not take himself seriously to task for what he had done. He was not proud, or it for no struggle had occurred, and he was rather glad that the inglorious deed had been done in silence and darkness.

But Corbulo was watched: two women had seen him through the window of a house behind the statue.

He looked a moment on the corpse, then, placing a cloth over its face, walked away.

And as he walked his thoughts were in a far-off land,—in a place built on the ruins of an old Egyptian temple on the banks of the flowing Nile. A most fascinating vision was alluring his mind. He saw,—but why divulge the reverie he ended with so significant a muttering: "This passion in its blinded power would hurl me from the future's throne, this passion must be crushed."

The storm was now raging at its fiercest. Fearless as Corbulo was, a man whose personal courage in battle had often inspired the bravest of the Imperial legions, yet as he saw the lightnings flash and glare, and heard the thunder crack and rumble, the slayer of the Egyptian woman trembled beneath the fancied anger of the gods.

Soon he was within reach of the preacher's voice.

"Speaking still," thought Corbulo: the gladiator delays long. If I remember rightly, the third interruption was the signal agreed upon by the conspirators. This Christian preacher passed off the first; surely he cannot suspect the priests. They pray by day, but by night—! Yet I will defeat the holy plotters," he muttered. "I will save the preacher from the lion and the Tiger."

He hastened to the Forum. There, instead of a scattered few, was a crowd still blacker and denser, although moment by moment, the wild fury of the storm was growing greater and more intense. Seemingly the theme of the preacher had changed. To silent and eager thousands he was now speaking the thoughts of his very soul.

Corbulo had reached the edge of the multitude. Now watching the scowls of the clouds, now scanning the faces of the people, he pushes his way through towards the preacher.

"How fierce the storm," he thinks, "how swift the rain. In north or south slugs no lightning, gleams no star. The heavens mock, scorn the earth. . . . Again I feel the Egyptian woman's clutch, hear the lag's curse. But why do I fear? Am I a child? Such spectacles I despise them. . . . What magic power keeps this crowd so silent in the storm?"

This last question was addressed to one of the listeners. But the man had time to answer, however, the preacher had directed the attention and gaze of all to a board which hung almost above his head. On it was the superscription:

JESUS OF NAZARETH, KING OF THE JEWS.

That Pilate wrote in Greek and Hebrew and Latin, which had last been read by the weeping group of mourners surrounding Golgotha, when they with feelings and thoughts the world can never know, beheld the Son of Mary die for mankind, on the cross of Calvary.

"Ten such mighty souls," thought Corbulo, "and in as many years all Romans would be Nazarenes. But where are the priests and their minions?"

He glanced around; then his face grew sternly passionate.

"I see the gladiator! He is rising, he speaks—interrupts. Oh gods! can it be the third? It is—it is the signal! I hear the clash of their sworn daggers. He too, sees them—yet trembles not. Priest and gladiators rush on, on for the victim's blood!"

Crash—crash! A roar—a mumble. The Forum a seething mass; the audience a mob; the Capitol in flames!

The deadly lightning has fired the house of the Cæsars!

On rush the mob—crushing, trampling the fallen and the falling. Cries and shrieks of terror, mingling with curses and yells of vengeance, make more awful the intense and sullen glare of the distant flames, as they devour the timbers and lick the gold from the tumbling dome of that proud palace and proclaim with forked tongues of fiercest warning the impending doom of Rome! Corbulo hurries on with the mob, thrusting in his haste, to right and left, the weaker and the slower. Columns of dense black smoke, bursting here and there with flame, tell him that other buildings have suffered by the lightning.

Atar, he hears the faint cry of a girl—it seems a voice not unknown! He leaves the roadway, guided by the voice. It draws nearer, yet grows fainter. Men and women in terror! Palaces in flames! Thunder crashing! Still Corbulo rushes on—impelled by a strange power within, drawn by a mysterious cry without. He passes the statue, nears his destination—it is the sepulchre! The lightning has wrecked it? The Roman heeds not the inscriptions on its broken marble. He stands on its ruins amazed,—for now the tumult drowns no voice, the tomb is silent as the dead! No sound of life—or death—issues from that living grave.

"I was deceived," he cried aloud, "it was not the slave's voice; a fancy, a dream, a hope—perchance an echo from the crowd."

He listens, though; eagerly listens.

A suppressed cry!

A moment,—he is in the tomb. All is dark there, dark as that dim unknown to which it leads. He is creeping over the broken masonry, over the crumbling skeletons. He waits for the lightning to flash. How long it seems: how dark the tomb. It comes! What a horrid scene its light reveals. There on the mould, held by three fallen stones, lies the blind slave, Zerola of Nazareth!

An hour later—and the girl of Palestine was sleeping in the palace of the Roman General.

"What a picture for an artist to paint!" thought the noble mistress of the house, as she stood holding back the curtains and looking into the room where Zerola lay and slept and dreamed. "Corbulo, Corbulo," she called, "Come!"

The Roman came to the curtained alcove and looked down at the sleeping form. "She has suffered much," he said. "No lapse of happy years writes those marks on the brow. Only pain, mental and physical, can do that."

"But is she not lovely?" said the wife. "I think she is more beautiful because of the record of sorrow and agony written on her face. Those raven tresses and well-defined eye-brows and long dark eye-lashes belong to a sorrow-touched face. I think such a countenance could never have looked so noble and impressive when it was lighted up with smiles, as it looks now in woe. It is the face of a living tragedy. Pure Jewish I think you said?"

"Yes, and of the royal line. That girl, I was told, traces her ancestry back to Solomon, the Magnificent, and far beyond him. It is a strange race, that Jewish one. Not easily controlled, as our governors all aver. They are proud, intense, sensitive, remorseless and vindictive. Their men are fierce and cruel, and their women as implacable as they are beautiful. They are all religious with extraordinary intensity. Their faith seems to be the essence of their being. They have no poetry but their Psalms, and no culture but their piety. To make money and to have a clean ritualistic record are the two principles of their lives. Superstitious and avaricious beyond any race that our Roman arms have subdued, they seem to be oblivious to all else. Pilate told me a great deal about them while I was in Jerusalem. He said that they were so fanatical on matters of religion that they tell more vindictive toward a man who teaches doctrines opposed to their creed, though his life may be clean, than they do toward a low criminal whose creed is right. He had frequently heard of them punishing some man who had unconsciously committed an act that they regarded as sacrilege with a heavier penalty than they inflicted on a murderer."

"Yes," said Corthene, "I have heard that it was so at the trial of the Nazarene. They preferred to have mercy shown to a robber to having it shown to that blameless Teacher. Did you hear much of him when you were in Jerusalem?"

Corbulo looked searchingly at his wife before he answered. Was it possible that she had been attracted by the new doctrine, and was leading the way to a confession of the fact? It was not unlikely. The Nazarenes held beliefs that would appeal strongly to a woman so gentle and noble as his wife. If she had listened to that preacher in the Forum an hour or two ago, she would certainly have been moved. But her face did not show any unusual interest in the subject. "I heard more of him from Pilate than from any one else," he said. "Pilate was greatly troubled about him. He is a careless, unscrupulous man, so that his concern was the more surprising. He reproached himself bitterly for yielding to the Jews in the matter of the young Teacher. He declared that it was a most outrageously unjust prosecution, and there were circumstances at the execution which affected the superstitious side of his nature, and led him to fear that he had incurred the displeasure of the gods in consenting to his being killed. His wife was sure of it, and she reproached him. It seems she warned him before he pronounced sentence, but he did not heed her warning."

"Why did he yield, Corbulo? He was supreme was he not? He could have saved him I suppose?"

"Yes, but he was placed in a delicate position. There were some facts in his past administration that were not creditable to him. Facts which if they had been reported to the Emperor would have been very serious to Pilate. When he hesitated to give up the Nazarene to their fury, they intimated that they would denounce him to the Emperor and that threat was sufficient. He was not afraid of what they might say about him in the case of the Nazarene, but he was afraid of their exposing his whole record. That is the penalty of wrongdoing. It weakens a man's position and prevents his being able to do right when he wants to do it. He was in the power of the Jews and he dare not disobey them. But his yielding has not saved him. He has been summoned to Rome and is to be tried. Claudia, his wife, is said to have become a follower of the Nazarene. I do not know if it is true, but it is commonly reported."

"Did Pilate believe in his innocence?" Corthene asked.

"I think so, but he does not trouble himself much about such matters. It was evidently an ecclesiastical charge that the Jews were pressing and they added the charge of sedition to bring the prisoner under Pilate's jurisdiction. They wanted him executed and they could not execute him for a religious offence, so they declared that he claimed to be a King and then Pilate was bound to deal with him. He was embarrassed by the man's contumacy. The Nazarene would not plead. He seemed to resign himself to his fate. Pilate tried repeatedly to get him to defend himself but he would not."

"Ah, it was all so sad. I have heard he was a very good man and that he was kind and gentle and so helpful to the poor."

"You seem very much interested in him, Corthene. Be careful how you speak of him to other people. His followers are in danger of persecution even here in Rome. As you know, there are many already in prison. I think it is unjust but it is dangerous to show sympathy with them. I admire the Nazarene myself and have tried to shield his followers but I have had to do it secretly and be very discreet. This girl is a near kinswoman of his."

"A kinswoman of Jesus of Nazareth!" exclaimed Corthene, her eyes glowing with excited interest.

"Yes," said Corbulo, "I did not know of the fact when I bought her but I learned it afterward from Paul, who made the discovery. I knew she came from Nazareth, but I bought her only because I admired her rare beauty and evident refinement and thought you would like to have her."

"And was she sold as a slave because of her relationship to Jesus?" Corthene asked, her eyes filling with tears of sympathy.

"No, that fact was not disclosed. It appears she was known to be a Nazarene, but she would have escaped through her obscurity but for an act of indiscretion. The Jews were stoning one of the Nazarenes, and Zerola happened to be passing. Her sympathy was excited when she heard why they were stoning him, and she procured a cup of water from a house near by and was carrying it to the wretched man when the fanatical crowd seized her. They could not bear that any one should show kindness to a man whom they were stoning. They struck the cup from her hands and called Paul's attention to her. He was rabid in his hatred against the Nazarenes then and had her carried off to the court and she was sold. He seemed vexed when I bought her and there was an Egyptian with him who seemed mad with rage. I have since heard that he is a prisoner in Rome now. When Paul joined the Nazarenes he learned who the girl was, and his sorrow and remorse have been terrible."

"Yes," said Corthene, "I suppose so. Poor girl!"

"For years Paul has been searching for the slave," said Corbulo. "Her mother and father he dared to meet. To tell the mother of her daughter's fate he was ashamed. But one morning, at one of the gates of Jerusalem, the Damascus I think, on the very scene of Thaeon's martyrdom, almost at the same hour as Zerola's enchantment, the apostle came face to face with the woman whose child he had enslaved!"

"He met her mother?"

"Yes."

"Was she searching for him?"

"No. She and her husband were on their way to Egypt, having received a letter from a friend there which said that the jailer who was the accomplice of the captain, had confessed his guilt to an old priest—both are dead now though—and thought to atone for his crime by telling where she was imprisoned."

"How did the mother treat him, Corbulo?"

"That I do not know, Corthene. Paul would not tell me."

This question the Roman's wife asked out of no idle curiosity, but for a far different reason. She was almost persuaded to become a Nazarene, but before taking a step so perilous, and perhaps fatal, wished to know if the disciples of this new religion did live the life of the Crucified. For it was that which was winning her.

Then Corbulo and Corthene said good night, for it was very late. And as he kissed her it was with the blush of youthful love, whose warmth had never chilled, perhaps because it was a passion with the deriving its beauty from a sincere constancy, and its power from a suppressed intensity. In addition to this they both knew that faithfulness seals love and makes changeless.

"Had I found that base Karmes," Corbulo muttered, as he lay awake, surrendering himself to different thoughts, "I had sent him where he might welcome the Egyptian woman!"

For the confederate of the captain of a ship which brought Zerola to Italy, had thought that the General, upon arriving home from his visit to Pilate and learning that his wife had not received the present her, had searched for him.

The Gospel Fund now $2,000.

Popular Interest Awakening among all Denominations in the Great Christian Crusade
Mr. Moody is Conducting—What Former Students of the Institute Write.

WITH this issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has to make the gratifying announcement to its readers that the Moody Gospel Fund has now passed the two thousand dollar mark, and that every day is still bringing evidence of extending interest in its growth. Every State in the Union and all the Christian denominations are sharers in this Gospel crusade; indeed, it is to the co-operation of godly men and women everywhere, irrespective of geographical or denominational lines, that the great evangelist looks confidently for the support and encouragement that are needed to make the work he has undertaken a glorious spiritual success. They are helping the cause of Christ more than they now," is his own expression, in recording his grateful acceptance of these gifts. If ever the unevangelized masses are to be brought to Christ will be by such means and methods as Mr. Moody employs, and by workers trained to serve the Master as the students are trained at the Bible Institute. We might fill pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with actual incidents of Gospel work by these students, resulting in the conversion of souls and the complete transformation of evil lives, but these are almost every day occurrences in this work. In the streets, in tents, among soldiers, among the mothers and children, both at their homes in the tenements and at mothers' meetings, in the markets, among theatre employees, among the homeless, the waifs and strays of every description, and among the criminal classes, this great work is carried on unceasingly and devotedly, and God's blessing has abundantly rested upon every effort put forth. There is no other way of reaching these masses that go to no church and who are wholly without religion, except by such means as are afforded by the Bible Institute and its general plan of work. They are not to be ranked even as among those who form the transient church-going class or occasionally attend regular evangelistic services. On the contrary, year after year slips away leaving them still indifferent to the things of eternity. They will not go to the church-other resident pastor. Both churches are over forty years old, and it is hard to arouse spiritual life and energy. But God is steadily blessing the preaching of his word, and some sheaves have been gathered. God bless the Institute; if there were I received my first impulse in Christian work."

J. B. G. writes from California: "When I arrived here I found the churches in very poor condition, especially F., where I now have crowded houses on Sunday evenings—also keepers and their customers attend. The worst infidel and blasphemous in town, who swore he would never attend church, now comes with his wife and family. He has presented me with a portable open-air pulpit. Our open-air meetings are a complete success. We hold them under the shed of a saloon, the keeper of which provides us with chairs for our folks to sit upon. We are on the way to a gracious revival, I trust, not one 'got up,' but 'brought down from above.'"

D. J. C., writing from Province of Quebec, says: "I am busy in the Lord's work on the farm, and I am superintendent of a Sunday School, conduct two prayer-meetings every week, regular services fortnightly at B., or some other place nearly every Sunday. This week I have four meetings to lead in different school sections. I had one week of special meetings at my station last summer which were greatly blessed of God. I am, I believe, in the right place for the present, and I ask an interest in your prayers."

Miss A. J. B., now laboring in Ohio, writes: "I feel very much encouraged with the work. A number of children have been converted and have entered the fold. Also several men and women have been brought to Christ through the influence of the mission. Among them a Jew. First the little daughter, since the father and two sons. Several Hebrews have been coming to my rooms to study and read the Scriptures. Really there is more than one can do alone."

How the seed is sown is illustrated by many incidents that come to the notice of the Managers of the Institute almost daily. Mr. Moody did not consider candidates eligible who had not six characteristics. They must be thoroughly consecrated; full of love for souls; have a knowledge of the Bible; be willing to bear hardship; have untiring energy and the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Possessing these qualifications, how much might be expected of them! It gladdened his heart to find how many such there were. The need of them was urgent. He accepted them as they came, and after giving them practical training, sent them forth to labor in the great harvest field. In a previous article we published a list, showing how three hundred of them are now occupied in preaching, teaching and doing missionary work in various cities. Others took their places in the Institute, and still others—a great number—wanted to go, for whom there was no room. This latter class has continued growing, and it is for these Mr. Moody makes his appeal. He knows them to be men and women of just the right kind.

One of the students was coming from the south part of the city of Chicago recently. A young man of about eighteen years sat on the seat next him. Mr. M. felt in his pocket for a tract, but he only happened to have an eight-page tract left. Thinking that this was not pointed enough, he hesitated to give it to the youth, but finally he did so. The young man read it through and thought, and when asked what he thought of it, said he ought to—"Ought to what?" "Ought to give himself to Christ." Mr. M. pressed the truth home in the few moments he had before leaving the car, and gave the man a marked copy of the Gospel of John to read, which he promised faithfully to do.

A tall girl expressed a desire to reform in the late meeting at Institute Hall recently. She had the usual difficulties, but help was promised. Next day the superintendent took her to the Deaconess' Home, who took care of her. She appears to be truly converted!

Many languages are spoken in the United States, and in our many large cities there are sections where English is either unused or spoken with difficulty. In order to supply Christian workers among this class, it has not been thought necessary to teach a variety of languages at the Institute, but rather to choose from among the applicants of different nationalities who desire to be trained at the Institute, young men and women who speak the languages in question and who are, therefore, able to meet these people familiarly and to tell them the Gospel story in their own tongue. Thus, in recent seasons among the 60,000 Bohemians in Chicago, a great deal of evangelistic work has been done by Bible Institute students. In one notable case, a young Bohemian from Kansas labored among his countrymen, facing insult and abuse, and even sustaining bodily injury. He preached in the open air, giving as many as fifteen short talks in different places on the same evening, with great crowds following him. Some times, owing to the malignity of some of the enemies of the Gospel, they were incited to stone him, beat him, tear his clothes, and once they even had him arrested, but amid all he kept on working courageously, and the testimony of the Gospel was given to many.

Among the many and varied contributions to the Gospel Fund, none is more touching, as showing deep devotion to the work, than that sent by Mrs. Evelyn M. Dick, of South Boston, Mass. It is a beautiful and valuable hand-knit, white-shelled bedspread, of 447 pieces, and the donor has directed that it be sold and the proceeds applied to the Fund. On this page we give a photograph of a section of the spread, showing the beautiful pattern and the delicate quality of the work. It is now open to purchase by any of our readers, and as it is a rarely beautiful and useful article, it will doubtless soon find an owner.

es to hear the Gospel and the Gospel must be taken to them. This is the high mission of the army of workers which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are asked to aid in training and equipping at the Bible Institute—to carry the Gospel to the 30,000,000 churchless people of America.

Many of the letters received from former students of the Bible Institute show that their training and equipment have not been in vain, and they are now working earnestly for the Master in various fields of usefulness. An ex-student, C. W. T., writes from Nova Scotia:

"I thought while working at my trade, up-lifting, to help me more for extended preparation, I would try and do something for Christ. Established regular preaching three miles in the country at a schoolhouse. Two weeks ago we organized a Sunday School with between thirty and forty members."

E. A. T., another former student now in Wisconsin, writes:

"I have a well-settled farming community of thirteen miles length by four miles broad, with two towns and two churches under my charge; there being one

A LITTLE STRANGER IN LONDON.*

CAPTAIN HERBERT knew that Eva's chief beauty and charm lay in her utter unconsciousness, and he had hoped that she might still retain that unconsciousness for many years. It would be well if we hesitated before spoiling the sweet innocence of childhood; it is too easily done—a careless, flattering speech or look is enough, and it is a thing which once lost can never be regained. I know no sadder sight than a vain, self-conscious child, a pigmy edition of the airs and affectations of its elders.

Mrs. Meredith and Captain Herbert talked for a few moments on subjects that did not interest Eva, who preferred watching the manoeuvres of the little gold-fish that resided in a large glass bowl in the window to listening to their conversation. They were most entertaining were those gold-fish, and they dashed and splashed about the water in great style and with an immense expenditure of energy, and Eva watched them with no small interest. "I s'pose they're sardines," she said to herself, for those were the only small fish she had seen. "How much happier they look now than they do when they're packed tight in a tin box and smothered with nasty oil. Poor things! they're so pretty I think it is very unkind to kill them."

Mrs. Meredith looked rather surprised at this speech, but with ready tact she changed the subject by showing Eva the adjoining dressing-room in which Mollie was to sleep. "You will like to have your maid near you at night," she said; "for I daresay you will feel nervous in a strange house."

"What does nervous mean, please?" asked Eva.

"Well—timid—frightened."

"Oh, no, I'm never frightened at night," said the little girl. "You see I know I'm just as safe at night as I am in the day. When I feel at all funny I say to myself, 'God is taking care of me,' and then I feel quite happy."

Mrs. Meredith looked down earnestly at the thoughtful face of the child. "Did your father teach you that?" she asked.

"No, grandfather did. I've always lived with grandfather, you know, and he's taught me everything."

"He must be a good man," remarked Mrs. Meredith.

"Oh, he's ever such a good gentleman!" exclaimed the little girl earnestly.

When she was ready for lunch Eva went down-stairs, with Julia closely following her. She had reached the first landing when a door opened and Mrs. Meredith came out and called to her.

"Come and see my baby, little Eva," she said. "Do you like babies? I suspect you prefer dolls, and if you do I commend your taste," she added laughingly.

She led Eva into a large and cosy nursery where an old nurse sat in a low chair by the fire with the baby on her lap. "I have brought a visitor to see baby, nurse," said Mrs. Meredith. "Eva, this is my old nurse who used to take care of me when I was as young as you are, and now she has charge of my little boy."

Eva looked with grave interest at the baby. He was a pretty little thing with dark, bright eyes and a rosebud mouth.

"Well, what do you think of him, missy?" asked the old nurse, smiling at the child's earnest face.

"He is very nice," said Eva; "but it's rather a pity he's bald, isn't it. It will be so cold for him having a bald head all his life, poor little thing," she added pityingly.

The old nurse and Mrs. Meredith looked at each other and laughed.

"Baby will soon have a fine head of hair, dear," Mrs. Meredith explained to Eva. "And some teeth, too, but he's not old enough yet—he's very young, you see."

"I s'pose he's nine days' old, isn't he?" Eva asked. "Yes, he must be, 'cos his eyes are wide open."

"What do you mean, dear?" Mrs. Meredith asked, looking puzzled.

The little pussies at home can't see till they're nine days' old," said Eva.

"Oh, but babies are different; they can see directly they are born," cried Mrs. Meredith laughing.

"That's a good thing," the little girl remarked quite gravely; "I always feel sorry for the kittens, 'cos it must be so dull for them to be blind. May I give the baby a kiss? Or will the red paint on his face come off? Once when I was little grandfather gave me a baby doll, and it was very pretty, but when I kissed it all the nice red paint came off its face and it didn't look pretty any more."

"You may safely kiss this baby," Mrs. Meredith told her, laughing; "the rouge is guaranteed not to come off his cheeks."

"That's very nice," said Eva; "I s'pose you bought him at a good shop?"

"You are the funniest little girl I have ever met!" Mrs. Meredith exclaimed, and both she and the old nurse laughed so much that Eva decided they must be very merry people.

THE BIBLE ATTITUDE.

In substance I retain the Bible exactly as my mother gave it, for she, too, was an expert. She thought the Lord made the heavens and the earth in six days, and that he rested on the seventh day and hallowed it. She told me the story of Joseph just as if it had been all true, and she told me about Abraham and Isaac and the angel seizing the uplifted knife as if it were a fact. She went over all the Bible lovingly, and never said a word to me about tentative suggestions, clay tablets and future excavations. And many a time after reading the Bible to me, we fell on our knees and the dear old soul talked to God as if he were a real living being and quite close to her. Yet she knew nothing about God but what she had read in the Bible. Of course all this cuts a mean figure in the eyes of formal logic and in the view of the new learning. Yet I am going to cling to it. My reason for referring to it now is to remind the critics that there is a Bible dear to the common people—they were made by it, converted by it, comforted by it, and they live upon it, and I do not want the critics to take it away until they have something better to give than a series of tentative suggestion and the hope of finding some help in future excavations. We must not ignore the work that the Bible has done among the people. Experts should limit the circulation of their books amongst themselves. They should prey and feed and starve upon each other's partial learning, and flatter each other's critical instinct by inventing still longer polysyllables and playing the middleman to German wordmongers.

I would only take away an idolater's idol because I think I have something better to put in its place. Neither would I take away the mother's Adam and Moses and Abraham and Isaac and Isaiah and Daniel, and fill the ghostly vacancy with nothing more than a series of tentative suggestions. But what would the infidel say? I never consult the infidel upon anything. I would go to the infidel for infidelity; I never go to him for faith. What then is to be done? Go on with the old until the new is ready. Do not let the soul shiver in nakedness whilst the new tailors are wrangling over the texture and pattern of the new clothes. This gives me the right point of approach to the Bible and all its contents. All the detail I can now survey from a true elevation. So long as I mistook the telegraph-messenger for the telegram itself, I was in great confusion. Who was he? Who were his parents? What was his age? How did he come to be connected with a great electrical system? I made a puzzle of him. Was he old enough to have written a telegram? Had he and another boy concocted the telegram? After all was the missive a telegram? If it was a telegram, why was it not sent immediately to me without the intervention of a messenger? I ask the boy if he has written the telegram, and he says, No? I demand to see the clerk who has pencilled the message, and he turns out to be little more than a boy himself, but he has sufficient sense to suggest that I had better open the envelope and read the message. When I read it the boy and the clerk become of small consequence to me. The message was full of love. It was the message for which I had been waiting many a weary day. I could have loved even the boy who brought it to me. I at length looked at the whole action from the right point of view, and now the shadows are dispersed by the full shining of the light. The right point of view is exactly what we want in everything. . . . It seems to me that the higher critics have not always placed themselves at the right point of view in attempting to survey the almost boundless field of inspiration. They are in some conspicuous instances mere word-grubbers, who cannot find through lexicons and grammars what can only be found by incessant and sympathetic communion with God. Expertness may be the fruit of prayer. If I start my survey of the Bible from any other point than God I am lost in details. The Author, not the book in its mechanical form, is the point to begin at.

THE PRAYER OF CHILDHOOD.*

Who is the author of this little prayer. "Now I lay me down to sleep?" On this point Rev. Dr. Bullard, of the Massachusetts Sunday School Society, says:

"I really do not suppose there is any living person who can throw any light on the subject of who is the author of 'Now I lay me down to sleep!' For thirty years I have tried to keep my eyes and ears open to ascertain, and have not yet succeeded." After such an endeavor by a man so favorably situated to ascertain the fact, who can hope to solve the mystery?

So far as we know, its first appearance has not been traced further back than the "New England Primer." We saw some years ago an article in which it was traced to this source, but whether it was said to have appeared in the first edition, or only in a subsequent one, we are not able to remember. The authorship has been ascribed to Dr. Watts; but this, so far as appears, is not based on any historical facts.

To know the author of this beautiful prayer would seem to be desirable, yet that knowledge would only satisfy our curiosity, without conferring any benefit. True, the author of it has won for himself an honor which one would hardly exchange for that of being the author of "Paradise Lost," yet he enjoys it no less in heaven for its being unknown on earth. If the author is ever to be discovered in that happy place, the millions of little ones who uttered their first devotions in its language will find him out; and it will be a happy thing for him that he will be beyond the danger of being vain by their praise!

Is there not a beautiful and significant providence in the fact that its authorship is on earth unknown? It is only the more purely a true and catholic form of devotion as being entirely dissociated from its human source. It now belongs wholly to piety and the Church. It speaks now from the heart of the Church, and is the voice of her general life, and is not the utterance of any of her organs. It seems to be the way and the habit of the life of Christianity to make human names and individualities disappear in her devotions. Hence her sublimest creeds, hymns, and prayers cannot be definitely traced to any precise time at which they originated, or to any particular individual from whom they proceeded.

This little prayer has no one to claim it. It belongs to mothers and the children. In using it there is nothing to think of but its own blessed sense. It comes to the couch of infancy like an angel visit, giving no account of itself other than in the blessing it imparts to the trusting heart of childhood.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Connecticut, an impostor mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the neck and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and a simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a bottle and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and on intelligent discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth on the beard or hair on the arms may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or discoloration of the skin when applied or ever afterward. MODENE CREAMS ARE A BETTER TREATMENT.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of hair, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which dissolves away with each day. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy the growth. Modene works by itself in safety and in ease. It does not hurt, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, at 10c per bottle. Send money by letter with your full address written plainly. (Correspondence is strictly private.) The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh to yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

COREA AND THE GOSPEL.

How the War, in which China and Japan are Involved, may Affect our Missionaries in "the Hermit Kingdom"—Missionary Work in Seoul, the Capital.

BLACK, grim clouds of war hang over Corea, and in the clash of conflict between the two great Asiatic powers, China and Japan, "the Hermit Nation" (as Corea is called by its neighbors), may be extinguished as a self-governing people, and its territory absorbed by the victorious combatant. From foreign correspondents at Seoul, the capital city, as well as from the freely expressed opinions of the Japanese press, some light on the causes of this latest Eastern war may be gathered. Corea has been for generations past, regarded by China as a quasi-dependency of the Flowery Kingdom and its government. Of late years, Japan has been coming to the front as a progressive nation and its interests and influence in Corea, as well as in other quarters, have been increased to an extent that has aroused the jealousy of China. Civil troubles in Corea, afforded a pretext for interference by both of the greater powers. For many years there has been widespread discontent among the people of the Hermit Kingdom, in consequence of the corruption that has prevailed among the official class. In the Southern provinces, a popular political party was formed, known as the "Tong Hak," which was representative of the widespread demand for official reforms. Its members charged that the Korean monarch, whom they respected for his high personal qualities and statesmanship, had been surrounded by venal and despotic advisers; that the functions of government and legislation were degraded and abused; that the people were burdened and oppressed beyond endurance, and that the whole official machinery had become odious in consequence. Naturally, so formidable an indictment aroused the resentment of the governing class and the result was an attempt to suppress the "Tong Hak" by force of arms; but this was notoriously unsuccessful. It is understood that the Korean sovereign, Li H'oung, was for a long time opposed to taking up arms against his own subjects. He is a ruler of peaceful disposition, about forty-three years of age, and assumed the throne as the successor of King Khoui Khong in 1864. He has a son, the Hereditary Prince, who is now of age. King Li H'oung, who claims a variety of titles, such as "Son of Heaven," "King of Ten Thousand Isles," etc., has acknowledged the sovereignty of China by inviting its consent on matters of high importance and by paying a heavy annual tribute. At the same time there are in Corea five times as many Japanese as Chinese, and the bulk several sharp encounters came off victorious. At last, the government being apparently unable to cope with the insurrection, both China and Japan landed small armed forces on Korean territory and Japan at the same time made a demand on the Korean monarch and his government for the passage of certain reforms. It does not appear either from the correspondence or the cable despatches whether the measures so demanded were identical to any extent with those the refusal of which had precipitated the civil war, although it is not improbable that Japan embodied in its demand some of them at least. China, sharply resenting Japan's attempt to dictate to Corea, made extensive preparations for war, both by land and sea and Japan did likewise. A formal declaration of hostilities has not been made; but it appears from late despatches that war has actually begun. Japanese gunboats are reported to have opened fire on some of the Korean coast towns, and Japanese cruisers have sunk Chinese troop-ships. A Japanese force is reported to have taken the Korean king a prisoner. Early in the trouble, Japan established a strong garrison in Seoul, the capital, and at the instigation, it is said, of the Chinese minister there, the Korean guard attacked the Mikado's troops, but were repulsed with con-

Chinese army contains probably not less than 280,000 troops of all classes of which 90,000 are armed and drilled according to modern tactics. Besides these, there are also some 540,000 reserves of the "Green Flag," of which 250,000 may be available, the whole army fit for service being between 400,000 and 500,000. Japan may be able to place in the field 250,000 effective troops. She has made a longer and closer study of European war methods than her great adversary. An American, Col. Wasson, is the Japanese chief of staff.

By sea, Japan makes a somewhat better showing, her navy including sixty vessels of all classes, all built since 1869, on modern principles and manned by with officers and crews who have been trained by British experts. Her younger officers are graduates of the Tokio school of gunnery and several of the seniors were trained at Annapolis, and in England. She is weak in armor-clad vessels, but her cruisers are of the best modern pattern, swift and formidable.

China has a much larger fleet; indeed it would be difficult to estimate its actual strength, as many of the viceroys in the maritime provinces have war-ships of their own. Her whole navy probably numbers not less than 100 ships of all classes, including four iron-clads, forty cruisers and at least thirty torpedo boats. It is said that Japan has agreed to consider Shanghai as beyond the limit of any hostilities that may take place and this assurance has been received with much satisfaction by the commercial world.

Just what the effect of this impending warfare will be upon missionary work in Corea, cannot now be foreseen. That it will bring trouble and involve the missionaries in many grave perils seems inevitable; yet it is not improbable

THE WAR IN COREA—KING LI H'OUNG IN HIS PALACE AT SEOUL, THE CAPITAL.

China. Civil troubles in Corea, afforded a pretext for interference by both of the greater powers. For many years there has been widespread discontent among the people of the Hermit Kingdom, in consequence of the corruption that has prevailed among the official class. In the Southern provinces, a popular political party was formed, known as the "Tong Hak," which was representative of the widespread demand for official reforms. Its members charged that the Korean monarch, whom they respected for his high personal qualities and statesmanship, had been surrounded by venal and despotic advisers; that the functions of government and legislation of the trade is in Japanese hands. Until recently, the king, who is invisible to his subjects, has kept very much in the background, devoting himself to introducing electric lights in his palaces, and the worship of "the gods," the religion of the governing class being a mixture of Buddhism and sheer idolatry.

As the rebellion spread to the different provinces, the "Tong Hak," having provided themselves with arms and supplies in advance of hostilities, opposed a formidable front to the government troops, and in siderable loss, being unable to stand the withering fire of the Japanese rifles. Meanwhile both powers are hurrying forward large bodies of troops to the peninsula, and a great, prolonged and costly war would seem to be inevitable.

Great as is the disparity in size and population between China and Japan, the two powers are not so unequally matched in the field as might be supposed. At the same time, it would certainly seem that China, by sheer superiority of numbers and extent of resources, must eventually triumph. The that the final result may prove to be of the greatest advantage to the missionary cause. One of the most isolated and exclusive countries on the globe, walled and defended against foreign intrusion almost as jealously as Thibet, Corea has treated missionaries with intolerance. It is a country without a religion, in the sense that, unlike China, India and Japan, it has no religion that is sanctioned by the State. Long centuries ago, it expelled Buddhism from its cities. This it did after a Japanese incursion 300 years ago, when the invading troops came disguised as Buddhist priests and Corea afterward decided that no priest

THE TRAGEDY OF DRESS.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: 1 Peter 3: 3, 4: "Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and the wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart."

THAT we should all be clad, is proved by the opening of the first wardrobe in Paradise, with its apparel of dark green. That we should all, as far as our means allow us, be beautifully and gracefully appareled, is proved by the fact that God never made a wave but he gilded it with golden sunbeams, or a tree but he garlanded it with blossoms, or a sky but he studded it with stars, or allowed even the smoke of a furnace to ascend but he columned and turreted and domed and scrolled it into outlines of indescribable gracefulness. When I see the apple orchards of the spring and the pageantry of the autumnal forests, I come to the conclusion that if nature ever does join the church, while she may be a Quaker in the silence of her worship, she never will be a Quaker in the style of her dress. Why the notches of a fern leaf, or the stamen of a water lily? Why, when the day departs, does it let the folding-doors of heaven stay open so long, when it might go in so quickly? One summer morning I saw an army of a million spears, each one adorned with a diamond of the first water—I mean the grass with the dew on it. When the prodigal came home his father not only put a coat on his back, but jewelry on his hand. Christ wore a beard. Paul, the bachelor apostle, not afflicted with any sentimentality, admired the arrangement of a woman's hair when he said, in his epistle, "if a woman have long hair, it is a glory unto her." There will be a fashion in heaven as on earth, but it will be a different kind of fashion. It will decide the color of the dress; and the population of that country, by a beautiful law, will wear white. I say these things as a background to my sermon, to show you that I have no prim, precise, prudish, or cast-iron theories on the subject of human apparel. But the goddess of fashion has set up her throne in this world, and at the sound of the timbrels we are all expected to fall down and worship. The old and new testament of her bible are the fashion plates. Her altars smoke with the sacrifice of the bodies, minds and souls of ten thousand victims. In her temple four people stand in the organ-loft, and from them there comes down a cold drizzle of music, freezing on the ears of her worshippers. This goddess of fashion has become a rival of the Lord of heaven and earth, and it is high time that we unlimbered our batteries against this idolatry. When I come to count the victims of fashion, I find as many masculine as feminine. Men make an easy trade against woman, as though she were the chief worshiper at this idolatrous shrine, and no doubt some men in the more conspicuous part of the pew have already cast glances at the more retired part of the pew, their look a prophecy of a generous distribution. My sermon shall be as appropriate for one end of the pew as for the other.

Men are as much the idolaters of fashion as women, but they sacrifice on a different part of the altar. With men the fashion goes to cigars and club-rooms and yachting parties and wine suppers. In the United States the men chew up and smoke one hundred millions of dollars' worth of tobacco every year. That is their fashion. In London, not long ago, a man died who started in life with seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but he ate it all up in gluttonies, sending his agents to all parts of the earth for some rare delicacy for the palate, sometimes one plate of food costing him three or four hundred dollars. He ate up his whole fortune, and had only one guinea left; with that he bought a woodcock, and had it dressed in the very best style, ate it, gave two hours for digestion, then walked out on Westminster bridge and threw himself into the Thames, and died, doing on a large scale what you and I have often seen done on a small scale. But men do not abstain from millinery and elaboration of skirt through any superiority of humility. It is only because such appendages would be a blockade to business. What would sashes and trains three and a half yards long do in a stock market? And yet men are the disciples of fashion just as much as women. Some of them wear boots so tight they can hardly walk in the paths of righteousness. And there are men who buy expensive suits of clothes and never pay for them, and who go through the streets in great stripes of color like animated checker-boards. I say these things because I want to show you that I am impartial in my discourse, and that both sexes, in the language of the Surrogate's office, shall "share and share alike." As God may help me, I shall show you what are the destroying and deathful influences of inordinate fashion.

The first baleful influence I notice is in fraud, illimitable and ghastly. Do you know that Arnold of the Revolution proposed to sell his country in order to get money to support his wife's wardrobe? I declare here before God and this people that the effort to keep up expensive establishments in this country is sending more business men to temporal perdition than all other causes combined. What was it that sent Gilman to the penitentiary, and Philadelphia Morton to the watering of stocks, and the life insurance presidents to perjured statements about their assets, and has completely upset our American finances? What was it that overthrew the United States Secretary at Washington, the crash of whose fall shook the continent? But why should I go to these famous defaultings to show what men will do in order to keep up great home style and expensive wardrobe, when you and I know scores of men who are put to their wits' end, and are lashed from January to December in the attempt. Our politicians may theorize until the expiration of their terms of office as to the best way of improving our monetary condition in this country; it will be of no use, and things will be no better until we learn to put on our heads, and backs, and feet, and hands no more than we can pay for.

There are clerks in stores and banks on limited salaries who, in the vain attempt to keep the wardrobe of their family as showy as other folk's wardrobes, are dying of muffs, and diamonds, and shawls, and high hats, and they have nothing left except what they give to cigars and wine suppers, and they die before their time and they will expect us ministers to preach about them as though they were the victims of early piety, and after a high-class funeral, with silver handles at the side of the coffin, of extraordinary brightness, it will be found out that the undertaker is cheated out of his legitimate expenses! Do not send to me to preach the funeral sermon of a man who dies like that. I will blurt out the whole truth, and tell that he was strangled to death by his wife's ribbons! Our countries are dressed to death. You are not surprised to find that the putting up of one public building in New York cost millions of dollars more than it ought to have cost, when you find that the man who gave out the contracts paid more than five thousand dollars for his daughter's wedding dress. Cashmeres of a thousand dollars each are not rare on Broadway. It is estimated that there are ten thousand women in these two cities who have expended on their personal array four thousand dollars a year.

What are men to do in order to keep up such home wardrobes? Steal—that is the only respectable thing they can do! During the last fifteen years there have been innumerable fine businesses shipwrecked on the wardrobe. The temptation comes in this way: A man thinks more of his family than of all the world outside, and if they spend the evening in describing to him the superior wardrobe of the family across the street, that they cannot bear the sight of, the man is thrown on his gallantry and on his pride of family, and, without translating his feelings into plain language, he goes into extortion and issuing of false stock, and skillful penmanship in writing somebody else's name at the foot of a promissory note; and they all go down together—the husband to the prison, the wife to the sewing machine, the children to be taken care of by those who were called poor relations. O! for some new Shakespeare to arise and write the tragedy of human clothes.

Act the first of the tragedy.—A plain but beautiful home. Enter, the newly-married pair. Enter, simplicity of manner and behavior. Enter, as much happiness as is ever found in one home.

Act the third.—Enlargement of expenses. Enter all the queenly dressmakers. Enter, the French milliners.

Act the fourth. The tip-top of society. Enter, princes and princesses of high life. Enter, magnificent plate and equipage. Enter, everything splendid.

Act the fifth, and last.—Winding up of the scene. Enter, the assignee. Enter, the sheriff. Enter, the creditors. Enter, humiliation. Enter, the wrath of God. Enter, the contempt of society. Enter, death. Now, let the silk curtain drop on the stage. The farce is ended and the lights are out.

Will you forgive me if I say in tersest shape possible that some of the men have to forge and to perjure and to swindle to pay for their wives' dresses? I will say it, whether you forgive me or not!

Again, inordinate fashion is the foe of all Christian alms-giving. Men and women put so much in personal display that they often have nothing for God and the cause of suffering humanity. A Christian man cracking his Palais Royal glove across the back by shutting up his hand to hide the one cent he puts into the poor-box! A Christian woman, at the story of the Hot-tentots, crying copious tears into a twenty-five dollar handkerchief, and then giving a two-cent piece to the collection, thrusting it down under the bills so people will not know but it was a ten-dollar gold piece! One hundred dollars for incense to fashion: two cents for God. God gives us ninety cents out of every dollar. The other ten cents by command of his Bible belong to him. Is not God liberal according to this tithing system laid down in the Old Testament—is not God liberal in giving us ninety cents out of a dollar, when he takes but ten? We do not like that. We want to have ninety-nine cents for ourselves and one for God.

Now, I would a great deal rather steal ten cents from you than from God. I think one reason why a great many people do not get along in worldly accumulation faster is because they do not observe this divine rule. God says: "Well, if that man is not satisfied with ninety cents of a dollar, then I will take the whole dollar, and I will give it to the man or woman who is honest with me." The greatest obstacle to charity in the Christian church to-day is the fact that men expend so much money on their table, and women so much on their dress, they have got nothing left for the work of God and the world's betterment. In my first settlement at Belleville, New Jersey, the cause of missions was being presented one Sabbath, and a plea for the charity of the people was being made, when an old Christian man in the audience lost his balance, and said right out in the midst of the sermon: "Mr. Talmage, how are we to give liberally to these grand and glorious causes when our families dress as they do?" I did not answer that question. It was the only time in my life when I had nothing to say!

Again, inordinate fashion is distraction to public worship. You know very well there are a good many people who come to church just as they go to the races to see who will come out first. What a flutter it makes in church when some woman with extraordinary display of fashion comes in. "What a love of a bonnet!" says some one. "What a perfect fright!" say five hundred. For the most merciless critics in the world are fashion critics. Men and women with souls to be saved passing the hour in wondering where that man got his cravat, or what store that woman patronizes. In many of our churches the preliminary exercises are taken up with the discussion of wardrobes. It is pitiable. Is it not wonderful that the Lord does not strike the meeting-houses with lightning! What distraction of public worship! Dying men and women, whose bodies are soon to be turned into dust, yet before three worlds strutting like peacocks, the awful question of the soul's destiny submerged by the question of navy blue velvet and long fan-train skirt, long enough to drag up the church aisle, the husband's store, office, shop, factory, fortune, and the admiration of half the people in the building. Men and women come late to church to show their clothes. People sitting down in a pew or taking up a hymn book, all absorbed at the same time in personal array, to sing:

Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings,
Thy better portion trace;
Rise from transitory things,
Toward heaven, thy native place!

I adopt the Episcopalian prayer and say: "Good Lord deliver us!"

Insatiate fashion also belittles the intellect. Our minds are enlarged or they dwindle just in proportion to the importance of the subject on which we constantly dwell. Can you imagine anything more dwarfing to the human intellect than the study of fashion? I see men on the street who, judging from their elaboration, I think must have taken two hours to arrange their apparel. After a few years of that kind of absorption, which one of McAllister's magnifying glasses will be powerful enough to make the man's character visible? They all land in idiocy. I have seen men at the summer watering-places, through fashion the mere wreck of what they once were. Sallow of cheek. Meagre of limb. Hollow at the chest. Showing no animation save in rushing across a room to pick up a lady's fan. Simpering along the corridors, the same compliments they simpered twenty years ago. A New York lawyer at United States Hotel, Saratoga, within our hearing, rushed across a room to say to a sensible woman, "You are as sweet as peaches!" The tools of fashion are myriad. Fashion not only destroys the body, but it makes idiotic the intellect.

Yet, my friends, I have given you only the milder phase of this evil. It shuts a great multitude out of heaven. The first peal of thunder that shook Sinai declared: "Thou shalt have no other God before me," and you will have to choose between the goddess of fashion and the Christian God. There are a great many seats in heaven, and they are all easy seats, but not one seat for the devotee of fashion. Heaven is for those meek and quiet spirits. Heaven is for those who think more of their souls than of their bodies. Heaven is for those who have more joy in Christian charity than in dry-goods religion. Why, if you with your idolatry of fashion should somehow get into heaven, you would be for putting a French roof on the "house of many mansions." Give up this idolatry of fashion, or give up heaven. What would you do standing beside the Countess of Huntington, whose joy it was to build chapels for the poor, or with that Christian woman of Boston, who fed fifteen hundred children of the street at Faneuil Hall on New Year's Day, giving out as a sort of doxology at the end of the meeting a pair of shoes to each one of them; or those Dorcases of modern society who have consecrated their needles to the Lord, and who will get eternal reward for every stitch they take? Oh! men and women, give up the idolatry of fashion. The rivalries and the competitions of such a life are a stupendous wretchedness. You will always find some one with brighter array and with more palatial residence, and with lavender kid gloves that make a tighter fit. And if you buy this thing and wear it you will wish you had bought something else and worn it. And the frets of such a life will bring the crows' feet to your temples before they are due, and when you come to die you will have a miserable time. I have seen men and women of fashion die, and I never saw one of them die well. The trappings off, there they lay on the tumbled pillow, and there were just two things that bothered them—a wasted life and a coming eternity. I could not pacify them for their body, mind, and soul, had been exhausted in the worship of fashion, and they could not appreciate the gospel. When I knelt by their bedside they were mumbling out their regrets and saying, "Oh God! Oh God!" Their garments hung up in the wardrobe, never again to be seen by them. Without any exception, so far as my memory serves me, they died without hope, and went into eternity unprepared.

The most ghastly death-beds on earth are the one where a man dies of delirium tremens, and the other where a woman dies after having sacrificed all her faculties of body, mind, and soul in the worship of fashion. My friends, we must appear in judgment to answer for what we have worn on our bodies as well as for what repentances we have exercised with our souls. On that day I see coming in, Beau Brummel of the last century, without his cloak, like which all England got a cloak; and without his cane, like which all England got a cane; without his snuff-box, like which all England got a snuff-box—he, the top of the ages, particular about everything but his morals; and Aaron Burr, without the letters that down to old age he showed in pride, to prove his early wicked gallantries; and Absalom without his hair; and Marchioness Pompadour without her titles; and Mrs. Arnold, the belle of Wall street, when that was the centre of fashion, without her fripperies of vesture.

And in great haggardness they shall go away into eternal expatriation; while among the queens of heavenly society will be found Vashti, who wore the modest veil before the palatial bacchanalians; and Hannah, who annually made a little coat for Samuel at the temple; and Grandmother Lois, the ancestress of Timothy, who imitated her virtue; and Mary, who gave Jesus Christ to the world: and many of you, the wives and mothers and sisters and daughters of the present Christian Church, who through great tribulation are entering into the kingdom of God. Christ announced who would make up the royal family of heaven when he said, "Whosoever doeth the will of God, the same is my brother, my sister, my mother."

THE HEIGHT OF BABEL.

The exact date of the building of "Nimrod's Folly," as the Chaldeans say in alluding to the Scriptural "tower of Babel" (the Armenians speak of it as the "Tower of the Confusion of Tongues"), or the height to which it penetrated the rarified atmosphere of the Oriental plains will, perhaps, never be known. The date of the laying of the foundation of the famous structure is usually set at 2,247 years before Christ, or in the year of the Flood 101. There is a Jewish legend recorded in the Talmud which tells us that God did not put a stop to the building of the tower until after it had reached a height of 10,000 fathoms, which is equal to nearly twelve English miles. The sacred historians have not left data upon which we can base calculations of its exact height and general dimensions, and it is because of this omission, no doubt, that the imaginative Orientals and other ancient writers have given such fabulous and extravagant traditions should ever be admitted to a walled city in their territory. It is a land devoid of priests and temples and palaces, for in all lands where a form of religion rules, we find that architecture and art exert their best powers in the interest of the church and the adornment of its edifices. There is not a single temple or religious building in Seoul, the capital, and no priest is allowed to set foot within its gates. This is equally true of every walled city in Corea. It has banished its gods, and although its people doubtless have their native superstitions, and even their isolated Buddhist monasteries in remote sections, they cannot be claimed to have any beliefs amounting to a national religion. It was all the more surprising, therefore, that Christian missionaries should have been permitted to labor, where all priests had been forbidden, and where Buddhism and Confucianism only existed in remote rural districts, and by suffering, being proscribed in the cities. The upper classes cling to the morality of Confucius without the form of Confucianism; the lower classes make a creed of their ancient superstitions and the worship of demons, sprites, imps, and household gods or spirits. Even the monarch himself is a spirit-worshiper. This is the condition of the 250,000 inhabitants of Seoul, and approximately of the 12,000,000 population of the entire kingdom.

lages and communities scattered. At the present time there is a considerable force of missionaries of various denominations in the kingdom. The first Protestant work in Corea was done by Rev. John Ross of Moukden, China, almost ten years ago. He translated the New Testament into the Korean language and sent it across the border together with large numbers of Chinese Bibles, and this was the beginning of a great work in the northern provinces. When the Protestant missionaries went there later, they found whole communities in the north professing Protestant Christianity and studying the Bible without the aid of teachers.

After the treaty between our own country and Corea in 1882, a number of missionaries entered the field, under the auspices of the American Presbyterian Board, the first appointment being Rev. G. W. Heron, M.D. Among others who took up the work were: Dr. H. N. Allen, Rev. Dr. R. S. McClay, Dr. Wm. B. Scranton, Rev. H. G. Appenzeller, Mrs. M. F. Scranton, Rev. H. G. Underwood, Miss A. Ellers, M.D., Miss Meta Howard, Rev. F. Ohlinger, Miss L. S. Horton, M.D., Rev. G. H. Jones, Miss Mary E. Hayden, Dr. C. M. Power, Rev. D. L. Gifford, Rev. Robert Harkness, and many others, representing chiefly the Presbyterian and Methodist Boards.

Missions, training schools, hospitals, boys' and girls schools, and churches were established and the work progressed satisfactorily until 1888, when the Korean government issued an edict forbidding the teaching or preaching of Christianity.

For some time past the missionaries have been working at great disadvantage, and in the face of violent opposition; but they have been patient and hopeful, staying at their stations and awaiting the dawn of a better day and a more tolerant regime.

Russia, England and the United States have all been mentioned as possible mediators in the war. It is said that England is specially favorable to American mediation. Whatever may be the outcome of the present strife, Corea will still remain a great and a hopeful field for Gospel effort. The hands of such worthy laborers as Dr. Hall and his associates should be upheld, and their efforts supplanted by new laborers among the twelve millions of Koreans who know not Jesus and his Gospel.

TOMBS OF EGYPT.

Further details have been received of the interesting discoveries of extremely ancient Egyptian tombs by M. de Morgan, the Director of the Egyptian Government Department of Antiquities. The scene of his operations was in the brick pyramids of Darchour, in the valley of the Nile, known as the Necropolis of Memphis. The Arabs call them the black pyramids, and Herodotus makes mention of them in his writings, stating that they were even more mysterious than their stone sisters.

M. de Morgan came on several immense galleries, in one of which twelve sarcophagi of princesses were placed in as many recesses hollowed out of the rock; but all had been rifled of their contents. In another gallery a gold breast-piece, incrustated with precious stones, was found, bearing the tablet of Usirtasen II., held by two crowned hawks. The designs on the tablet are wrought in cornelians, lapis lazuli, and turquoise. This breast-piece is undoubtedly the most ancient, and possibly the most beautiful, specimen of the goldsmith's art in existence to-day. In a little wooden box were found, also, various smaller objects of great value—bracelets set with gems, shell-shaped ornaments and lions of gold. On the following day two other breast-pieces were found, bearing the names of Usirtasen III. and Amenemha, both of massive gold, incrustated with precious stones. This discovery was followed up by that of numerous smaller ones, over 800 objects being turned up by the picks of the workmen. Many of the relics bore inscriptions which are now being deciphered, and which are expected to shed some light on a period of Egyptian history of which, notwithstanding much investigation, very little is yet known.

concerning it. Even St. Jerome alleges, from the testimony of eye witnesses, who claimed to have seen and examined the ruins of the sky-scraping shaft, that in his day (born 345 A.D.), it was over four miles high.

MONEY RECEIVED.

Since our last acknowledgment, the following sums have been received and applied to the various funds indicated by the senders:

For THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest: S. Mignonette, $1; Dan'l Drummond, $2.50; Friend, Phila., Pa., $2.50. Previously acknowledged, $327.90. Total $333.90.

For the Mission to Jews in New York conducted by Dr. H. P. Faust: Mrs. Daisy Demarest, $1; R. W. Jones, $5; Miss Mary E. Peebles, $5.

Toward rebuilding the Brooklyn Tabernacle: Jane Hope, $100.

For Mrs. Jamal's Training School in Jerusalem: S. Mignonette, $1.

For Dr. Nassau's Work in Africa: A. E. W., Easton, $1.

For THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack, N. Y.: Anna Simpson, $2; Summitville, Ind., $1; In His Name, P. R., 25c.; Miss E., B'klyn, 50c.; Jas. A. Sigafosse, $1; Friend, Waynesboro, Pa., $2.50; Christian Endeavor Society of Wolcott Congregational Church, $5; Mrs. David Brown, $25.

Some time ago, as has already been stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an American warship was sent to Corea to protect our interests and for the safety of the American missionaries. Rev. Dr. W. J. Hall and wife, Rev. Dr. McKenzie, Dr. Scranton, and several other devoted Christian missionaries have been conducting a very successful medical and evangelical work in Seoul and P'eng Yeng for several years past, their labors being blessed by many conversions. They established the first Christian School in the interior of Corea with a class of thirteen bright boys. Their medical skill secured them a welcome in many homes, and although they endured many hardships and afflictions, they persevered and saw the work blessed under their hands. At times they were exposed to personal violence and once their house was stoned by a mob. Their converts, too, were seized and beaten, and the people in some localities combined to drive the missionaries out; but they stood bravely at their posts and were divinely protected. Thus far, nearly all the converts have remained firm, despite the violent opposition of their relatives and neighbors.

Christianity obtained its first foothold in Corea near the close of the last century, but it was subjected to many persecutions, and in 1864, when the reins of government fell into the hands of a king who was bitterly opposed to foreigners, the Christian faith was almost exterminated. Thousands of native converts were slain and whole vil-

FIRST DISCIPLES OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 19. John 1:35-19.
Golden Text, John 1:41. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE first disciples of Jesus Christ were the fruit of John the Baptist's ministry. This faithful forerunner came, not to teach, but to prepare the way of the Lord; and no sooner was he able to point his disciples to "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," than his ministry had attained its object, and he was taken from the scene. To bring men in contact with Christ, who should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire, was the object of his existence. Would that all evangelists followed, in this particular, the example of this holy faithful man! "He must increase but I must decrease," was not to him a humbling and painful self-abnegation; he says in relation to it: "My joy therefore is fulfilled," i. e., filled to its utmost fulness (John 3:29, 30). He was but "a voice," conveying the message of God, and then ceasing.

John's disciples still followed him, after his first glad testimony to his Lord: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." But the very next day after this John stood and two of his disciples and looking upon Jesus as he walked, he said, "Behold the Lamb of God." Up to this time, all his ministry had gone to awaken expectation in the hearts of men, and prepare them for the coming Messiah. Now he was whether indeed he could rejoice when he should lose his influence and his popularity. "The two disciples heard him speak and they followed Jesus." And John's joy was full. Looking at all things in the light of God, and of the holy ministry which had been committed to him, John had learned beforehand lessons which the first apostles were so slow to learn: If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself" (Matt. 16:24); "Whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister, and whosoever of you will be chiefest, shall be servant of all. For even the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." (Mark 10:43-45.) Whatever there may have been of self-exaltation in the natural heart of John the Baptist, had been already conquered, and he was proved true whilst he could see himself becoming more and more a nobody as Christ came into view.

There are evangelists and Christian workers who are ready to lay down their physical life for the work and for souls; they can be and are, self-denying in many ways. But one thing they cannot and do not accept, that is that the work shall be diminished, that their meetings shall be smaller, their influence more limited, their opportunities fewer. They will blame themselves and others, fret against circumstances, make mighty efforts to recover lost ground, do anything but what perhaps their God is waiting for, i. e., consent to decrease so that life may increase. Like Jonah, their reputation is really more to them than Christ or his glory. Many a work of God, and many a worker, is sadly superficial, first, because that worker will sacrifice depth for breadth; he judges by the sight of his eyes and by the hearing of his ears, and by what other people say, or what he thinks they will say, rather than by the Word of God, which teaches him his own nothingness before God. He is sure that God led him into the work, that God has blessed him in extending it, but he cannot see that the time may come when God, for reasons known to him, may want him to cease working, or to work in a different way. John the Baptist's acquaintance with God was not superficial, and when, instead of the thousands of auditors which hung on his words away in the desert, he had now only two disciples following him at the moment, and those two left him and followed Jesus.

John Understands his God

too well to do anything to retain them, or to doubt his own leading, when he saw that the sun of his own fame was setting. It is by such tests that God can be glorified and can prove to the world that the newness of life which was in Christ, and which was "not of the world," still exists in his disciples, that he which sanctifieth and they which are sanctified are all one," of one spirit and of nature; "as he is so are we in this world," receiving not honor from men; seeking not their own. It is a mercy of God, and our greatest privilege, to be put to the test: we never know either our own weakness, or the grace of God, until we have been tested. John the Baptist was put to yet sorer tests. Thrown into prison for his faithfulness to Herod, he heard of the works of Christ, and it seemed as though the Messiah to whom he had so faithfully borne witness had forgotten him, taking no notice of his imprisonment, giving him no part in his own ministry, but practically ignoring him. He sent to Jesus to inquire about the burden of his heart: "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" And the Master sent him word: "Blessed is he that shall not be offended in me." This was enough for John, he only wanted to know that he was on the right lines, he passed through this last test, and when afterward he was beheaded, he left behind him a life which can never be forgotten, and a ministry which is still doing its work in every land: he lived between two dispensations; the greatest man of the Old Testament and the herald of the new. Thus, without regret, John left his two disciples to follow Jesus. "Jesus turned and saw them following and saith unto them:

What Seek Ye?

There never was a disciple truly following Jesus but that he marked it. But a true following of Jesus means much for life and walk. We must know what we do if we follow him. He saith unto them, "What seek ye?" Are we quite sure what we seek in following Jesus? John's disciples answered, Master (or Teacher) where dwellest thou? It was himself they wanted, not some enjoyment which he could give them. "Come and see," was his reply. He never turns away from those who seek him out. "They abode with him that day, for it was about the tenth hour;" everything else was set aside, it was the first opportunity they had ever had to spend time with Jesus; nothing must interfere with it; any other engagement, the lateness of the hour, all must drop out of sight; the world's Messiah was before them, and so they abode with him that day. What was the consequence? One of them, Andrew, went to seek his brother Simon, he could not bear that Simon should live another day without meeting Jesus. This man was probably also a disciple of John's. Whether Andrew went all the way to their own home in Bethsaida from the side of the Jordan, or whether Simon as well as he, was among the many who had come, even from Galilee, to hear the preaching of John, we know not. But that which most imports is told us. He found his brother and said to him: We have found the Messiah which is being interpreted: the Christ, and he brought him—not to John, his own former teacher, but to Jesus. And when Jesus beheld him, he said: "Thou art Simon the son of Jonas: thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation: a stone." Jesus gives names, new names to his own. He knew what he would make of Peter, and he named him accordingly.

He named James and John, Boanerges. To the overcomers in the church of Pergamos, who has held fast his name (Rev. 2:13) he says: "I will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." To the overcomers in the church of Philadelphia, "I will write upon him. . . . My new name: he has not denied my name (Rev. 3:8-12.) Was it because of these two Galilean disciples that on the morrow Jesus would go forth into Galilee, or was it expressly to find Philip, who was of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter? The record does not explain. But if indeed, he took this journey for the sake of one disciple or at the most two, how it makes us understand the infinite pains he takes to single out, and reveal himself to those whom the Father has given to him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

UNDER THE FIG TREE.

omitted. The events of the lesson are a case in point. From the incidents given we are enabled, as has been said, to follow the course of the first seven days of Christ's public ministry, as we are of the last seven. John the Baptist's testimony to the deputation from Jerusalem as to the existence of the Messiah, is followed the next day by direct identification when he saw Jesus coming to him. Jesus just returned from the conflict in the wilderness is declared to be he of whom John spoke on the previous day. On the next day Jesus is there again, and John again points him out to two of his disciples as the Lamb of God. Whether the Baptist apprehended the full meaning of the expression, or was carried by inspiration beyond his own knowledge, does not appear; but the significance of his words must have been apparent afterwards. The meekness, the gentleness, and the sacrifice on Calvary made the application of the words, "The Lamb of God," intensely appropriate. The Evangelist mentions Andrew as one of the disciples, and his avoidance of the name in other parts of his Gospel leads us to infer that the other was John himself. They follow Jesus, who invites them to his home. They address him as "Rabbi," or My Teacher, as if intimating that their allegiance was transferred from the Baptist to him. "It was about the tenth hour," the Evangelist says. The expression has given rise to much debate. It is now generally thought that throughout this Gospel the hours are named on a principle different from that adopted by the other Evangelists. They appear to have followed the old custom of reckoning from sunrise to sunset, while in this Gospel the modern custom, which we follow, of reckoning from midnight to noon, was adopted. If that is so, the tenth hour would be ten o'clock, and Andrew and John stayed with the Lord till sunset. The words, "He first findeth," (verse 41) appear to imply that John also went to find his brother James, and that Andrew was first in finding his brother, or it may be that John and Andrew both went to look for Peter. The finding of Philip is not fully reported, but as he was a fellow-townsmen of Peter and Andrew, it is probable that they had something to do with the meeting. Nathanael's introduction is more dramatic. He was from Cana, which was near Nazareth, but knew nothing of Jesus. He appears in the list of Apostles as Bartholomew, that is the son of Tholomew.

They followed Jesus. It is possible to follow him now by doing as he did and living a helpful life doing one's whole duty. A little while ago the mother of a family of children was taken sick and died. The eldest daughter, a girl of thirteen years, took her mother's place as far as she could, comforting her father in his bereavement, and caring for her younger brothers and sisters; but after some months of this work during which she took no pleasure but gave herself entirely to the self-denying occupation of helping her father and taking care of the children, she was taken ill and was laid on her death-bed. When her Sunday School teacher visited her shortly before her release from pain and weariness, the teacher talked with the child about her hope for the next life. "I'm afraid to meet Jesus," said the child; "I have done so little for him." "Don't be afraid," replied the teacher, "Jesus knows how you have worked for your loved ones." The little girl had no thought that work for her own was work for Jesus, who "came unto his own," and she was comforted.

Where dwellest thou? When the plague was desolating London, Lord Craven determined to go to his country house to avoid infection. His coach was standing in front of his door waiting for him. As he stood within the house near an open window completing his arrangements, he heard his negro coachman say to some one who inquired whither his lordship was going: "He is going to the country. He professes to put his trust in God; but I suppose his God lives in the country, and not in the town, as he is going there to be under his protection." Lord Craven was struck by the remark. "My God," he said, "lives anywhere and can take care of me wherever I am. I will stay here where I may be of some use." And stay he did.

Come and see. An illustration often used to express the beauty of Christ's religion is that of the stained glass window. A man is urged to go to some cathedral that he may see a window which is a triumph of art. He is told of the gorgeous colors and exquisite workmanship and of the singular beauty of form and tint. He goes, and standing outside, he looks for the window that has been described to him. He recognizes it by its shape, but what a disappointment! It is dull and colorless. If he can make out any form on the glass it is but dimly. He turns away in disgust and wonders what his friend could have meant by his glowing description. But he is directed to go inside, and he goes. Then he understands. The window lighted by the sunlight glows in richest coloring and he perceives its beauty. The description was no exaggeration. The window is beautiful beyond conception. So any one who really desires to know what Christianity is must come into the church, must not stay outside. When any one doubts its usefulness or beauty he can receive no better advice than "Come and see."

First findeth his brother. In one of the churches in New York City, there are more men than women in communion and more boys than girls in the Sunday School. The reason is that the young men and boys have organized a society that is called "the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip," the object of which is to have each member bring in his brother or friend. The friend brought is expected to bring in his brother or friend and so the numbers have grown by ones and twos.

Follow me. Christ has left an example which every one who calls himself by his name ought to follow. His life should be read and studied so that we may follow him by being like him. We shall find that he was patient, kind, gentle, forbearing, loving. If we cultivate those qualities, we shall follow him as he wished to be followed. A soldier in the East Indies, a stalwart man, who had been a prize fighter, was a terror to his regiment. He was converted, and the lion became a lamb. Two months afterward in the mess-room some of those who had been afraid of him before began to ridicule him. One of them threw a basin of hot soup over him. The whole company gazed in breathless silence expecting that the offender would be murdered. But after he had torn open his waistcoat and wiped his scalded breast, he turned around and said, "You who know me, know whether I am afraid to resent this treatment. I am not afraid, but I have learned of Christ to be patient. For his sake and because I have taken his name, I do not punish the man who has insulted and injured me." That was following Christ.

The Threshing Floor of Ornan.

Our Traveler Visits the Site of Solomon's Temple where the Mosque of Omar is.

WE are so fortunate as to have in our first visit to Mount Moriah the guidance of Rev. Selah Merrill, D.D., LL.D., whose long consulate in Jerusalem and ability as archaeologist and historian have qualified him beyond any other living man for the office of cicerone to the Holy City and the environs thereof. Our little party is preceded by Mohammed the "kervasse" of the American consul, a personage so much more magnificent than his nominal master as to deserve—or demand—special mention. From top to toe he is official. The embroidered vest; the loose sleeves, stiff with gold lace; the jauntily-ferocious tilt of the red fez capping his six feet of altitude, the wand of office in his right hand, (something that suggests in equal measure, the "hunting-crop" of an English squire, and the "caduceus" of Mercury) go to make up the imposing presence stalking down David Street, then turning into side-ways lined with stuffy bazars.

He takes, and keeps, the middle of the narrow thoroughfare, leading into the heart of the city from the open space before the Grand Hotel. At ten o'clock on this fine winter morning all the world is abroad. The heavy rains have washed the steep street almost clean. We see more distinctly than during previous walks, that it is paved with square stones, and, instead of being graded in the ordinary way, drops to the lower level every ten feet or so, in a marble step six inches deep. Of course no wheeled vehicle can be used upon it, but donkeys, laden with human and inanimate freight, amble up and down the miniature precipices; camels lower their clumsy hulks, one foot at a time, and climb as if each step were an outrage to the inner brute. Barefoot boys belabor the donkeys' unyielding flanks; turbaned men tug and drive the larger craft of the desert.

Mohammed, the Magnificent, goes neither around, nor over anything. Come what may, and go what can, he holds the right of way in the centre of the street. Under the temperate rule of the representative of a Republic, he forbears to strike man or beast. Everything makes way for the party of pale-faces, and nobody eyes us curiously or stops to stare at us.

Without the enclosure of what were of old the Temple grounds, and is now the wall defending the precincts of the Mosque of Omar, we pause while Mohammed, running briskly forward, disappears into the barracks and presently emerges with two uniformed soldiers. Prior to the visit of the Prince of Wales and his tutor-guardian, Dean Stanley to the Holy Land, no Christian was suffered to pass the limits of the Temple area. To-day, Jew and Gentile may visit even the interior of the Mosque, but under the surveillance of a Turkish soldier. The brace of warriors detailed to attend us clank close at our heels throughout the three hours we spend upon holy ground, and we are cautioned not to speak of Turkey by name, or to comment even in English upon the peculiar stringency of existing governmental laws and orders.

All this matters little to visitors whose thoughts are surcharged with the associations aroused by the fact that our feet actually stand within the gates of the Sacred Place. The space enclosed by the walls of the Mosque is nearly identical with that occupied by the ancient Temple grounds. It is, for the most part, paved with slabs of white stone.

"This was the Court of the Gentiles," says our guide and instructor, and when we have crossed it, and gone up a step or two—"And this the Court of the Women."

Olive and acacia and karab trees grow luxuriantly in the patches of unpaved soil. Mohammed breaks off and offers us green sprays to take away as souvenirs of place and hour.

Such goodly trees may have been in David's mind when he cried out in prophetic transport: "I am like a green olive-tree in the House of God."

We loiter a little in the rear of the small company of Gentile strangers, to reproduce in imagination the throngs that filled the area, while the Royal Preacher bowed himself in prayer with hands spread forth to heaven upon the brazen scaffold he had reared in the sight of all the congregation

Mosque of Omar, although inferior in dimensions to the Temple, is exceedingly beautiful without and within. I well recollect with what avidity I used to read travelers' stories of the mysterious interior to which none but the Moslem faith could penetrate, and how more than one curious pilgrim lost his life in the attempt to explore it in disguise. The gorgeous environment of tiles, mosaics, wrought marbles and stained glass detains us but a few minutes in our hurried passage to what would be called in music and poetry, the "motif" of the superb structure. The hoary brow of Mt. Moriah breaks through the tessellated pavement directly under the noble dome. A richly-wrought railing surrounds it. I thrust a reverent hand through an interstice and let it lie upon the rough surface, deaf to the voluble prattle of the trio of sacrists who insist upon pointing out the clumsy imitation of the imprint of a man's hand graven in the granite. It is a big, ungainly hand-print, and, according to Moslem tradition, was left there by the angel Gabriel. To clear this story out of the way, let me say that Mohammed is fabled to have ascended to heaven from this rock, which started with him, and was held back by the angel.

"Let the fellows tell it to you," advises lifted eyes to hover above this, the threshing-floor of Ornan, the Jebusite.

"So David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for fifty shekels of silver. And David built there an altar unto the Lord and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings."

The great altar of Solomon's Temple succeeded that erected by his father. A Christian church was reared here by the Crusaders, and for nearly two hundred years, European kings, before assuming their crowns, laid them, in solemn dedication upon this rock. It is fifty-six feet long by forty-two wide. Dr. Merrill shows us a round hole about the size of a man's body in the heart of the huge stone, believed by competent judges to be the aperture by which the blood of victims slain in sacrifice flowed into escape-pipes. A cave or crypt beneath the upper stone is floored with marble, and a circular space, corresponding with the upper opening, gives back a hollow reverberation when struck. Could this be lifted, the vast "leader" flooded daily with the typical purple tide—

The blood of beasts
On Jewish altars slain, could, probably, be followed to the valley a hundred feet below. One intrepid explorer, many years ago, by the help of huge bribes, obtained permission from the guardians of the place, to lift the marble cover and lower himself by ropes into the very bowels of the mountain. At the last moment, superstitious fears overcame avarice, and the permission was revoked. The Mohammedans say that the hole is the mouth of hell and that evil spirits will arise in a great cloud, should the sealing marble be removed.

Directed by Dr. Merrill, we make out the location, beyond the central rock and railing, of the Holy of Holies. The space once filled by ark and cherubim is small. No devout Jew will enter the mosque, lest he should inadvertently tread upon the hallowed spot which it was not lawful for any man to visit save the high priest, and he but once a year.

In leaving the grounds, one of the party leaps up lightly to snatch for me a bit of hyssop growing in a cleft of the stones, quoting of the King-philosopher, "And he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall."

The traditional site of Pilate's Judgment-Hall is hard by the Temple enclosure. The howls of our Lord's enemies must have echoed through the midnight silence of the courts to which the tribes had that day repaired with "joys unknown" to celebrate the Passover-feast.

of Israel. "And said, O, Lord God of Israel! there is no God like thee in the heaven, nor in the earth!"

The mighty plateau built up, filled in and levelled by the Wise King, overlooks valleys and hills in all directions. Solomon's Porch, glorious in white-and-gold, formerly crowned the hill on the eastern side.

"And Jesus walked in the Temple, in Solomon's Porch."

Here the lame man clung in a rapture of joy and gratitude to Peter and John until a crowd collected about the three, "greatly wondering."

The tower on the northwest corner of the enclosed area occupies the site of the tower of Antonia, from which the Roman chief captain ran down with centurions and soldiers to rescue Paul from the infuriated Jews. This, as the readers of Josephus will recall, was the last citadel held by the Jews in the final siege of Jerusalem. The

Dr. Merrill. "I always do this. It is the best way of ridding oneself of them. They cannot go on telling the same story for all time, even in the hope of 'baksheesh.'"

The tale repeated with an infinity of gesticulation and gibberish, the doctor kindly engages the chatters in conversation in their own tongue, and we come back to the bare rock over which twelve hundred years ago, Caliph-Ab-el-Melek built a Mosque. Inwardly we are grateful for the legend that has led to the jealous preservation, without coating of marble or inlaying of fine gold, of the naked top of the hallowed mountain. Beyond reasonable doubt, it was upon this rock that Abraham "built an altar, and laid the wood in order, and bound Isaac, his son, and laid him upon the altar upon the wood."

No student of sacred history and archaeology disputes the assertion that the awful apparition of "the angel of the Lord

RELIGIOUS BROTHERHOOD.

THE religious world is so wide that there is plenty of room for all beliefs and all preferences. When a minister stays in a denomination where he is a discordant element, he becomes what the physicians call a foreign substance which is bound to create irritation and ought to go out. Let ministers go where they belong and it will make for peace. That was good advice which Abraham gave to Lot when he said, "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdsmen and thy herdsmen, for we are brethren. Is not the whole land before thee. Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me. If thou wilt take the left hand then I will go to the right, or if thou depart to the right hand then I will go to the left."

Religious wars are proverbially the worst wars, when ministers do fight they fight like sin. May the God of peace bring all our denominations into smooth waters. It took only one Jonah to upset the entire Mediterranean sea, and one minister out of tune with his denomination will keep everything boiling like a pot from Princeton to Andover and from Middletown to Rochester. Peace, be still! Whole centuries have been consumed in ecclesiastical battle. I do not know but that the whole world would have been converted before this, if the ammunition used against brethren had been used in fighting the common enemy. We have had too many Big Bethel fights, regiments in the thick of the fog blazing away against regiments of the same army. Let us all get into the brigade with which we can the easier keep step, and march shoulder to shoulder to battle and to triumph. I don't know any one of the evangelical denominations to-day in which a minister cannot offer sympathy, pardon, help, salvation and eternal life to all the people. What more opportunity can any of us ask? A minister of religion may stand under any of the denominational banners in the presence of 10,000 people, all of them strangers, and in perfect confidence say, "Any man or woman in this crowd who will accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour may have happiness and heaven." Who wants more opportunity than that? What's the use of trying to get ourselves hurt by jostling our foot under this chariot wheel or running our heads against some fortress wall or standing in front of some cannon that is about to be touched off. The field is the world and it is white to the harrier and waiting for its flocks.

Among the saddest sights I ever saw were the harvests of Germany and France in the summer—ripe and ready and falling and wasted. Why? Because the men who would have reaped them were off to the war. God forbid that the harvest of Christ all over Christendom now ripe and ready to be garnered should perish for lack of men who are using bayonet instead of sickle. Some good people have looked with dismay upon the fact that clergymen are all the time crossing from denomination to denomination. So far from being a matter of regret it should be a matter of thanksgiving. There are persons born of a parentage belonging to some denomination toward which they have no special affinity and there is some doctrine or form of worship that they prefer, then let them cross over. Because we choose our father's God and our mother's God is no reason why we should stay in the denomination they selected. Go where you can get the most good and be the happiest. All the troubles in all the denominations to-day would be settled if about fifty ministers would cross over, some going this way and some that. Open the gates and let them out. Open the gates and let them in. The work of God is advancing so splendidly in this country that I do not want strife and controversy to divert us. Columbus, two hours before midnight, said to Pedro Gutierrez of the king's wardrobe: "Look, look; see the light. I am sure that must be a continent." And so I surely see the advancing morning of regenerated America. I tell you the signs are most encouraging. During the first fifty years of our century in this country there were 3,000,000 converts added to the evangelical churches. There have been as many added to the evangelical churches in the last ten years. In other words the last ten years have been equal to the first fifty of this century. Clear the track for the Lord's chariot.

THE SINS OF SOCIETY.

THE curse of modern society is the millionaire libertines. Society takes the small offenders over its knees and gives them old-fashioned chastisement, but after a man reaches a certain height in wealth and political honor he is allowed a special system of morals and the ten commandments are abrogated. All honor to those who rub off the disguise! God is no respecter of persons and what is right for one is right for all and what is wrong for one is wrong for all. Depend upon it, the lower classes will not be purified till the upper classes are purified. Sin in high and honorable place is a compliment to iniquity. People are imitative and they copy, and if they cannot have as fine horses and as brilliant turnouts, they will at any rate have the license and the dissipation of those more favored of fortune. I know that there is an attempt in some quarters to relax the moralities and suit the theory of what is right or wrong to popular habits. But the world has never seen any system of morals worth the paper they were written on except the Bible. Conform society to that standard and all prosperities will attend. Conform society to any other standard and blasting disintegration will be the consequence. As exposure of vices must precede their cure, I say, Turn on all the lights! Don't let us try with pieces of court plaster to heal wounds that need to be probed. Let there be a glare of publicity on all wrong-doing. Let all the morning, all the evening and all the weekly newspapers publish it. Let it be pilloried in the face of the noonday. Let neither threat nor bribe hinder.

It is too late to shackle the printing press, either in England or America, and most certainly so when it fights in defense of the purity of the domestic circle. An elegant mode of handling sin will never overcome it. You cannot drive back this host of sin with t-pistols. The evil must, with iron hand, be clutched and strangled. Give stout and long continued blows, not with wooden mallet, but with thunderbolts for sledge hammer. And let me say by way of encouragement that the right side will be the winning side. It does sometimes seem as if our cities were to be overrun with crime, and that all the sanctities are to be abolished. But while the agencies of evil are faster than ever, the agencies of good were never so potent. It is only a question of time when society shall be rectified. If the coral insects can lift an island, our feeble efforts under God may raise a breakwater that will dash back the surges of municipal abomination. Beside that, we toil not in our own strength. It seemed insignificant for Moses to stretch his hand over the Red Sea. What power could that have over the waters? But the East wind blew all night, the waters lifted into two glittering palisades, one on either side. The billows reared as God's hand pulled back upon the crystal bits. So we go forth and stretch out the hand of prayer and Christian effort over these dark, boiling waters of time and suffering. Aha! aha! says the deriding world. But wait! The winds of divine help will begin to blow, the way will clear for the great army of Christian philanthropists, the glittering treasures of the world's beneficence will line the path of our feet, and on the other shore we will be greeted with the clash of all heaven's cymbals, while those who resist and deride and pursue us will fall under the sea and there will be nothing left of them but here and there cast high and dry upon the beach the splintered wheel of a chariot, or thrust out from the surf the breathless nostril of a riderless charger. God speed the day!

J. A. B. Malawan, N. J. What is the oldest authenticated mummy, yet discovered, as far as known?

The oldest is believed to be that of Sekerem-saf, son of King Pepi, who lived 3200 B. C. This mummy is now at Gizeh.

Teacher, Montclair, N. J. What was the earliest idolatry mentioned in history, sacred or secular?

The first idolatry practised among men was probably Sabeanism, the worship of the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon and stars. Job, (one of the very oldest of the sacred books) has an explanatory passage (see Job 31: 26, 27, 28) which refers to this species of idolatry.

Nina Ramsdell, Indianapolis, Ind. Is it true that the story of Bruce and the spider had its counterpart in ancient history? If so, can you direct me where to find it?

A similar incident is recorded in the Talmud of David, who, when fleeing from Saul, sought refuge in the Cave of Adullam. A spider wove its web across the entrance which deceived Saul's soldiers and saved David. A similar tale is told of Mahomet, and also of St. Felix.

J. J. Allwecht, Lombardville, Ill. What was the meaning of the answer Christ gave to the Pharisees as to the sinful woman (John 8: 3-11)? Did he mean that they were guilty of the same sin, or only that they were guilty of some sin?

The word used by Christ may be translated "this sin," so that it might be understood that they had sinned in the same way. But the lesson of the incident (which, by the way, is not contained in the most ancient copies of John's Gospel) is the condemnation of hypocrisy and of a censorious disposition—of the spirit that would rather inflict punishment than reclaim the criminal.

L. Nutrie, Camden, N. J. Where and when was the first American Camp Meeting held?

In Kentucky in 1799. Two preachers, John and William Magee, the former a Methodist, were on a missionary tour in that State in the Red River district. Their services so crowded the church that they had to be held out of doors in the woods, and a great religious revival followed. They next held service in the woods near Muddy River, and many families came from long distances in wagons and camped there while the meetings lasted.

Constant reader, Allia, Iowa. Who were the Nicolaitanes referred to so severely in Rev. 2: 6, 15?

There is considerable doubt on the subject. By some commentators it is believed that they were followers of Nicolaus, one of the deacons of the church who fell into sin. By others, and with more probability, it is thought that the name is a Greek equivalent of the name of Balaam. Both agree that the Nicolaitanes fell into licentiousness as a reaction from Judaism travestying Paul's doctrine of freedom from law. (See Rom. 6: 1-15.)

Young Christian, Cambridge, Md. Is there any difference between mind, soul and spirit? Are they not identical?

The question is one of long standing, and has occupied the attention of the ablest metaphysicians of this and past times. It would be impossible to present here the various theories that have been advanced. Perhaps as a working theory the distinction between the three terms may be best seen by comparison. It is evident that in the dog, or the horse, there is an element other than mere intelligence, as either animal may be affectionate or vicious. Thus there are two elements in the animal, which, for the sake of argument, may be termed mind and soul. The man is of a higher order, having a conscience, a knowledge of right and wrong, and a sense of accountability. This implies a third element, which is generally spoken of as the spirit. The German meta-physicians, however, reverse the order, giving the highest place to the soul. Philo called the third, or highest element, "the soul of the soul." Calvin and others held that there were only two elements, regarding soul and spirit as identical. The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, however, in the often-quoted passage (Heb. 4: 12) evidently held the triple theory. The identification of the Ego, or personality, naturally follows. An illustration may again help to make the matter clear. Neither the dial, the wheels, nor the mainspring of a watch is the watch, though all are necessary to its being a watch. The man is a combination of all the elements, as a watch is the combination of all its parts.

W. Clark, Scranton, Pa. Is it possible to attain perfection in this life?

If you mean by perfection a stage in which it is not possible for man to become better, or wiser, or holier, we believe that there is no such stage in this life and are not sure that there is one in the life to come. Even in heaven, as more is learned of God and his ways, the soul will grow in knowledge and wisdom and become more God-like. In this life the holier and wiser a man grows, the greater are the possibilities within his reach, and the more he knows of his own imperfections. Progress and growth are the law of the spiritual life all the way through.

J. Paull, Columbus, O. In ancient MSS., both English and Latin, as well as very old inscriptions, I found the letter "I" used instead of "J." Please explain why this was done?

The letter "J" did not come into general use in England until the time of Cromwell. In many books published in the first half of the seventeenth century there does not appear a single letter "I." The change seems to have been made for the purpose of making a distinction between the capital "I" and the small letter "i," by adding a tail to it. This in writing figures with the old Roman numerals, VIII, was transformed into VIIJ, without change in value or pronunciation. At the outset, therefore, "I" appears to have had the same sound as "I." It did not acquire a different or independent sound until after the seventeenth century.

Miss A. . . Brooklyn, N. Y. How do our American public libraries compare in size with those of the great book centres of Europe?

The great libraries of England, France and Germany are the accumulation of many generations, and, therefore, need not be compared with our Smithsonian, Congressional, Astor and other collections of comparatively recent date. Few American collections have anything like 100,000 volumes. The State Library in Munich, Bavaria, is credited with 900,000; the Berlin Library, 800,000; Strasbourg, 600,000, and the libraries of Hamburg, Dresden, Leipzig, Heidelberg and Wurzburg follow in diminishing ratio. Larger than any of these are the collections at the British Museum, London, and Bibliotheque Nationale, in Paris, which run up in the millions.

W. Brockenborough, Wileysville, Miss. 1. Does the statement in Exodus 9: 16, that Pharaoh was raised up for a special purpose, imply that he was not to blame for his conduct, therefore might be fulfilling God's will as much as Peter and Paul did? 2. Does the reply to the jailer that if he believed he would be saved and his house, mean that if the head of a family is converted his family will be saved, whether they are converted or not?

1. It does not imply any idea of that kind. Pharaoh must have been conscious of his responsibility for his own actions. There is no doubt that wicked men do fulfil God's purpose when by their persistent and long continued sin, in spite of warning and discipline, God uses them to show to sinners his patience and forbearance and final severity. But it is an awful thing for a man to qualify himself for such service. 2. The family of a converted man is not saved by his belief without their own. But his example and influence, especially in the time of the jailer, were likely to introduce an atmosphere into his home that would lead to their conversion. In the case of the jailer, it is scarcely conceivable that he would become a Christian and his family remain unsaved.

THE YOUNG REPUBLIC.

WE are indebted to Mr. Walter Lee, of Honolulu, for the photograph which is reproduced on this page of a scene that is destined to become historical. It was taken on July 4th at the moment when the proclamation of the Republic of the Hawaiian Islands was read by the first President, Mr. I. Sanford B. Dole. The day will be memorable to every one who was present in the capital. It opened with a grand salute at dawn of all the guns on the battery. That was the signal for a general outpouring of the citizens to the streets. The stores, business offices and public buildings were already gaily decorated and the interest of the spectators was excited by a friendly rivalry, which was known to have run high, as to who should make the finest and most tasteful display of bunting and patriotic devices for the auspicious day. By eight o'clock all faces were turned toward the executive mansion and that spacious building was crowded with invited guests. Outside, the crowd eagerly seized the points of vantage. The space in front of the marble steps was quickly occupied, every inch of space within hearing distance being filled. A mighty cheer rent the air when President Dole, accompanied by the members of his Cabinet emerged from the building and advanced to the place prepared for them at the head of the steps. The President gazed around over the cheering crowd with evident pleasure and none could grudge him the smile of triumph which lighted up his expressive features. Silence fell as he raised his hand and every ear was strained to catch his words. Briefly, and in well chosen words, he reviewed the history of the country since 1839, when King Kamehameha renounced his despotic powers and gave the islands a constitution, to the present day when the Republic was to be proclaimed. "There are still greater things to be done," Mr. Dole said. "There are achievements in free government as yet unattained to be striven for, in response to the fast growing claim that the poor man, the weak man, the ignorant man shall be recognized in fact as well as in name in the body politic." In stirring words he appealed to his hearers for loyalty and support to the government and then formally declared "the Republic of Hawaii as the sovereign authority over and throughout the Hawaiian Islands from this time forth." The thirty-six foot flag was run up to the top of the mast and as its folds unfurled over the roof of the executive mansion to the breeze, it was saluted by a salvo of artillery, mingled with the shout of thousands of voices and the cry from the President's lips of "God save the Republic." Doubtless, on that solemn occasion, those words, often carelessly uttered, had a very real meaning in the President's heart; for none knows better than he, the dangers that menace the young Republic and it is as true now as it was in bygone days that it is God who "increaseth nations and destroyeth them; he enlargeth the nations and straiteneth them." (Job 12: 23.)

A Police Captain Punished.

The dismissal of Captain Doherty from the police force of New York City is less of a surprise than it would have been six months ago. The revelations of extensive corruption made before the Lexow Commission prepared the public for some decisive measures on the part of the Police Commissioners. Public opinion, however, is not satisfied by the sentence. The Captain was charged with accepting bribes from law-breakers to refrain from interference with their nefarious business. The evidence against him appears to have been regarded by the Commissioners as conclusive and they dismissed him. Considerable sympathy is felt for him, not because people doubt his guilt, but because other officials are believed to be equally guilty and because the same practices have been carried on for many years past by others in that and other precincts. Indeed, at the trial, the Captain openly charged one of pot which stood on a shelf at the head of his bed. As he was not around the next day, some neighbors called to see if he was sick. They found him securely bound and gagged on his bed, with a sponge by his side that had been soaked in chloroform. Thieves had entered, drugged him into insensibility, and having tied him up to prevent his giving an alarm, had carried off his money. Doubtless the farmer feels less confident now of his own ability to take care of his property than he did. Many have been brought by painful experience to the same conclusion as to their hearts and lives. Rejecting the appeal God makes to every man to give him their hearts, they have found that it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. (Jer. 10: 23.)

The Billiard-Players' Embarrassment.

Two billiard-players found themselves in an embarrassing dilemma in a noted New York hotel a few days ago. A society man who is obliged to spend the summer in the city, while most of his friends are at the mountains or the seaside resorts, says that he was strolling down Broadway after midnight and wishing he could meet some friend who would chat with him for half an hour. Seeing a light in the billiard-parlor of a ho-

He lives in the country, but went to the town to demand payment of a debt. The debtor was unprepared for the visit and pleaded for more time. He said that certain payments were due him which would certainly be made in a few days, and he would then be able to discharge the obligation. The creditor, however, was of a different opinion and insisted on immediate payment or he would take summary measures to recover it. As he held a chattel mortgage on the man's goods he was able to do this. The debtor followed him into the street pleading with him for time and assuring him that he would certainly pay in a few days, while he would be ruined by his goods being seized. "No," said the creditor, "cash down is the only terms you can make with me." The altercation attracted a crowd from which a man stepped out and greeted the creditor, giving him his name and saying he was a tax-collector. "You owe ten years of personal back taxes," he said, "which I have been trying to collect a long time. Now you are here I'll trouble you to pay." The creditor was embarrassed. He said he had not the money with him, but would send it as soon as he returned home. The collector, however, declined to let him go as he had had great trouble already, and reminded him of the words he had just used to his own debtor. He accordingly hailed him to jail where he was held until a messenger could be found to go to his home in the country and procure the money. When he was so severe with his debtor he had probably forgotten his own indebtedness, just as people who declare that they will never forgive some one who has injured them forget that they are barring their own way to God's forgiveness. (Matt. 18: 35)

Brief Notes.

The Rev. Hudson Taylor, of the China Inland Mission, estimates that more than one hundred millions of Chinese are addicted to the use of opium.

The Government refuses, under present circumstances, to permit Miss Annie Taylor and her party to enter Tibet. The missionaries are not yet ready to enter, but they are confident that when they are, the way will be opened.

Friends of American missionaries in Constantinople were much concerned by the report that one of the missions had been wrecked in the recent earthquakes and some of the missionaries injured. The report is authoritatively contradicted.

Dr. Pentecost says that he knows of a Common drunkard in India, who died some years ago, leaving his twelve-year-old daughter to the missionaries. She was educated, taking the degree of M.A., and is now the principal of an educational institution in India.

Persecution of the Stundists continues in Russia, especially in the Province of Kieff, where they are most numerous, all members of the sect convicted of having attended a prayer-meeting are liable to a fine of fifty roubles ($21), or a fortnight's imprisonment.

The Bethel Church, of Kansas City, Mo., is working as a rescue mission among needy thousands. Its special effort now is to establish a "State line mission," in the heart of the locality which is the headquarters of lottery and other gambling institutions.

Two Children Baptized at the Congregational Church, of Rutland, Vt., on a recent Sunday, are the descendants respectively of Miles Standish and John Aiden, and bear the family names. One of them wore a robe of broad silk that was brought over in the Mayflower, and has been used as a baptismal robe one hundred times.

The Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bethel Santhal Mission Northern India, shows that it is doing much good in relieving suffering. During the past year about 5,000 patients were attended. Thirty-one persons have been baptised in six villages and two new churches built. The total of baptised Christians is 712, making, with their children, a Christian community of 1,002.

Miss M. E. Disette has for the Past Six years devoted herself to Christian work among the Zuni Indians at a remote and isolated post in the Zuni Pueblo, Mexico. Herself, being thus banishing herself from civilization and living with the Indians, that she may help them and teach them what Christianity really is, has won the admiration of all who know her and her work. She is taking two Zuni girls to the Indian Teachers' Convention at Santa Fe this year, who are astonishing specimens of what Christian culture can do for the Indian.

his judges with being cognisant of one of the offences of which he is accused and of having neglected to help him in correcting it. It is obvious, however, that the Commissioners could not take these facts into account in passing sentence. Justice required that being found guilty he must be punished. This fact is generally admitted, though one of the most common excuses made to ministers and Christian workers by those whom they urge to repent of their sins and seek pardon through Christ, is that they are "no worse than other people." The warning of the Bible is explicit that every man must give account of himself unto God. (Rom. 14: 12.)

Distrusted Banks.

A robbery took place recently at Forestville, N. Y., which has excited some amused comment in the village. A farmer of that neighborhood sold his farm and received a check for eight hundred dollars as the first payment. The purchaser advised the farmer to leave the money in the bank when he cashed the check, as it was dangerous to have it in the house. The farmer, however, is a stalwart man rather vain of his physical prowess, and he laughed to scorn the idea of anyone robbing him. He distrusted banks, and declared that the money was safer in his own keeping than in the best bank in the land. He accordingly took the money home with him and put it in a tea-

tel. he entered hoping that some one might be there whom he knew. He was greeted effusively by two men with whom he was but slightly acquainted and was somewhat astonished at their warm welcome. They explained it by saying that they had been waiting for two hours for the appearance of anyone whom they knew. They had begun playing and drinking early in the evening and when they were tired, each discovered that the other had no money to pay for the billiards and the drinks. They knew they would not be asked for the money until they stopped playing, so although they were fearfully tired, they had continued in the hope of some one coming in from whom they could borrow the money. In the meantime they were increasing their indebtedness with every order and were making matters worse. They were learning a lesson that has often been learned at far greater cost by men who have embarked in a career of sin. It is a common experience for a man after beginning wrongdoing to wish to retrieve himself, but to find that he is in a position where he will suffer more by leaving off sin than by continuing in it. So he is held captive and forced to go on against his will. (Jer. 18: 20.)

FALSE AMBITIONS.

A Sermon by Rev. J. B. Hawthorne, D. D., delivered in First Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga. Text: Luke 22: 24: "There was a strife among them which of them should be accounted the greatest."

THE fact that man recognizes greatness, and seeks fellowship with it, is evidence that the elements of it are in him, and that he ought to exert himself in every legitimate way to become great. Jesus Christ did not forbid his disciples to seek greatness. He rebuked their false conceptions of greatness, and their wrong methods of seeking it.

If we measure a man by the quantitative standard, he is one of the most insignificant objects in the universe. Compared with the spacial magnificence of yonder sun, he is too little to think about, but when we measure him by the qualitative standard, he outweighs the whole universe of matter. I think, but the sun does not, cannot think. I know what the sun is. I know its orbit, and what will be its movements and changes in years to come, but it has no such knowledge of me. The sun's existence is limited to the realm of matter, but there is open to me a universe of mind. I can read the thoughts and commune with the heart of the Infinite. The sun is not even conscious of its own existence, but I know that I am. The sun has no moral faculty, but I am endowed with faculties which connect me with moral government, and render me capable of distinguishing between the true and the false, the right and the wrong. The sun is perishable, and somewhere in the great future its burning fountains will be quenched, but I am as immortal as the adorable Being who made me. In God's thought the qualitative greatness of mind and spirit rises to an immeasurable height above the spacial or quantitative greatness of any material body. The same principle must guide us in Measuring Men.

Corbett and Sullivan are great in stature and strength. Martin Van Buren and Alexander Stephens were diminutive and frail, but in the qualitative greatness of mind and heart, they were giants in comparison with whom the two modern heroes of the prize-ring are contemptibly small and weak.

In Solomon, the much-lauded king of Israel, we see not a very high type of human greatness. He came to the throne after the children of Israel had passed through centuries of bondage, poverty, persecution and hard-fought battles. Under Saul and David they became brave and skillful soldiers, and conquered all the tribes that disputed their right to the land which the Lord God had promised to their fathers. Having no war upon his hands, and all the wealth of a great kingdom at his disposal, Solomon began his administration with the desire and purpose to eclipse in material display, and in luxurious living, all surrounding monarchs. Saul and David had lived in tents, but he built for himself a princely palace. The Israelites had worshipped in a moving tabernacle, but he reared for them a great temple whose magnificence was the wonder of the world. His household consisted of three hundred wives, seven hundred concubines, and an army of guards and servants. It is the verdict of history that it requires only about one such administration of government to bring ruin upon any nation. The bewildering splendor, extravagance, and sensuality of Louis XIV. was all that was needed to prepare France for a bloody revolution, and a reign of crime and terror. The years which witnessed the exhaustion of a great surplus in our federal treasury, the enormous increase of taxation, the vast accumulation of capital in the hands of a few heartless monopolists, and the unprecedented extravagance of those who were made rich by class legislation, were the years which immediately preceded the present period of commercial prostration, social discord, strife and disintegration.

After the death of Solomon the kingdom was divided, the temples destroyed, and the Jews were carried captive into Babylon. When Jesus Christ began his ministry, he stood upon the very site where this Jewish king had reigned in such power and splendor, and said to a people, who were still boasting of the fame of the dead monarch, "Behold! a greater than Solomon is here." To those Jews, blinded by ignorance, superstition and prejudice, this declaration of the "son of a carpenter" was arrogant and offensive in the last degree. But looking at it to-day in the light of nearly nineteen centuries of history, we know that it was true—a greater than Solomon was there.

Greater than Solomon.

He was greater than Solomon because he set up a kingdom among men incomparably better than the one over which Solomon had reigned. Solomon's kingdom was spectacular. He sought to make it externally great—great in appearance—great in those things which appeal to man's sensuous nature and stimulate worldly ambitions. The Kingdom of Christ "cometh not with observation." It cares very little for the external and visible. Its aim is the transformation of human character, by implanting in the heart the principle of a holy life. It brings man into conscious relations with God, and into joyous submission to God's will. It makes him strong in the love of truth, justice, and mercy. It develops and magnifies those elements of his being which render him capable of God-like thought, motive and action, and of blissful fellowship with all that is holiest and divinest in that boundless realm of existence untouched by flesh and blood.

For more than three centuries after the death of Christ his disciples preserved the simplicity and spirituality of his religion. The Kingdom of God was an invisible power, working in the hearts of men, and manifesting itself in their pious walk and conversation. It was during that period that its power and progress astonished the world. It was then that its millions of devotees counted all things earthly as worthless in comparison with the excellency of the knowledge of Christ. It was then that they brought themselves and all their possessions to God's altar, saying to those who marvelled at their zeal, "The love of Christ constraineth us." They represented the Kingdom of God as it was in the thought of their divine Master—a reign of righteousness in the hearts of men, manifesting itself in a corresponding rectitude of conduct.

Lost Greatness.

After that period of simplicity and purity, the old Solomonic spirit was revived. Ambitious ministers demanded a spectacular worship—a service that would appeal less to the conscience and more to the sensuous and æsthetic feelings of men, and make religion more popular with the world. Ambitious rulers coveted the support of the Church in enforcing their authority and extending their power. The result was that iniquitous alliance of religion with the state, which destroyed its spirituality, and established a cold and lifeless formalism in which there was much to please the eye, but nothing to touch and purify the heart.

Amid all the darkness of the Dark Ages which followed this apostasy, there were Christians who never consented to these corruptions of the faith and practice of the primitive churches. Bravest and noblest among these were the Albigenes, the Waldenses and the Anabaptists. Their faithful witnessing for the truth prepared the way for the great Reformation of the sixteenth century, the glory of which still illumines the world.

It was the Solomonic spirit that made ten centuries of formalism, superstition, ecclesiastical extravagance, religious intolerance, and all the crimes and horrors of the worst religious persecution the world has ever seen. It was the return of the Christ spirit that brought back the primitive simplicity of the Kingdom of God, that shattered into fragments colossal systems of falsehood and cruelty, that invested men with the right to worship according to their own convictions, that liberated genius from the thralldom of priestcraft, and gave to the world such majestic men as Luther, Calvin, Knox, Wesley, Milton, Shakespeare, Bunyan and Newton.

Surely the man who established such a kingdom, and whose teaching and example have begotten all that is best and noblest in the world's civilization, could truthfully say, "A greater than Solomon is here."

Greatness Inherent.

True greatness is inherent. It is in the man, and not in the raiment he wears, nor in the property he owns, nor in the office he holds. There is no artificial method of making human greatness. There are judicial vagabonds. There are congressional tramps. There are senatorial boobies. There are presidential parvenues. There are royal idiots. There are millionaire baboons.

In the eyes of the world how insignificant was Jesus when he stood before Pilate and Herod. Clothed in all the paraphernalia of royalty, and backed by all the power of imperial Rome, how majestic and grand they were in comparison with the poor peasant Jew, who stood before them charged with crime, and without a solitary friend to plead his cause. But looking back at them to-day in the light which intervening history throws upon them, we see in Jesus the Man of men, the King of kings and Lord of lords, and in Pilate and Herod the weakest and meanest of slaves.

Money, thank God, is not an element of greatness. The manhood of many a millionaire is infinitesimal. Among the forces which are lifting the world into a higher life and freedom, he is an imperceptible factor. In every age the world's and deliverers have neither the time nor the inclination to make money. Among the men who make the mountains of our intellectual and moral scenery stands the colossal form of Martin Luther. There was never a day of his great life when his material possessions were larger than those of the average German mechanic. Shakespeare had only a few hundred pounds to leave to his family, but he bequeathed to the world a legacy of thought of more value than all the gold in the vaults of England.

Greatness is not hereditary. Your father and grandfather may have been great philosophers or great scientists, or great theologians, but if you choose a life of intellectual idleness, you will die a fool. There are a great many "Sons and Daughters of the Revolution" among us, but some of them are totally destitute of the genius and spirit of their ancestors. Some of them will never write a Declaration of Independence from anything. They will never revolt against any despotism—no, not even the despotism of their own depraved appetites. No object is more ignoble and disgusting than one of these beer-sucking, club-room loafers, when he is discoursing to some fellow-loafer about "the blue-blood" in his veins.

Every man must be the architect of his own fortune, the builder of his own character, the molder of his own destiny. You cannot make your child great by giving him a great man's name. Doctor Mercer was wont to say, that, "there are more Jesse Mercers in Georgia than behaved themselves." You can find George Washingtons among chicken-thieves, Thomas Jeffersons among society dudes, Jacob Astors among peanut-peddlers, John Miltons among circus-clowns, John Wesleys among bar-keepers, and Abraham Lincolns and Jefferson Davises in the chaingangs. It is not the name that you give him, but the character he builds, and the work he does, that will determine your child's position and power in the world.

Reputation or Character.

"There was a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest." Their ambition was not so much to be great as it was to be considered great by others. Many a man is willing to be an ignoramus if some little college will confer the degree of LL.D., upon him, and thereby convey to the world the impression that he is a man of letters. Many a man who never saw a battle field, never performed a military evolution, and never read three lines of any book on military tactics, is content to remain in ignorance of such things so long as his neighbors and acquaintances salute him as colonel or captain. It is not the greatness of knowledge and service that he covets, but a title that is interpreted by the world to mean greatness. Many a church member is of religious truth, and neglectful of his most sacred Christian obligations, if he can make the impression upon the community that he is one of the "pillars of the sanctuary." He covets not real greatness in the kingdom of God, but only the appearance of it. If there is anything that a righteous God abhors more than another, it is a religious sham—a church member who gets credit for work which he never performs, for money which he never contributes, and for a piety of which he is utterly destitute. Every such church member is repeating the sin of Ananias and Sapphira, and nothing but God's merciful forbearance keeps him from sinking at once to a starless doom.

"There was a strife among them." It was a strife into which men put wrong motives and wrong methods. I imagine that there was much detraction and calumny in it. I imagine that each tried to magnify and promote himself by disparaging his competitors.

Detraction as a Factor.

Do you see any exhibition of this spirit in our day and generation? Do you know any physician who attempts to gain a high position in the eyes of the community by assuming that the practice of his competitors is but little better than quackery? Did you ever see a specialist in kidney treatment sneer into contempt the diagnosis of the liver doctor? Did you ever hear a candidate for political office belittle another candidate for the same office? Did you ever hear him say, "My competitor is an innocent and pious man, but innocence and piety do not meet the requirements of the high place to which he aspires. The duties of that exalted position call for the services of a masterful mind, and an eloquent tongue, and therefore, my fellow citizens, it becomes your patriotic duty to honor me with your suffrages?" Did you ever see two political newspapers in a strife, each trying to convince the public that the other was the exponent of all that is most disreputable and fraudulent in political journalism?

Do you see any exhibitions of this spirit in religious circles? Do you know any church member who tries to stand first in the esteem of his pastor by discounting anything good that is said and done by other members of his church? Do you know one who thinks that the pastor ought to honor every member according to the length of his countenance and the prolixity of his prayers? Do you know another who thinks that the highest seat in the synagogue should be given to the brother who pays the highest pew-rent? Are there traces of this unrighteous of the Christian ministry? Did you hear a minister, whose gifts and graces shine only in the pulpit, say of another minister, in the same community, "Oh, he is a very Godly man; he prays much, he visits all his members every quarter; his sympathies for the afflicted are very deep and tender, but there is much complaint about the dullness of his sermons? He is a good brother; I am warmly attached to him, and regret that he will not be able to remain much longer with us?" Or did you ever hear a minister, whose congregation had dwindled to diminutive proportions, say of another minister, "Yes, he preaches to a great multitude, but it is the music, and not his sermons, that the people go to hear?"

Brethren, all such methods of competition are inspired from beneath. The greatness which men reach by them is empty, spurious, and a stench in the nostrils of the Almighty. The more I see of the petty jealousies and mean contentions among selfish and narrow-minded men, the more I appreciate and magnify the nobility of the sentiment uttered by Daniel Webster, when he said, "I thank God that if I have too little of that spirit which would raise mortals to the skies, I have none of that other spirit that would drag angels down."

Christian brethren, if in the years in which we have taken counsel of each other, and labored together in the Lord, we have fought any battle and won any victory for truth and righteousness—if we have made any real and enduring contribution to the Lord's cause, let us not mar the beauty of it by coveting any other reward than that which comes from our own approving consciences, and the smiling face of our Master in heaven. If we have become great in the knowledge and experience of divine truth, in courage for the right, in fealty to duty, and in favor with the Lord, let our greatness be its own reward. In the kingdom of God we can climb from height to height only by making stepping stones of our dead selves. Sense and self must be denied. Others must be esteemed better than ourselves, and all our honors, crowns and sceptres laid at Jesus' feet. Let us seek greatness, but let it be the greatness of a noble mind, a pure heart, and a useful life—a greatness won by no unworthy means, and without bringing sorrow to anything that breathes—a greatness that will go with us through the gates of death into a world of redeemed spirits, and that shall make us meet for companionship with cherubim and seraphim, and a seat with our ascended Lord, high above all principalities and powers, in a land enchanting with the beauty of unfading flowers and splended with the unrivalled glory of un-setting suns.

A TRIP TO NORTHERN SIAM.

IN the report of a journey through northern Siam, Rev. Walter Bushell, of the Baptist Missionary Society, speaks in glowing terms of the result of twelve years' labor. He says:

It was my privilege to visit Siam twelve years ago, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Webster. We were the first white men to visit them: all that had been done before this had been done by native Karen evangelists. They had heard something of the truth and had made up their minds to accept it for themselves, but it was during the time we spent with them that the first one was baptized. Hence at our first visit we found them, so far as all outward aspects are concerned, in their heathen state. Now at the time of this, my second visit, twelve years after the first period, the change which has taken place in their manner of life and in their whole general appearance is truly wonderful. It is hard to put your hand on the elements which go to make up this change and to just tell wherein it consists, and yet you feel it at once, and that very forcibly, and when you see them side by side with the heathen, as we did when something over thirty of the men, women and young people of both sexes of Bau Nau village, conducted us to Mequa village, passing through and spending a night in the heathen village of Me Thau, it was then easy to discover some of the things in which they differed from the heathen. Cleanliness, both of person and clothing, was certainly one of them; absence of so-called ornaments, such as ear plates three inches in diameter, right through the lobe of the ear, was another, while the bright and intelligent faces of the Christians showed the result of the schools which have been established among them, and served to deepen the looks of gloom and stupid indifference which are natural to those who have as yet refused to receive the Light of the world.

In each of the two Christian villages we found a neat and respectable chapel, which was by far the best building in the whole village. In Bau Nau the chapel is surrounded by a good fence keeping out all cattle, goats, etc., and the timber is already cut and nailed to do the same thing at Mequa. They are thus enabled to keep the ground under the chapel clean and tidy, and it shows the respect they have for their house of worship. When I was there before not one in the whole village could read; now some few of the old people can read enough to sing from the hymn book, many of the middle-aged can read, and a majority of the young people from ten to fifteen years old can read well, and some of them pass a very creditable examination in the elementary truths of Scripture. We took up a number of New Testaments and hymn books and sold them to the people at Rangoon prices. To take these a month's journey over land means a good deal of trouble, loading and unloading, etc., but when we saw the joy with which these books were purchased and the delight with which the purchasers carried off their prizes, we were amply rewarded and could but rejoice with them in their new found treasure.

The two weeks we spent among these villagers were a season of delight to us. They listened to the various preachers and there was real sorrow manifested when the time of parting came.

1. O child of God, wait pa-tient-ly When dark thy path may be,
2. O child of God, He lov-eth thee, And thou art all His own;
3. O child of God, how peace-ful-ly He calms thy fears to rest,

And let thy faith lean trust-ing-ly On Him who cares for Thee;
With gen-tle hand He lead-eth thee, Thou dost not walk a-lone;
And draws thee up-ward ten-der-ly, Where dwell the pure and blest;

And though the clouds hang drear-i-ly Up-on the brow of night,
And though thou watchest wea-ri-ly The long and storm-y night,
And He who bend-eth si-lent-ly A-bove the gloom of night,

Yet in the morning joy will come, And fill thy soul with light.
Yet in the morning joy will come, And fill thy soul with light.
Will take thee home where end-less joy Shall fill thy soul with light.

"COME UNTO ME."

HAST thou a sorrow thou hast never told,
Some pain that gnaws in secret at thy heart,

So cruel that sudden tears, unbidden, start,
And earthly comfort seems but strange and cold?

Art thou weary? Ah, the way is hard,
And footsteps falter o'er the broken steep,
And eyes grow heavy, for there is no sleep
Where thorns and shattered rocks the path retard.

And art thou fearful? Strong men in their prime
Have bowed before the silent hand of Death,
And children met, with incense of sweet breath,
The mowers mowing on the hills of time.

Christ has known sorrow deeper than thine own;
He has borne burdens that none else could share;
He has felt weariness thou couldst not share;
He entered death, but rolled away the stone.

Christ will grant joy for all thy lonely sorrow;
Still He bears burdens, gives the weary

Dying in Him, no terror can molest,
And He will meet thee on the dawning morrow.

COMETH.

"Thy King cometh unto thee." Zech. 9: 9.

COMETH, my brother! he heareth thy cry.
Knoweth thy need as the swift moments
Cometh, my sister, and cometh to thee, [fly:
Loveth and hasteth thy helper to be.

Yes, thou hast made him the King of thy Governor over its every part: [heart,
It is his kingdom: He cometh to claim
Every province that owneth his name.

Trials will come, and afflictions and fears,
Sorrows, distresses, and sobs and hot tears,
Yes, but the King cometh, too: so look up!
Jesus is coming to fill thy black cup!

Ring out the pealing of Hope's rusty bell!
"Jesus is coming!" the glad tidings swell!
Cometh already! I hear the drums beat!
Hush! hear you not the tramp of his feet?

Lo, the King cometh to dwell with his own!
Cometh to set in the bosom his throne!
Cometh to counsel, to help, and defend!
Blessed to have such a King for a Friend!

THE WORLD OF THE FUTURE.

Changes Which will Take Place After the Coming of the Lord.

BY THE LATE REV. HUGH McNEILLE.

WHAT will this world be like when Christ shall reign over it as its King and all nations shall obey him? We see something of its character in the first Paradise, but a fuller view is given us in the sure word of prophecy. The heavens must receive the Lord Jesus Christ until the time appointed for the restitution of all things. It is in no way necessary that he should enter into the actual possession of his kingdom immediately upon making the purchase. He designed something different: that after having accomplished the purchase, and finished that part of the work, he should retire from the scene, and put his friends upon a state of trial, a spiritual trial, during his absence, that he might prepare his faithful ones, to reign with him and under him, when he returns to take possession of his kingdom. For, you must remember, that our Lord Jesus Christ will govern the earth by instrumentality. The saints he is gathering from the nations now, those whom we call real Christians are they who shall reign with him: his royal priesthood: his assessors in his throne: ruling under him over five cities, or ten cities, or one city, as the case may be. To prepare that instrumentality, he is now exerting the spiritual influence, which constitutes true religion in the present dispensation. And when that is finished, and that instrumentality is all ready, and the Bride, the Lamb's wife, is prepared, and the elect are called, then he hastens his kingdom, for all his lieutenants are ready to take their post all over the earth, under him as King at Jerusalem, and they shall reign under him in all the ends of the earth.

True, indeed, it is, that the sure word of prophecy informs us that the heavens, the heavenly elements which surround the earth, shall melt with fervent heat, and the earth itself, and the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. But equally true it is, that in immediate connection with this, the same Divine Word adds, "Nevertheless"—that is, notwithstanding this staggering truth—"we, according to his promise,"—we who have faith to rely on his promise in the face of any difficulty—we, "look for new heavens, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." As some help to our faith in this anticipation, the inspired writer invites attention to the nature of the preparatory distinction. This he does by connecting it with a destruction which has already taken place, and of which he speaks in equally decisive terms. "The world that was" before the deluge, "being overflowed with water, perished." No stronger word is used to describe the ruin of the world that now is.

The world that then was, perished, but there was no annihilation. No; for annihilation would be a speechless judgment: annihilation would be a practical confession that there had been a mistake in creation. But there was no mistake. The end was seen from the beginning. Nothing was made in vain: nothing can ever be annihilated. There was no annihilation then, but there was a renovation after destruction by water: and there will be no annihilation now, but renovation after destruction by fire. There was no annihilation in the one case, neither shall there be in the other. This material world remained, though somewhat altered, after it perished by water; and this same material world will remain, after it has perished by fire.

My chief object is to withdraw your attention from a vague, arial, mystified, unearthly anticipation, which has nothing practical in it. It is not the world as it shall be; it is not the good time that's coming. You may depend upon it, we shall have the world firm—firm to stand upon, and not arial as the spiritualists talk. Purified by fire, "the world as it shall be," will be the abode of righteousness: the "ransomed possession" and restored dominion of the second Adam. He shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice upon the earth.

"We see not yet all things put under him." What is the meaning of it but that we shall see it? Can anything be plainer, than that as truly and literally as Jesus Christ was made a little lower than the angels, that is by incarnation: as truly shall all things be put under his feet? "Oh Lord, our Lord, how excellent shall thy name then be through all the earth."

MEN BROUGHT TO JESUS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning August 19. 1. Cor. 9: 19-27.

CONCENTRATION of effort on one supreme object is the lesson taught by the Apostle in the passage selected for the Topic. In order that he may win men for Christ he is willing to subordinate every thing else. He became a servant, he took the attitude of a Jew or of a Gentile, or of a weak man, that he might win souls. It mattered nothing to him if the man's prejudices and principles were absurd, he would adapt himself to the man's standpoint in his own practice even at the cost of self-denial in if by so doing he might hope to win him for Christ. This was no surrender of individuality. No man had a clearer view of the truth than had Paul; but he also had a clear view of what was essential and what was not essential. He refused to be entangled in disputes about minor things. The question of whether a man might eat meat publicly sold, was in his time agitating the Church. Some said it was possible that this meat might be part of a carcass that had been offered in sacrifice to an idol, and they were horrified at the thought that they should eat it. Paul scorned all such silly notions. The kingdom of heaven, he said, was not meat or drink. Still, if the consciences of others were disturbed by it, he would abstain altogether and eat no meat while the world stood. He would not allow such a question to diminish his influence. So with baptism, which still separates the church. He congratulated himself on having kept out of that controversy. He thanked God that he had baptized none of them; God had sent him not to baptize but to preach the Gospel. He wanted to live with men as a brother that he might bring them to Jesus. He would accommodate himself to their ways, respect their weakness, sympathize with their trials, make himself one with them that he might gain their confidence and save their souls. His example gives us the key to success. The Salvation Army has won its way by this means. It went to the slums, it rescued the fallen and sent them to win others. It occupied no pulpits, but sat with the sufferer in his chamber, knelt by the drunkard in the gutter, showed human sympathy and brotherliness, and so accomplished its purpose. And the purpose—what was that? We have too much forgotten it in our day. We have sat at the feet of eloquent and learned preachers to learn of them, but Paul's desire was that men should learn of Christ. His mission was to bring them to Jesus. That achieved, all would be well. Contact with that divine Being would be sufficient for all things. It is the glory of Christianity, the distinguishing feature of the Christian religion — this personal element. Jesus is to all that any man needs. From him directly come all our blessings. Ministers are servants to bring men to him. They cannot save, but they can bring the sinner to One who can save and teach and purify and strengthen. The minister may do much but he has done the chief thing for any man when he has led him to Jesus.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN INDIA.

Bombay Conference can now boast of twelve flourishing Epworth Leagues with a total of 550 members. Four of these Leagues are composed of natives, and work in their native languages. The General Secretary is urging each League to affiliate with the League in America and secure its charter with regular name and number. He promises that the Chapters which work in the vernacular shall have their charter in their own tongue with an English translation. One difficulty and apparently the only one he has yet experienced is in the fact that his duties as Treasurer, which office is combined with that of Secretary, have hitherto been so light. Having received no money he had no duties to perform in the capacity of Treasurer. He intimates that he would be willing and pleased to have such duties, inasmuch as he, as Secretary, is out of pocket for expenses of postage, stationery and travelling expenses.

THREE C. E. PIONEERS.

In view of the magnificent position of the Christian Endeavor Society to-day with its two million members, a peculiar interest attaches to those who were the pioneers in the movement. The portraits which appear on this page will therefore be welcome to all our readers. They are those of the first President of the first Christian Endeavor Society, the first young man to sign the Christian Endeavor pledge and of the first chairman of the British National Council.

Mr. Granville Staples was a member of the Williston Church at Portland, Maine, when Dr. Clark organized the first Society of Christian Endeavor. With the modesty and retiring disposition which has always characterized the pastor he desired that some one other than he should be the President of the Society and Mr. Granville Staples was chosen for the office without a dissentient voice. His piety, geniality and devotion to the society were manifested during his administration, but he was unable to complete the year of office. Business called him to another part of the city and he identified himself with another church. This, however, resulted in good to the church for Mr. Staples promptly organized a society there. Later he removed to Philadelphia where he has been active in Christian Endeavor work. In these days of great things it is no small distinction to have been the first President of the little pioneer society.

Edward L. Sayford was the first juvenile signature attached to the constitution of the Williston Society. The story has often been told of that evening when the idea of the society having been explained and discussed and the constitution framed, Mr. W. H. Pennell affixed his signature to it. The society, however, was chiefly intended for younger people. The middle-aged and the old would be welcome and it is the glory of the Society that it can use any material that comes to it, but it would have missed its object if it had failed to seize and hold the young people. It was, therefore, with peculiar satisfaction that the leader saw a boy of sixteen years, add his name to that of Mr. Pennell on the list. Edward L. Sayford thus became the pioneer of a great multitude who have since then entered the ranks of the great army. Thirteen years have passed since that evening and the sixteen year old boy is now an energetic business man, still a firm believer and an earnest worker in the cause.

Rev. J. B. Morgan, of Chester, is at the head of the great movement in England. As chairman of the National Council he occupies a position similar to that of Dr. F. E. Clark in this country. That he has performed his duties with zeal and tact may be inferred from the rapid growth of the Society in England which might easily have been retarded by an unwise selection of leaders. The number of societies has grown from 18 in 1888 to 1521 in 1894 and new societies are being registered more rapidly than ever before.

AN EPWORTH LEAGUE SYMPOSIUM.

Home criticisms are of the utmost value to any organization, because the critics know most about the subject, and their criticisms are not likely to be attributed to the jealousy of a rival. The replies, therefore, to inquiries as to the weak points in the Epworth League which the editor of the "Epworth Herald" had addressed to prominent friends and workers will command re-

Myrowitz; and "Home Study," by Miss Kate Field. At the afternoon session, various committees were appointed, and voluminous reports were read from circles in various parts of the country. In the evening Mrs. Davis reviewed the year's work of the Order, dwelling on each branch of operations, more particularly on the "Day Nursery," which required an income of $5,000 a year to maintain its efficiency, and on the excellent work of the Tenement House Chapter, whose need was unlimited but which was receiving generous support from circles in near and distant places. Much was being done by this chapter, she said, to remove prejudices existing among working people against religion. She told the story of a beautiful and intelligent girl, who at a meeting of a working girls' club read a paper bristling with anarchistic doctrines, but who has now become, through her association with the Order, a converted girl and a diligent worker, and has herself organized a circle of King's Daughters. She has done valuable work in bringing many working girls who were of her former way of thinking. Many of these girls work ten hours a day to earn $2.50 a week.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Junior Christian Endeavor Union at Washington, D. C., is undertaking to establish a Christian Endeavor country home.

Mr. R. W. Middleton, a former worker in the Adelaide Australia Association, and one who was led to Christ through its agency, has, after spending some time in preparatory study, left for China to join the China Inland Mission.

The Epworth Leagues of Indiana reported at their State Convention recently a gain of 20,000 members. Money raised for the Church and the poor, $26,000.

Every member of a Christian Endeavor Society is asked to give at least one cent a week to the Mission Board of his church. This small sum, if given, will yield an aggregate of a million dollars.

A new denomination was added this year at Cleveland to the number of those holding denominational rallies at the C. E. Convention. It was that of the Mennonites.

Thirty missionaries of the Presbyterian Church, who are laboring in heathen lands are entirely supported by Christian Endeavor Societies. The number of societies contributing to this special object is 725.

At the recent District Convention of the Epworth Leagues of the Fond du Lac, (Wis.), District it was announced that there were twenty-seven Chapters in the District, with an aggregate membership of 1,050.

Under the revised constitution of the Southern Epworth Leagues the preacher in charge has the right of confirmation or rejection of League officers newly elected, when the Quarterly Conference is too far off to wait.

The Junior Epworth League of Willimantic, Conn., has hired a seat in the church, paid for it, and placed at the head of the pew a card, printed: "Junior League Pew. Welcome." This pew is designed for strangers.

The new journal representing the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is called "The Epworth Era." The motto of the League has been changed to "All for Christ." The League flower is the magnolia.

Encouraging news has lately been received from the Young Men's Christian Association secretaries at Jaffa, Jerusalem, and Damascus. From the latter ancient city Rev. Archibald Staurt writes that the first annual meeting has been held, when a cheering report of the year's work was given. He also states that an Association was being formed at the foot of Mount Hermon as a branch of the Damascus Association, and that an Association building for Damascus is contemplated if sufficient funds can be raised.

KING'S DAUGHTERS IN COUNCIL.

An enthusiastic meeting of King's Daughters was held at Ocean Grove, N. J., on July 23. Mrs. Isabella C. Davis, the devoted and efficient Secretary of the Order, presided. Addresses were given in the morning on "The Work among Seamen," by Miss Mary Cookman; "St. Christopher's Asylum," by Mrs. Mason North; "The Kindergarten," by Mrs. Paul Lucknow, the Beautiful.

Where Women and Children Fell Beneath the Sepoy Swords in the Great Mutiny—Rare Art and Architecture.

ONE of the saddest chapters of the terrible Indian mutiny of 1857-58, is recalled by the picture presented on this page. Lucknow, one of the most beautiful of Indian cities, has a history that is dark with blood and slaughter. Wherever the English language is spoken, the story of the siege of Lucknow, in which not only many English soldiers, but a number of women and children, perished, is even now, after the lapse of over thirty years, recited with a thrill of horror. On the night of May 30, 1857, the insurrection broke out among the native troops in the Lucknow garrison. It had not been without its forewarnings, and Sir Henry Lawrence, the commanding officer, had taken all possible precautions. The British troops held the city, but very soon the native military police and native cavalry and infantry revolted, being encouraged by the news of the success of the mutiny in other quarters, and especially at Cawnpore. Officers and civilians, women and children, were murdered, and it was only after an almost superhuman effort that the European force dispersed the rebels and drove them off. But the respite was a brief one. Presently the city was fairly in a state of siege, and the British force of some 600 men, with their wives and children, were compelled to concentrate their efforts on making a stand in the Residency, a stoutly fortified enclosure. Attack after attack was made upon it by the mutineers, and the brave defenders were gradually thinned out.

The siege of the Residency lasted twenty-six days, when Gen. Sir Henry Havelock and Gen. Outram arrived with a relieving force, having fought their way all through. But even after the relief, it became clear that the white force, being outnumbered fifty to one, could not long hold its own.

The sufferings of the women and children who, in order to be protected from the fire of the rebels, were doubly imprisoned, may be imagined. Disease, wounds, thirst, famine, the terrible Indian heat, all did their share in swelling the mortality, and all the besieged united in prayers of thankfulness when the second relief under Sir Colin Campbell arrived. Shortly afterwards the civilians, women and children were released from their long imprisonment in the Residency, and escorted by the army to Cawnpore, the Residency being temporarily abandoned to the enemy. In the following March Sir Colin Campbell again marched upon Lucknow, and after a week's hard fighting, recaptured the city. Both he and Havelock had to fight their way through the streets and through the gate shown in the illustration. The white soldiers, remembering the cruelty of the Sepoys toward the women and children, showed no mercy.

Lucknow is fourth in importance among the cities of India. It presents a picture of unusual magnificence and architectural splendor. The river Gumti flows through it. Famous among its buildings are the Imambara, or Mausoleum of Asaf-ud-daula, the Jama Masjid, or Cathedral Mosque, with its lofty minarets, and the Residency, with its painful memories. Its streets are broader and better than in most Indian towns, and there are many features that help to make it pleasing to the eye. Near the Residency is a mound, beneath which lie 2,000 Europeans, who perished in those terrible months of 1857.

Turning to the peaceful side of life in Lucknow, we find it famed for its muslins and textile fabrics, its gold and silver brocade, gorgeous needle-work embroidery, scope, in the laboratory, seminary, library, or on exploring expeditions. At its best, this spirit of research has awe and reverence enough in it to give it a high and positive religious character, and the best and most characteristic feature about the new movement in higher education I am trying to describe is that its upward tendencies can best be characterized by the word "research," a word, alas, now more often praised than understood.

Two Boys.

Canon Farrar, in one of his latest writings, drew these pen-pictures of two youths, which we commend to the study of all young men: "There are two youths. One has made a choice. As for him, he will, God helping him, try to be a Christian. He knows how hard it is to be a Christian. He knows that he is surrounded with the subtle temptations of the world; he knows that everywhere he carries with him, in his own fallen nature, the germs of many a strong assault of the flesh. He feels, therefore, that—do his best, strive his utmost—he will still, through the frailty of our mortal nature, be an unprofitable servant. But he knows also that he who strives for the mastery will at last be crowned far off in the spiritual city. He has, I say, made his choice. He is Christ's soldier; and he must fight. He is Christ's sentinel; he must watch. He is Christ's athlete; and he must

GRANDMOTHER'S LOOM.

GRANDMOTHER still sat weaving, weaving. Blindly moving the ancient loom. [Sing, "Tell us a story past believing, Stars at the window watch the room; Fire is leaping, birds are sleeping; Grandmother, sing to the ancient loom." "Children hearken, the loom is singing, All those little ones through the sky— Flying stars of eternal winging— Waiting, watching, wandering nigh— All are listening; eyes are glistening; Hearing the loom in the far-off sky. "The loom is wisdom, the loom is living; The loom is beauty, the loom is love; The loom is laboring, weaving, giving— This enough for the stars above. Beauty is old, and anger is cold, And love is labor, and labor love. "This is the song that is past believing, Hear it, children, forget, and play. Over your heads I can see you weaving— Your knees as high as your eyes to-day; This is growing, the one great knowing; Now, my children, forget, and play."

SOCIAL LIFE IN PERSIA.

THE social life of Persia, writes Hon. S. G. W. Benjamin, is conditioned also on its domestic life. Whatever society each sex enjoys must be exclusively with members of its own sex. Women may give entertainments or visit, men may do the same; but on all such occasions only one sex is represented. The interchange of visits among Persian ladies is attended by an etiquette similar to that practiced by the men, with somewhat more attention, perhaps, to serving and urging the guests to eat fruit and confectionery. But except among women of the highest rank, who have private baths attached to their residences, the most important social factor among Persian women is the public bath. There they assemble with their children, and after bathing and having their long tresses dyed with henna and plaited in long braids, which are good for several days, they gather in groups, making the exquisite embroidery for which they are famous, and exchanging the gossip of the neighborhood. Thus they plan the marriages of their children, retail the news they have had from their husbands, and learn what is going on in the world, adding to the means which they possess in no less degree than their European sisters for influencing the male members of their households and swaying the affairs of the nation. They who think that the seclusion of Oriental women results in a diminution of her influence, labor under a great mistake. If anything, this seclusion sharpens their wits and quickens their talent for intrigue and the execution of deep-laid designs, and the men are like putty in their hands.

Occasionally a Persian husband in a sudden paroxysm of rage, or restive under petticoat rule, may temporarily rebel and vigorously assert himself; but he is soon reduced to subjection again, and fair woman resumes her sway. Half the civil wars of Persia have been due to the women.

A man's social life in Persia begins with sunrise, after he has had his early cup of coffee or tea, has said his morning prayer, and issued from the auderoon, or domestic apartments. Social life in that country gives place at twilight to domestic life; there is, of course, no visiting after dark, the whole city retiring, as it were, to the seclusion of the auderoon, and the streets becoming deserted.

jewelry, glass-work and shawls. A good school and mission work is conducted in the city, which has two colleges, and a growing number of educational institutions of lower grade. Rev. Dr. Talmage, who will proceed to India after leaving Australia, will in all probability spend a portion of his time in this famous city, inspecting its beauties and recalling its historical associations.

The Charm of Childhood.

The very finest expression on the face of a child or infant, writes President G. Stanley Hall, seems to me to be that of open-eyed and often open-mouthed curiosity and wonder. The objects of nature charm and entrance the soul, which for the moment becomes almost one with the face. This divinest thing in childhood, which only bad school methods can kill, which prompts the primeval experiments of infants in learning to use their senses, limbs and minds upon nature, is the root of the spirit of research, which explores, pries, inquires so persistently, and often so destructively in older children, and comes to full maturity in the investigator behind the telescope or micro-endure hardship. He is Christ's husbandman; and he must labor in the vineyard. Eagerly, therefore, he avails himself of the Sabbath, to take hold of the hope set before him. He will joyously, loyally, thankfully consecrate that day, not to his own petty amusements, but to God. To him, the Sabbath, its worship, its private prayers, its generous self-denials, its quiet, regular early communion are a bliss and a help worth worlds, and so he remembers the Sabbath day to keep it holy.

"But there is another youth. He, too, has made his choice. He is not going to be one of your 'saints' or 'milk-sops.' He is not going 'to be tied to his mother's apron string.' He means to make the Sabbath day unholy. He will spend it in sloth and dissipation; at the best he will go off on his bicycle, and you will find him lolling over the billiard-table in an ale-house, or with his pipe in his mouth under a tree, with a sporting newspaper in his hand. 'Do you ask me, young men, which of these two will be the happier, the purer, the more blessed; which of the two will be the worthier citizen, the better man, the truer Christian? You can give the answer to yourselves.

CHAPTER VII.
EMANCIPATED.

RESTED and refreshed by "Tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," Zerola awoke. She lay still for some time trying to realize what had happened. The soft couch, the fragrant odors, the clear air, were certainly not of the dungeon. Where was she? Morning by morning, for four long years, the damp earthen smell, the close fetid atmosphere earth choked her as she emerged from dreams to consciousness. Dull, weary and oppressed, there had been none of the exhilaration that she had known on awakening in her home in Nazareth. But on this morning the old sensations seemed to have come back. And what was that strange feeling in her poor blind eyes? It was painful at first, like the thawing of some frozen member. But it meant returning eye-sight. Zerola knew that, and welcomed the pain gladly. Vaguely distinguishable was something brilliant, which she knew must be a stream of sunlight penetrating the darkness of the apartment. Was she dreaming still? She closed her eyes and the glory was shut out. She opened them and it returned. O joy! her eyes were really resuming their functions, and could tell her that the sun had risen. She closed them for a moment to thank God in grateful prayer. How good he was! Darkness was not to be her lot through the remainder of her life, as she had feared. What a blessing sight would be! Only those really know it who recover it after losing it.

And the couch, what was that? Zerola's fingers strayed around its edge, touching inquiringly delicate carving, soft, silky covering and heavy tapestry; to one who had lain night after night on the earthy mould, this was indeed a strange awakening.

Presently a sweet, soft voice fell on her ear, and swiftly Zerola perceived a new evidence of her returning sight, for the sunlight was intercepted by something moving across its path. The old knowledge and association helped her to recognize the moving thing as a human figure, and by the robe and graceful undulating movement, it must be the figure of a woman. The voice set the question at rest, for it was a woman's voice, soft and caressing.

"Are you awake, little one?" it asked in melodious accents. "Ah, I see you are. Will you not rise and eat? I will send my women to help you bathe and dress. Do not hasten, all the day is your own."

Zerola stretched out her hand, once plump and finely formed, but now shrunken and ashen gray from long absence of light and air. "Kind lady," she said, "tell me, I pray you, what has happened to me? Where am I? For years I have seen nothing but gloomy walls around me when I waked, and of late not even those. I cannot see you now, but your voice thrills me. No one has spoken to me in such tones since my mother bade me farewell, long ago in my own land."

"You have been taken out of your cruel prison, my dear," Corthene answered. "Corbulo, my husband, found you there during the storm and the great fire last night and brought you here. This is his home, and we shall protect you and try to make you happy. You have been the victim of a wicked plot, but you are safe now, for you belong to us. Have no fear; my husband's influence is strong enough to save you from your enemies. He will make inquiries and will bring those who have wronged you to justice. I will leave you now to rise and dress. But tell me, is the story true that I have heard that you are a near relative of the young Teacher of Nazareth?"

"Yes, lady, it is true," Zerola answered. "I am spoken of in my land as his sister, but I am really his cousin. Family ties are strong among my people, and our kin are brothers and sisters in love, even when we are not children of the same parents. I do not claim to be a sister of Jesus, and would not even if Mary had been my mother. You do not know, perhaps, that to be was a solemn mystery about his birth that sets him apart from all others. But I love him more than a sister ever loved a brother. He is all in all to me."

"You mean he was. He is dead; I heard of his cruel death."

"Oh, no, I mean he is still beloved. He is not dead. He is risen; he lives, and I can never think of him as dead. With more than a hundred others I saw him after he was nailed to the cross."

"Well," said Corthene, "we will talk more of this later when you have eaten and rested. Perhaps your long imprisonment has confused your mind. Crucified men do not come to life again; your intense love has deceived you. We are apt to believe that what we wish is really fact. But you can tell me much that I want to know, and I want you to love me and tell me all you remember of your wonderful Teacher. But first you must rest and recover."

An hour later a slave led Zerola into the spacious room in which Corbulo and Corthene were sitting, Corbulo busy with letters brought to him by one of his soldiers, and Corthene at work on the exquisite embroidery in which, like other Roman ladies, she was an adept. Zerola looked timidly around her as she entered. Her slowly-returning vision perceived the objects in the bright light, but vaguely and without recognition. She moved uncertainly, but with a native grace, and the rich garments with which Corthene had ordered her to be clothed, set off her lithe form to perfection. The slave, in obedience to a gesture from Corthene, led Zerola to a seat near the general and his wife and retired.

Corbulo greeted her kindly. "I know something of your story," he said, "but I would fain learn all the facts from your own lips. Tell me how it was that after buying you legally in Jerusalem and sending you to my wife in Rome, I do not hear of you again until I learn that you are in that awful dungeon, where I found you last night more dead than alive."

"I fear," said Zerola, "that I cannot give a connected account of the circumstances. I do not know what really occurred, as I was taken on the first day of the voyage and secluded and treated as a prisoner, and when we reached Rome I was confused with the great city, and was hurried from place to place and finally thrust into the dungeon."

"But why did the Captain of the ship treat you so? I will have him severely punished for disobeying my orders. I told him to treat you with the greatest kindness and deliver you to my wife."

"Oh, do not have any one punished on my account," Zerola pleaded. "I want in all things to be true to my faith. My Lord taught us to love our enemies, to pray for our persecutors. He did so himself in his dying hour, and I want to be like him. The Captain was not really to blame. There was a man on the ship who hated me because I would not give up my lover for him, and I think it was he who persuaded the Captain to treat me harshly. He may have led the Captain to believe that I deserved to be imprisoned. He is a very treacherous, deceitful man."

"I know him," Corbulo exclaimed; "it is Karmes, the Egyptian. I think you are probably right about your misfortunes being due to his influence. He has already been punished. He was in the same prison with you, but not for what he did to you. He has committed many crimes, and it was for one of these that he was sent to prison. There is no need for you to plead for him to be forgiven, for I believe he is dead."

Corbulo had noticed several bodies in the ruins of the prison, with all their life crushed out by the falling masonry; but had not the time to examine them. Yet in the few quick glances which he could get he thought that one looked very much like the carcass, as he called it, of the plotting Egyptian who had persuaded the captain to betray his trust and play him false.

Nevertheless he was mistaken; Karmes had escaped.

And perhaps by this time had learned from the two women who witnessed the scene by the statue, that Corbulo had killed his sister. For Karmes was a half-brother to the hag. Hate and revenge, how strong they are! What they would next prompt the daring Egyptian to, who can tell?

The duties of his office demanding Corbulo's attention, he left his wife and Zerola together while he went to meet his officers. Corthene approached the girl and said: "You spoke just now of your lover, tell me of him. Is he living? Why did he allow you to be seized and sold?"

"Alas, lady, I know not. I parted from him in Jerusalem at night and he promised to meet me in the morning to accompany me to my home at Nazareth. I have not seen him since. As I was going to our meeting place, I was seized and taken to court. One, Saul, who hates the Nazarenes and was the cause of the murder of my lover's father, a noble man named Stephen, denounced me to the rulers of the people and I was sold as a slave. Perhaps my beloved Thæon never knew what became of me. He may be searching for me now."

"Poor girl! It is cruel to have used you so. A curse on any man who robs a girl of her lover. Do you know what has happened to Saul? He is now himself a follower of the Nazarene and one of the most active of those who preach for him. He is coming to Rome to preach. He is a wonderful man and has talked with my husband who has a great admiration for him. Since he adopted the new faith, he has grieved over your suffering and repented of his share in bringing it about. He has sought for you everywhere that he might restore you to your parents."

"Saul a follower of Jesus!" Zerola exclaimed. "Surely you are mistaken."

"No," said Corthene, "my husband knows all the circumstances. Paul—he is now known by that name—told him of them. It was a very sudden affair and Paul seems to think it was miraculous."

"It must have been so," said Zerola. "Nothing less than a miracle could have changed the man. He was very fierce and relentless. Of all the men I ever met, he is the one I should have thought the least likely to become a follower of Jesus."

"Can you forgive him for being the cause of your misery? You said that the Great Teacher taught you to love your enemies. That is a hard duty. Was all his teaching as contrary to human nature as that? Tell me about him; I know so little but I want to know everything. You who knew him and love him can tell me about him. I would have you stay with me and show me how I ought to live to be his follower; but you must want to go to your home, to your lover and your mother. Well you will stay for a time to teach us, Corbulo and me, and then we will emancipate you and send you back to Nazareth."

Zerola needed no urging to speak of him whom her soul loved. She told her mistress about his strange, supernatural birth, of his boyhood and home life, of the scene at his baptism and of his ministry, his miracles, his sweet, gentle, compassionate life and his tragic death. Then, most wonderful of all, of his resurrection and ascension. Corthene listened intently, asking many questions as the narrative proceeded. In those days the word was carried so from one to another. There were no books full of the story; but men and women treasured up all they heard and repeated it lovingly, tenderly. This was an eloquent speaker—one who speaks from a heart overflowing with love, who had looked on that divine countenance, who had listened to the heavenly voice and had seen much of that life of sublime devotion. Zerola could not weary of her subject and lamented only that she could not by any words she could utter present her Lord to her hearer's mind as he appeared to her own. Then, it was not doctrine, nor ritual that his followers talked of, but him. Jesus was their theme and their theology was summed up in being like him.

Corthene was deeply moved by Zerola's words. The girl's enthusiasm gave them power and the story told since then millions of times in many lands and in many tongues had the effect then as it has now, when the speaker and the listener are in earnest. Corthene begged that Corbulo should hear it. Paul had told him much and other preachers he had heard, but Corthene longed that this gentle girl should speak to him as she had done to her. Zerola was glad to have the opportunity and he heard and believed.

Day by day the talk of the husband and wife and the Hebrew girl was on the same subject which never grew old. But one day as Zerola was describing the walk about Bethany and the Mount of Olives, her voice faltered and she broke into a flood of tears. "She must go home," said Corthene.

A day later—and the girl of Palestine, set at liberty by Corbulo and Corthene, was in the swiftest galley of the Roman General, speeding towards her native land across the blue waters of that waveless sea. However, this voyage was not waveless nor dreary; a gentle breeze helped them onward, on towards home.

Delayed by a storm, Paul had waited at Myra until the arrival of the ship. Now he too was on the Mediterranean, speeding across the waters to his native land. Stranger than chance, the scholar and the slave, apostle and kinswoman of the Nazarene, going home to Palestine in the same ship; neither being aware of the presence of the other.

"How bright the waters, how fresh the mind, how clear the sky!" thought the young emancipated girl.

Now the blind slave is no longer a slave, and more—no longer blind; her temporary loss of sight having been simply the result of dwelling for a considerable period where it was impossible to use the eyes.

Sight restored! Darkness gone; sunshine come!

For many days the ship sailed merrily on, and Zerola felt that secret pleasure which all girls love and deny, the pleasure of being ardently loved by a noble man. For she knew that Thæon loved her with all the intensity of a strong and passionate nature. She was his soul's joy.

Yes, sunshine had indeed come; very soon she would be in Nazareth. And then—what happiness!

But the sunshine always brings the shadows. Thæon, full of hope, was then seeking her in Rome. The two lovers, each seeking the other, were journeying in opposite directions.

Thæon knew that the utmost caution was necessary. The clue he was following in journeying to Rome was of the slightest kind; but he was pursuing that as he had pursued others. They had taunted him, but love of the kind that glowed in his heart is never given to despair. He arranged his plans on the voyage. He would go first to some Christians he knew and inquire of them the way to gain access to Corbulo's household. He must learn first if a slave answering to Zerola's description had been brought into it four years ago. That was the first step to be taken. If that failed he would try the other clue that centered in Karmes, for Thæon still clung to the belief that the Egyptian was in some way concerned in Zerola's abduction.

With these plans arranged Thæon landed at Rome. He had some difficulty in finding the Christians of whom he had resolved first to seek information. The prejudice against them was bitter and they had sought safety in hiding. Thæon's inquiries were all met by evasion. No one would admit that they knew their place of residence, and in this they were trying to protect the fugitives. Thæon's speech betrayed his Jewish nationality, and the Christians in Rome had no enemies so dangerous or so relentless as the Jews. Days drew out to weeks, and still Thæon pursued his quest without success. Every morning he watched for an hour or more outside the palace of Corbulo, hoping that at some door or casement he might catch a glimpse of the beloved face. Then he would go away sadly to resume his search for the Christian people who he thought might help him. Oh, had he but known that she whom he sought was sailing toward her native land, that her long trial was past, and that she was going with joy in her heart to Nazareth, hoping to find him there! Had he but taken courage and have gone boldly to Corbulo and asked him about Zerola, how much toil and weariness and danger he might have been saved. But Corbulo was a great man, and Thæon thought the General would not receive him, and might even seize him and cast him into prison on the charge of designing the liberation of one of his slaves. So Thæon went on blindly seeking. He was in more danger than he knew. One day he noticed that he was followed by dangerous-looking men, and he suspected that some enemy was plotting against him.

Karmes had seen Thæon; and following him, looking closely at him with his black eyes, suddenly remembered who he was. Then the Egyptian began to plot anew.

An "Advance Guard" for Christ!

What Mr. Moody Has Already Accomplished at the Bible Institute—Over 1,200 Students Enrolled Since 1890—The Gospel Fund is Now Over $3,000.

It is very desirable that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and more particularly those who have been active in aiding this new Gospel Crusade begun by Mr. Moody, should know just what has been accomplished by the Bible Institute from its inception up to the present time. They have adopted the cause of the Institute, and in the highest sense, made its work their own, and upon their material and spiritual co-operation its future usefulness will largely depend. For the general information and encouragement, therefore, of those thousands of earnest Christian men and women in every State of the Union who have shown a disposition to join with us in this grand work for the Master, we present below a resume of what has already been done since the Institute was established, several years ago. This record shows with what tremendous energy and zeal Mr. Moody and his band of associates have labored, in the face of obstacles and discouragements that would have compelled most men to have abandoned the work. But it has been blessed of God under their hands, and not less than TWELVE HUNDRED STUDENTS have been trained, equipped and prepared by the Bible Institute to do battle for Christ among the unevangelized masses at home and abroad.

Here is the record, which tells its own story more eloquently than any words of ours:

Although 817 male students only are accounted for, there have been fully 900 trained, but until 1890-91 the records of the Institute were not kept with the necessary care and completeness, and the information preceding that date is therefore scant.

Total Women Students..... 402
Making a grand total in both departments of 1219 students of both sexes and all nationalities, whose names thus far have been entered upon the rolls of the Bible Institute. Many hundreds of these consecrated young men and women are now engaged in evangelical work in different parts of the world, a very large proportion of them in our own land. About 240, included in this total, are now in the Institute under training.

This is, however, only the advance guard of the great Gospel Army which the Bible Institute stands ready to train and commission for Christian work at home, a campaign in which Mr. Moody has personally invited our readers to join hands and hearts with his workers and himself. Thousands more are needed to carry the Gospel into the homes of our 30,000,000 non-church-goers. It is a campaign for precious souls and all will do well to give heed to the appeal.

Cheering letters from dear friends whose enthusiasm has been awakened for the work, continue to be received in increasing numbers by every day's mail. It is peculiarly touching to note the effect of Mr. Moody's appeal on the hearts of these godly people, who are ever ready to make sacrifice for the Master's sake. One lady (Miss E. A. B., of Caledonia, N.Y.), writes, enclosing $4.75, the gift of eight friends: "The best investment of money that can be made, be it little or much, is to place it in the savings bank of heaven; for besides the delight we have in helping to send the knowledge of our dear Saviour's salvation to the perishing, we have the Great President's promise: 'He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth to the Lord and that which he hath given will he pay him again.'"

Another friend, Mrs. B. A. H., of Plainfield, N. J., contributes $100 as a "Memorial gift," doubtless a tribute to the memory of some dear one gone before. The sorrowful as well as the joyful, the rich and the poor, are all moved to have a share in the work. L. J. B., South Boston, in forwarding $5, writes: "This coin is a memento of my sainted mother, who passed on to glory six years ago."

The Moody Gospel Fund, has now passed the $3,000 mark and is still being generously augmented by subscriptions from many different quarters. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will acknowledge in these columns all moneys received for the Fund. The latest contributions during the week are as follows:

LINCOLN'S SIMPLE WAYS.
An incident is related which shows how simple and kind-hearted President Lincoln was and how he honored old friends. "A young nobleman was just being presented to the president. Inside the door, overawed by the splendid assemblage, was an honest-faced old farmer who shrank from the passing crowd until he and the plain-faced old lady clinging to his arm were pressed back to the wall. The president, looking over the heads of the assembly, said to the nobleman: 'Excuse me, my lord, there's an old friend of mine.' Passing backward to the door, Mr. Lincoln said, as he grasped the old farmer's hand: 'Why, John, I'm glad to see you. I haven't seen you since you and I made rails for old Mr. — in Sagamon county in 1847. How are you?' The old man turned to his wife with quivering lip, and without replying to the salutation, said: 'Mother, he's just the same old Ate!' "Mr. Lincoln," he said finally, "you know we had three boys; they all enlisted in the same company; John was killed in the 'seven days' fight, Sam was taken prisoner and starved to death, and Henry is in the hospital. We had a little money, an' I said: 'Mother, we'll go to Washington an' see him. An' while we are there we'll go up an' see the president.'" Mr. Lincoln's eyes grew dim and across the rugged, homely, tender face swept the wave of sadness his friends had learned to know, and he said: 'John, we all hope this miserable war will soon be over. I must see all these folks here for an hour or so, and I want to talk with you.' The old lady and her husband were placed in a private room in spite of all their protests.

THE BOOK SHELF

THE FUTURE OF BOOKS.*

MEN of letters will not be called Writers in the time soon to be, but rather, Narrators. Little by little the taste for style and for pompously decorated phrases will die away, but the art of utterance will take on unheard-of importance. Certain narrators will be sought out for their time address, their contagious sympathy, their thrilling warmth, and the perfect accuracy, the fine punctuation of their voice.

The ladies will no longer say in speaking of a successful author, "What a charming writer!" All shuddering with emotion, they will sigh, "Ah, how this? 'Teller's' voice thrills you, charms you, moves you! What adorable low tones, what heart-rending accents of love! When you hear his voice you are fairly exhausted with emotion. There is no ravisher of the ear like him!"

Libraries will be transformed into phonographotects; they will contain the works of human genius on properly labelled cylinders, methodically arranged in little cases, rows upon rows, on shelves. The favorite editions will be the autophonographs of artists most in vogue; for example, every one will be asking for Coquelin's "Moliere," Irving's "Shakespeare," Salvini's "Dante," while Goethe, Milton, Byron, Dickens, Emerson, Tennyson, Musset and others will have been "vibrated upon cylinders by favorite Tellers."

The kinetograph will be the illustrator of daily life; not only shall we see it operating in its case, but by a system of lenses and reflectors all the figures in action which it will present in photo-cromo may be projected upon large white screens in our own homes.

Scenes described will be imitated by appropriately dressed figurants and immediately recorded. We shall also have, by way of supplement to the daily phonographic journal, a series of illustrations of the day—slices of active life, so to speak, fresh cut from the actual. Men will soon be dissatisfied with printed interviews, more or less correctly reported. They will insist upon hearing the interviewee, upon listening to the discourse of the fashionable orator, hearing the actual song, the very voice of the diva whose first appearance was made over-night. What but the phonographic journal can give them all this? The voices of the whole world will be gathered up in the celluloid rolls which the post will bring, morning by morning, to the subscribing hearers. They may hear it all, as if in a dream—foreign telegrams, financial news, humorous articles, and all the news of the day.

lost, a few observations will suffice to show that none of the writings which are accounted sacred by the Jews and Christians (and which claim to be received as inspired writings), ever were or could be lost, and consequently that no sacred or inspired writing is now wanting to complete the canon of Scripture. I. It seems very unsuitable to the ordinary conduct of Divine Providence to suffer a book written under the influence of the Holy Spirit to be lost. II. The zeal of the faithful at all times for their sacred books was such as would be a very effectual means to secure them from perishing. III. The canonical books, either in the original languages or by means of versions, were dispersed in many countries, and in possession of innumerable persons. IV. The books of the Old Testament supposed to be lost were in all probability nothing more than brief records, or memoranda, of certain events, the substance of which the sacred historian had incorporated into his history. 1. The word "sepher," which in the English Bible is rendered book, signifies the bare rehearsal of anything, or any kind of writing, however small. Take the following examples: Bill of divorce (Deuteronomy 24: 1), is in the original a book of divorce; the genealogical table of our Lord's descent (Matt. 1: 1), is called in the Hebrew idiom a book; David's letter to Joab (II. Samuel 11: 14, 15), is a book both in Hebrew and Greek, as also the letter which Naaman brought from his royal master, Benhadad, to King Joram (II. Kings 5: 5). See, also, Matthew 10: 7, and Mark 10: 4. 2. Several of the tracts referred to as books, and which are either lost or their substance incorporated in the books we have, were written by uninspired men—public recorders or chroniclers of passing events. 3. The bare citation of any book in a canonical writing is not sufficient to prove that such book was ever canonical. 4. As to those books supposed to be lost, let it be observed that the book of the Covenant (Exodus 24: 7), refers to nothing else than the injunctions and exhortations laid down in the four preceding chapters; the book of the Wars of the Lord (Numbers 21: 14), is that very record which, upon the defeat of the Amalekites, Moses was commanded to make a record of and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua; the book of Jasher (Joshua 10: 13), was not a divinely inspired record. Josephus says it was the work of an ordinary historiographer, and which, like our "year-books," contained records of occurrences from year to year; and lastly, we have no reason to conclude that the three thousand proverbs, and the one thousand and five songs of Solomon, as well as his treatises on the natural history of plants and animals (which belong to philosophy), were inspired writings. Upon the whole, then, we may conclude that if any books of the Old Testament seem to be wanting in our present canon, they are either such as are incorporated in the canonical writings, or are writings which were never admitted as canonical.

It may be well to repeat, what has already been premised, that these missing books never occupied a place in the sacred canon, not having been received by the Church as a part of Divine revelation, and consequently their loss is little to be regretted.

Old John Brown was thoroughly hated or admired. He had participated in the Kansas troubles and it is said by his enemies that he murdered and plundered. That he took human life cannot be denied, perhaps not for the sake of plunder, but from the extreme fanatical bent of his mind. Brown was a native of Connecticut, and at this time in the sixtieth year of his age. He espoused the cause of abolition very early in life, and was enthusiastic and brave. It is history to be believed, he was unscrupulous as to the methods by which he sought to gain his ends. He had been active in the midst of the troubles in Kansas, and had suffered much; and he believed himself to be the destined liberator of the slaves in the American Republic.

John Brown's whole soul was wrapped up in the liberation of the slaves, his motive was good; but his means were foolish and diabolical. He was no Christian; for he killed and incited others to do the same. He was no soldier; for a good general would never have allowed himself to be caught in such a trap, as he was at Harper's Ferry. Just what he intended is a mystery. Before his capture, while seizing Harper's Ferry, he declared his intention to "free the slaves." After his capture, he stated that he never intended a general insurrection. That he was a martyr to the freedom of the negroes, there is cause for dispute, for it may be doubted if his death had anything to do with their freedom.

But John Brown acted on that very night. One by one, his followers had been stealthily congregating, and pikes, guns, and ammunition gathered together for striking the first blow at Virginia and arming the slaves. The refusal of Mark to take part in the insurrection, and the tears that he might betray his plans caused him to act at once. Under cover of profound darkness, Brown, at the head of seventeen white men and five negroes, entered the village of Harper's Ferry on that fatal Sunday night, put out the street lights, and seized the armory and the railway bridge, and quietly arrested and imprisoned in the government buildings the citizens found in the streets at the earliest hours of the next morning, each one being ignorant of what had happened. The invaders seized Colonel Washington, living a few miles from Harper's Ferry, with his arms and horses, and liberated his slaves, and at eight o'clock on Monday morning, the 17th of October, Brown and his followers (among whom were two of his sons), had full possession of the village and government works. His action was as much an act of open rebellion as the attack and capture of Fort Sumter. When asked what his purpose was, and by what authority he acted, Brown replied: "To free the slaves, and by the authority of God Almighty."

He thought that when he struck this blow the negroes of the surrounding country would rise and flock to his standard. He believed that a general uprising of the slaves of the whole country would follow, and that he would win the satisfaction of being a great liberator.

FOR WAKEFUL HOURS.

The following lines were given by the late Robert Charlton, to a member of the Society of Friends, who suffered from sleeplessness:

When courting slumber,
The hours I number,
And sad thoughts cumber
My weary mind,

The thought shall cheer me—
Thou, Lord, art near me,
Whose ear to hear me
Is well inclined.

My soul Thou keepest
Who never sleepest;
In gloom the deepest

Thine eyes behold me;
Thine arms enfold me;
Thy Word has told me
That "God is Love."

By our Special Commissioner

With Mr. David Cherrett, The Shrubbery, Newtown, Parkstone, Dorset.

In more ways than one Mr. David Cherrett is a remarkable man. In the first place after being discharged years ago from the Royal Navy as "beyond recovery," he is now well, hale, and hearty.

In the second, being compelled by his business to walk nearly all day every day, he counts it a privilege to walk on most regular week-evenings, and mostly every Sunday, six or seven miles to hold preaching services.

At my request Mr. Sherrett came to me at my hotel in Bournemouth, and there it was we had the brief conversation which follows:

My first question had reference to the disease mentioned on Mr. Cherrett's certificate of discharge from the Royal Navy, and his condition of health at that time. In reply Mr. Cherrett said:

"I was in the hospital about three months, having previously been for a short time in sick quarters. The entry on the certificate shows that I was suffering from chronic bronchitis and general debility. I raised a large quantity of phlegm, and sometimes a little blood."

"I saw your sister a month ago, Mr. Cherrett, and she told me she quite thought you were going to die. Did you share her belief?"

"Well, I certainly didn't think I was going to get better. I was very weak indeed, but I soon gained strength after I had adopted Mr. Congreve's treatment for a few weeks. My recovery was gradual, but I am thankful to say it was sure, and my cure has been permanent."

"Then you have had no return of any of the symptoms since?"

"None at all."

"How long ago was this, Mr. Cherrett?"

"Between nine and ten years ago; it was in January, 1883, that I left the navy."

"Do you mind telling me what you have done for a living since?"

"For some years now I have been selling tea in the villages in the district."

"Does not that involve a great deal of walking?"

"Yes, I walk on an average one hundred miles a week—winter and summer—all the year round."

"That seems a great distance, Mr. Cherrett?"

"I think nothing of it."

Here I feel compelled to say that although he might have ridden nearly the whole distance by train, Mr. Cherrett chose to walk from his residence to Bournemouth—a distance of five miles each way, and that after walking all day on his business.

In answer to a further question, Mr. Cherrett said:

"I am a lay preacher connected with the Baptist denomination, and it very seldom happens that I have a free evening. I am conducting services somewhere or other in the villages, and I usually walk to my engagements."

"Shall I be right in saying that since you recovered under Mr. Congreve's care you have aided nothing?"

"I have had the best of health. Quite recently I have been examined by a doctor, who has certified that I am quite fit for work in the foreign mission-field. I have recommended Mr. Congreve's treatment largely, and I know many who have benefited by following it."

Mr. Sherrett was good enough to accord me his permission to publish this account of our interview, and to say that he would be glad at any time to answer any inquiries from persons who may be interested in cases similar to his own.

(In a letter of Jan. 4 [written since this interview] Mr. Cherrett says: "I am constantly recommending your treatment. In going about as a local preacher I have frequent opportunities so to do.")

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had, post free, for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of 50 cts., $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

THE DEAD EXPLORER.

C REMARKABLE man who did much to open up to scholars of the present day the veritable history of the far past, recently died in London. This was Sir Henry Layard, the veteran diplomatist and archaeologist. He was a Parisian by birth, an Italian by education and an Englishman by paternity. This mixed origin was used against him when he presented himself for election in Parliament on the hustings of an English city, where rough jokes are often perpetrated, but Layard won the sympathy of the laughing crowd by asking his opponent whether if a man were born in a stable he would call him a horse. He was to have been a lawyer, but in 1838, when he was twenty-one years old, he received an offer of an appointment in Ceylon. He was making his way to India overland, and spending a weary interval of waiting at Bagdad, when he became interested in the mounds under which he subsequently found the ruins of ancient Nineveh. Having accidentally made the acquaintance of Sir Stratford Canning, he talked with him about the mounds and through him obtained the Sultan's permission to search them. The result was the discovery of the famous palace of Sardanapalus, on the walls of which were the frescoes now in the British Museum. The work of excavation occupied several years and several more were spent on the volumes in which Layard described his discoveries. He then commenced a political career in the course of which he three times held office in the Government, and was also ambassador at Madrid and Constantinople. In 1880, at the age of sixty-three, he retired into private life devoting his time to the production of works on Assyria, Persia and other Oriental lands.

A SOUL AT AUCTION.

In a recent sermon, Rev. John Robertson, of Glasgow, related the following remarkable incident: It is difficult for a man who is born with a coat of arms on him to get salvation. We never have had that difficulty between us and the common people's Christ; but I assure you it is a difficulty and a big one. To be born with family traditions and to fling them aside is difficult, and Paul, who must have felt that pride of birth, flung it aside for Jesus. When Lady Ann Erskine, passing through that London crowd in her carriage, heard borne on the evening breeze the voice of the preacher, she asked her coachman to drive near to hear what he was saying. Rowland Hill saw her and stopped in his discourse, and he said: "Listen! here is a titled lady. The auction of eternity has begun and there are offers being made for her of high birth to-night. The devil says I will give pleasure, I will give a presentation to the court, I will give luxury, I will give all the attractions of the world for her! Will the hammer fall? Hark!" he said, "there is another voice that bids. It is the voice of Jesus that says, I will give my life for her, I will give my precious blood for her. I that was born the Son of God, that came from glory, will give myself for her. Sins, and never-dying soul, what is to be the decision? Who is to get her? Now or never!" "Drive on," said Lady Erskine to her coachman, but up there in her room that night the arrow had gone home, and she put aside her high birth and her society life, and her pride of blood, and she accepted Christ.

OPENING UP AFRICA.

Railroad-working in Africa is aiding civilization and the Gospel wondrously. It is, however, an expensive business without much prospect of immediate returns. In the Belgian Chamber the other day a statement in regard to the Congo railway was made by M. De Sinet de Nayer showing that the cause of construction originally estimated at $5,000,000 will probably reach $12,000,000 and that its maintenance will require an annual outlay of $400,000, thus exceeding by $60,000 the estimated maximum of receipts. The difficulties in the way of construction have been far greater than were anticipated and after three years of effort only the first section of the line from Matadi to Kenge, a distance of forty kilometres, was accomplished. The company, however, maintains that after the first one hundred and seventy-five kilometres have been built the road can be profitably operated, and having made as favorable a statement as possible of its prospects, asked the Chamber for a subsidy of $2,000,000. Undoubtedly the opening of the vast Congo region by means of railways and steamers will accelerate the settlement of southern and central Africa, the movement toward which has received considerable impetus recently. The areas now left open for colonization and settlement in other quarters of the world are daily becoming smaller, and Africa from the Equator southward is at present one of the most promising fields. Nevertheless it must be admitted that the Belgian government if it carries out its great enterprise will deserve the thanks of the civilized world, for it is scarcely conceivable that the railroad can be built and operated with profit for many years to come.

"JUST TOO LATE!"

I remember once in China, said Miss Geraldine Guinness at a recent meeting in England, being called hurriedly to see a woman who had taken some poison a few hours before, to put an end to her life, because of the misery and wretchedness of her home. I went with all the speed that I could and found that it was a wealthy mansion standing outside the city gates. When I got there I was led into the front courtyard; and there some ladies of the household met me and said, "Oh! do make haste; we feared it might be too late, but we want you to do all you can to save her life." They led me hurriedly across the second court-yard to the house where the woman lived, and there, as I came near the house, I saw lying in the door-way this young girl who had taken the poison. They had laid her where the sunshine would fall on her, and she was covered with a quilt. I asked for the things I required, and went and knelt beside her on the ground. The crowd gathered around me—the ladies, the servants, the children, all in silence, to see what was going to be done. And in the sunshine of that Chinese court-yard I drew back from her face the covering they had spread over her. I expected to find she was in a serious condition, but I was not prepared for what I saw. As the sunlight fell on that pale, beautiful face—for it was beautiful—and the masses of dark hair fell over the bedding, I saw she was gone! I touched the cheek, it was still warm; I raised the hand, it fell lifeless. She had just gone, probably as we crossed the threshold. Her spirit had gone forever beyond our reach! I could not speak: my heart stood still for the great yearning and longing that I had. The women gathered around me:—"Oh! do make haste; oh, do give her some medicine quickly." The clamor and noise went on, but I looked up to them and said: "Don't you see she is dead? She is gone." "Oh! she is only just dead," they cried—"only just this moment—you can bring her back again." We heard only the other day that you had raised a woman from the dead. Her spirit is not gone far." It was a number of minutes before I could speak to convince them that it was no use, for she was beyond recall by us. But as the noise went on around me, and I looked upon that quiet face, I realized what nobody else there could realize—the great change that had come to that young soul! I realized that, as in this death, hundreds and thousands in China are slipping away beyond our reach day by day, hour by hour; a thousand every hour slipping away beyond the reach of help that we could bring them now! It went right into my heart!

BY THE WATERS OF GALILEE.

Once Surrounded by Populous Cities, but now Almost Deserted.

SIXTY miles northeast of Jerusalem, in a broad, cup-like basin, surrounded by low hills, lies a placid sheet of water, whose blue depths mirror the sapphire tints of the sky above. On the shores of this little inland sea—it is only thirteen miles in length and six miles across—a very large part of our Lord's public life on earth was spent. The Sea of Galilee, the Sea of Gennesaret, or Lake Tiberias, as it is variously known, was in former times surrounded by a dense population, no less than nine large cities having stood on its shores. Of these, Tiberias was the most important in the time of Christ, and it is the only one that has escaped the ruin of the centuries and survived with its name unchanged. It was the capital of Galilee for many years, having been founded by Herod Antipater, who brought with him from Italy, where he had passed his youth, a taste for display and fine structures, which soon transformed the bare hillside into a beautiful and attractive city of princely palaces and splendid buildings. There he erected a stadium, in which the young men were trained for feats of arms, and his palace was so costly in its adornments, and especially in its sculptures, as to excite comment among the Jews, who disliked the figures of animals with which it was outwardly ornamented.

It is remarkable that no record exists to show that Jesus, who spent so much of his life in and around Galilee, ever visited the city of Tiberias. The only mention made of it in the New Testament is in John 6: 23. It was a centre of Jewish learning and a number of famous academies flourished there, one of its most distinguished citizens being the great Rabbi Judah Hakkodesh, who compiled the Mishna there about 100 A.D. Under Turkish rule it now has a mixed population of some 4,000 Mohammedans, Jews and Christians. It has greatly degenerated and is now described by travelers as a filthy city, intensely hot in the summer months. In 1837 it was almost destroyed by an earthquake in which six hundred persons perished.

Our illustration on this page affords a glimpse of the margin of this historic lake, with a group of natives resting on the pebbly beach, while a pleasure boat and small fishing craft ride on the calm surface a slight distance off shore. The scenery is for the most part, now bleak and monotonous, and the gorge or depression in which the lake lies is exposed to frequent sudden and violent storms. It was doubtless one of these storms that the Judæan fishermen were caught when, seeming about to sink, they appealed to Christ in the memorable words, "Lord, save us, we perish!" "and he rebuked the winds and the sea, and there was a great calm." Some of Christ's most remarkable miracles were performed on the coasts of this little inland sea. Near Chorazin, one of the towns on its border, he healed the leper; at Capernaum, another long-dead city, but which was then in its glory, he cured the man stricken with palsy, restored the withered hand, and healed Simon's wife's mother. Many nights did the Saviour spend in vigil on the bare mountain sides and overlooking those Galileean waters. It was there he called and ordained his twelve apostles, and there he uttered many of those in the "uplands of Galilee," was performed the first of the Saviour's miracles, the turning of water into wine at the marriage-feast. This incident of his sojourn in Galilee, forms the subject of the Sunday School lesson which is discussed on another page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

At different times during his ministry, the various cities along the lake were doubtless visited by the Saviour. The entire district of Galilee was to a great extent the focus of his activities. Those large cities, Bethsaida, Chorazin, Capernaum, Dalmanutha and Magdala, together with Hippos, Tarichea and Gamala, once well known and populous, have almost totally disappeared. Nothing can exceed the desolation that now marks the shores of "Bahr Tubarieh," the native name by which the lake is now known. Yet the scene is not altogether unpicturesque, for at intervals, the sweet, clear, cool waters are fringed with palm and oleander. In olden times, the lake's fisheries were abundant and a great source of revenue and they still furnish a livelihood for many of the dwellers along the shores.

There are no abrupt curves, no winding bays to vary the coast line, and the banks rise bare, steep and rugged to the height of two thousand feet above the sea level. Frost is unknown in Galilee, and snow never falls there; but in the distance can be seen Mt. Hermon mantled in snow, like a cold, white sentinel keeping watch across the Judæan hills. The vicinity of the sea of Galilee is far from salubrious and many visitors find it decidedly unhealthy. One of the ancient customs still scrupulously observed in Tiberias is the washing of the dead in the waters of the lake. There is a venerable tradition among the Jews of Tiberias that the Messiah, when he appears, will emerge from the waters of the lake at Tiberias and proceed to Safed, where he will establish his throne on the highest summit of Galilee, and there inaugurate his kingdom on earth.

The scenery is for the most part, now bleak and monotonous, and the gorge or depression in which the lake lies is exposed to frequent sudden and violent storms. It was doubtless one of these storms that the Judæan words of life that have come down to us in the sacred volume through the centuries. As he walked along the pebbly shores, with his little group of disciples, talking with them and teaching them in parables, he was followed many times by the peasant crowds, some eager to listen to burning words, others moved only by curiosity.

SUICIDE.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Acts 16: 27, 28, "He drew out his sword and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled. But Paul cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm."

HERE is a would-be suicide arrested in his deadly attempt. He was a sheriff, and according to the Roman law a bailiff himself must suffer the punishment due an escaped prisoner; and if the prisoner breaking jail was sentenced to be endunged for three or four years, then the sheriff must be endunged for three or four years; and if the prisoner breaking jail was to have suffered capital punishment, then the sheriff must suffer capital punishment.

The sheriff had received especial charge to keep a sharp lookout for Paul and Silas. The government had not had confidence in bolts and bars to keep safe these two clergymen, about whom there seemed to be something strange and supernatural.

Sure enough, by miraculous power, they are free, and the sheriff, waking out of a sound sleep, and supposing these ministers have run away, and knowing that they were to die for preaching Christ, and realizing that he must therefore die, rather than go under the executioner's axe, on the morrow and suffer public disgrace, resolves to precipitate his own decease. But before the sharp, keen, glittering dagger of the sheriff could strike his heart, one of the unloosed prisoners arrests the blade by the command, "Do thyself no harm."

In olden time, and where Christianity had not interfered with it, suicide was considered honorable and a sign of courage. Demosthenes poisoned himself when told that Alexander's ambassador had demanded the surrender of the Athenian orators. Isocrates killed himself rather than surrender to Philip of Macedon. Cato, rather than submit to Julius Cæsar, took his own life, and after three times his wounds had been dressed tore them open and perished. Mithridates killed himself rather than submit to Pompey, the conqueror. Hannibal destroyed his life by poison from his ring, considering life unbearable. Læcærgus a suicide. Brutus a suicide. After the disaster of Moscow, Napoleon always carried with him a preparation of opium, and one night his servant heard the ex-emperor arise, put something in a glass and drink it, and soon after the groans aroused all the attendants, and it was only through utmost medical skill he was resuscitated.

Times have changed, and yet the American conscience needs to be toned up on the subject of suicide. Have you seen a paper in the last year that did not announce the passage out of life by one's own behest? Defaulters, alarmed at the idea of exposure, quit life precipitately. Men losing large fortunes go out of the world because they cannot endure earthly existence. Frustrated affection, domestic infelicity, dyspeptic impatience, misanthropy are considered sufficient causes for absconding from this life by Paris green, by ludanum, by belladonna, by Othello's dagger, by halter, by leap from the abutment of a bridge, by firearms. More cases of "felo de se" in the last two years of the world's existence than in any two previous years.

A pulpit not long ago expressed some doubt as to whether there was really anything wrong about quitting this life when it became disagreeable, and there are found in respectable circles people apologetic for the crime which Paul in the text arrested. I shall show you before I get through that suicide is the worst of all crimes, and I shall lift a warning unmistakable. But in the early part of this sermon I wish to admit that some of the best Christians that have ever lived have committed self-destruction, but always in dementia, and not responsible. I have no more doubt about their eternal felicity than I have of the Christian who dies in his bed in the delirium of typhoid fever. While the shock of the catastrophe is very great, I charge all those who have had Christian friends under cerebral aberration step off the boundaries of this life, to have no doubt about their happiness. The dear Lord took them right out of their dazed and frenzied state into perfect safety. How Christ feels toward the insane you may know from the kind way he treated the demoniac of Gadara and the child lunatic, and the potency with which he hushed the tempests, either of sea or brain.

Scotland, the land prolific of intellectual giants, had none grander than Hugh Miller. That man did more than any being that ever lived to show that the God of the hills is the God of the Bible, and he struck his tuning-fork on the rocks of Cromarty until he brought geology and theology accordant in divine worship. His two books, entitled "Footprints of the Creator," and the "Testimony of the Rocks," proclaimed the banns of an everlasting marriage between genuine science and revelation. On this latter book he toiled day and night through love of nature and love of God, until he could not sleep, and his brain gave way, and he was found dead with a revolver by his side, the cruel instrument having had two bullets—one for him and the other for the gunsmith who at the coroner's inquest was examining it and fell dead. Have you any doubt of the beatification of Hugh Miller, after his hot brain had ceased throbbing that winter night in his study at Portobello? Among the mightiest of earth, among the mightiest of heaven.

No one ever doubted the piety of William Cowper, the author of those three great hymns, "Oh, for a closer walk with God," "What various hindrances we meet," "There is a fountain filled with blood." William Cowper, who shares with Isaac Watts and Charles Wesley the chief honors of Christian hymnology. In hypochondria he resolved to take his own life, and rode to the river Thames, but found a man seated on some goods at the very point from which he expected to spring, and rode back to his home, and that night threw himself upon his own knife, but the blade broke, and then he hanged himself to the ceiling, but the rope parted. No wonder that when God mercifully delivered him from that awful dementia he sat down and wrote that other hymn just as memorable:

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.
Blind unbelief is sure to err
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain.

While we make this merciful and righteous allowance in regard to those who were plunged into mental incoherence, I declare that the man who in the use of his reason, by his own act, snaps the bond between his body and his soul, goes straight into perdition. Shall I prove it? Revelation 21: 8: "Murderers shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." Revelation 22: 15: "Without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers." You do not believe the New Testament? Then, perhaps, you believe the Ten Commandments: "Thou shalt not kill." Do you say all these passages refer to the taking of the life of others? Then I ask you if you are not as responsible for your own life as for the life of others? God gave you a special trust in your life. He made you the custodian of your life as he made you the custodian of no other life. He gave you as weapons with which to defend it two arms to strike back assailants, two eyes to watch for invasion, and a natural love of life which ought ever to be on the alert. Assassination of others is a mild crime compared with the assassination of yourself, because in the latter case it is treachery to an especial trust, it is the surrender of a castle you were especially appointed to keep, it is treason to a natural law and it is treason to God added to ordinary murder.

To show how God in the Bible looked upon this crime, I point you to the rogues' picture gallery in some parts of the Bible, the pictures of the people who have committed this unnatural crime. Here is the headless trunk of Saul on the walls of Bethshan. Here is the man who chased little David—ten feet in stature chasing four. Here is the man who consulted a clairvoyant, Witch of Endor. Here is a man who, whipped in battle, instead of surrendering his sword with dignity, as many a man has done, asks his servant to slay him; and when the servant declines, then the giant plants the hilt of the sword in the earth, the sharp point sticking upward, and he throws his body on it and expires, the coward, the suicide! Here is Ahithophel, the Machiavelli of olden times, betraying his best friend David in order that he may become prime minister of Absalom, and joining that fellow in his attempt at parricide. Not getting what he wanted by change of politics, he takes a short cut out of a disgraced life into the suicide's eternity. There he is, the ingrate!

Here is Abimelech, practically a suicide. He is with an army, bombarding a tower, when a woman in the tower takes a grindstone from its place and drops it upon his head, and with what life he has left in a cracked skull he commands his armor-bearer, "Draw thy sword and slay me, lest men say a woman slew me." There is his post-mortem photograph in the Book of Samuel. But the hero of this group is Judas Iscariot. Dr. Donne says he was a martyr, and we have in our day apologists for him. And what wonder, in this day when we have a book revealing Aaron Burr as a pattern of virtue, and in this day when we uncover a statue to George Sand as the benefactress of literature, and in this day when there are betrayals of Christ on the part of some of his pretended apostles—a betrayal so black it makes the infamy of Judas Iscariot white! Yet this man by his own hand hung up for the execration of all the ages, Judas Iscariot.

All the good men and women of the Bible left to God the decision of their earthly terminus, and they could have said with Job, who had a right to commit suicide if any man ever had—what with his destroyed property, and his body all aflame with insufferable carbuncles, and everything gone from his home except the chief curse of it, a pestiferous wife, and four garrulous people pelting him with comfortless talk while he sits on a heap of ashes scratching his scabs with a piece of broken pottery, yet crying out in triumph, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come."

Notwithstanding the Bible is against this evil, and the aversion which it creates by the loathsome and ghastly spectacle of those who have hurled themselves out of life, and notwithstanding Christianity is against it, and the arguments and the useful lives and the illustrious deaths of its disciples, it is a fact alarmingly patent that suicide is on the increase. What is the cause? I charge upon Intidelity and Agnosticism this whole thing. If there be no hereafter, or if that hereafter be blissful without reference to how we live and how we die, why not move back the folding doors between this world and the next? And when our existence here becomes troublesome, why not pass right over into Elysium? Put this down among your most solemn reflections, and consider it after you go to your homes; there has never been a case of suicide where the operator was not either demented, and therefore irresponsible, or an infidel. I challenge all the ages, and I challenge the whole universe. There never has been a case of self-destruction while in full appreciation of his immortality and of the fact that that immortality would be glorious or wretched according as he accepted Jesus Christ or rejected him.

You say it is business trouble, or you say it is electrical currents, or it is this, or it is that, or it is the other thing. Why not go clear back, my friend, and acknowledge that in every case it is the abdication of reason or the teaching of intidelity which practically says, "If you don't like this life, get out of it, and you will land either in annihilation, where there are no notes to pay, no persecutions to suffer, no gout to torment, or you will land where there will be everything glorious and nothing to pay for it. Infidelity always has been apologetic for self-immolation. After Tom Paine's "Age of Reason" was published and widely read there was a marked increase of self-slaughter. A man in London heard Mr. Owen deliver his infidel lecture on Socialism, and went home and sat down and wrote these words: "Jesus Christ is one of the weakest characters in history, and the Bible is the greatest possible deception," and then shot himself. David Hume wrote these words: "It would be no crime for me to divert the Nile or the Danube from its natural bed. Where, then, can be the crime in my diverting a few drops of blood from their ordinary channel?" And having written the essay, he loaned it to a friend; the friend read it, wrote a letter of thanks and admiration, and then shot himself. Appendix to the same book.

Rousseau, Voltaire, Gibbon, Montaigne, under certain circumstances, were apologetic for self-immolation. Infidelity puts up no bar to people's rushing out from this world into the next. They teach us it does not make any difference how you live here or go out of this world, you will land either in an oblivious nowhere or a glorious somewhere. And infidelity holds the upper end of the rope for the suicide, and aims the pistol with which a man blows his brains out, and mixes the strychnine for the last swallow. If infidelity could carry the day and persuade the majority of people that it does not make any difference how you go out of the world you will land safely, the rivers would be so full of corpses the ferry-boats would be impeded in their progress, and the crack of a suicide's pistol would be no more alarming than the rumble of a street-car.

I have sometimes heard it discussed whether the great dramatist was a Christian or not. I do not know, but I know that he considered appreciation of a future existence the mightiest hindrance to self-destruction:

For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life,
But that the dread of something after death—
The undiscovered country, from whose bourne
No traveller returns—puzzles the will.

Would God that the coroners would be brave in rendering the right verdict, and when in the case of irresponsibility they say, "While this man was demented he took his life," in the other case say, "Having read infidel books and attended infidel

GLIMPSSES OF A GODLY LIFE.

Notable Experiences Related by Rev. F. B. Meyer—Practical Gospel Work Among Ex-Prisoners in England.

HERE are few Christians, either in England or America, who are not more or less familiar with the wonderfully effective pastoral and evangelical work of Rev. F. B. Meyer. Cosmopolitan as a preacher, and helpful and elevating as a writer, he has become specially known to Americans through his addresses at the Northfield summer conferences, as well as by his published writings. Mr. Meyer, while pastor of the Victoria Road Church, in Leicester, England, inaugurated in that city a system of aggressive philanthropy which has exerted a far-reaching influence. Under his zealous and inventive management, Melbourne Hall, in that city, became a focus of evangelical activities, which included Sunday Schools, open-air missions, prison visitation, temperance lectures, missionary meetings, rescue work and industrial schools. Afterwards, as pastor of the Baptist Chapel in Regent's Park, London, evangelical work in many different lines distinguished his pastorate, while in Keswick and Mildmay, in England, and as at Northfield, in America, his power and stimulating influence as a spiritual teacher were widely acknowledged. He has been a prolific author of practical religious books, several of which have at different times been noticed in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. At the present time he is pastor of Christ Church, London, where he is continuing the same aggressive spiritual work which has been so fruitful of blessing in his previous charges. He is now at the Northfield Conference, where he will remain for a month by Mr. Moody's invitation, speaking at the meetings daily.

Mr. Meyer's latest contribution to religious literature, which has just been published by Morgan & Scott of London and the Fleming H. Revell Company of New York, is a notable one, being in a sense autobiographical. There is an old Breton legend which says that in remote times, there was a sea-coast town in that country called Is, which was swallowed up by the ocean. Several places are pointed out along the coast by fishermen as the site of this fabled town, and strange, weird tales are told of it. It is a tradition that, when the sea is rough, the spires of the churches in the submerged town may be seen in the hollows of the waves, and that in calmer weather the sweet, low music of the bells rises above the waters. Taking this beautiful legend as both title and text for his new book, Mr. Meyer in his preface says: "Similarly as it has always seemed to me, amid the submerged masses, deep down at the bottom of the ocean of human life, there are yearnings and desires for a better life that ring sad and perpetually. It has been the aim of my life to listen for these and when I have detected them, to present the only answer—the love of God in Jesus Christ our Lord. Some of the ways in which I sought to do this during my Leicester life are narrated in this book."

From "The Bells of Is" we extract a few illustrative and anecdotal passages which will serve to show what may be done amid the cares of a busy pastorate toward helping others.

Fishing for Souls.

In dealing with men, one is often reminded of the experiences of the salmon-fisher, who may have hooked a strong and vigorous fish, but has to act with the utmost prudence lest his prey escape him, and carry off line and hook in his mad rush to his native depths. As the skillful fisherman willingly plays with his prize for several hours, content to keep but the slenderest hold of it, if only he may succeed at last in drawing it into his net, so the fisher for souls must never be disappointed, though at first his best efforts are met with non-success; he must be prepared to give out line, to wait patiently, sometimes to lose sight of the objects of his solicitude for weeks together; yet the thread of love may follow them into the deepest, darkest depths, and some day, when they are weary of themselves and of sin, they will feel its gentle drawing, and follow it back to your side.

An Exhibition of Idols.

I shall never forget going on one Easter Monday to the old barracks at Leicester, to see an exhibition of idols. In my innocence I supposed that they were missionary trophies from the South Seas or India. To my surprise, there was nothing of the kind; but something even more practical, interesting and striking. For, at the most solemn part of the service, six men went to the rear of the platform and brought out six large sheets of cardboard, each of which was covered with pipes, tobacco-pouches, cigarette-holders, dog-whistles, ribbons, bows, trinkets, and many other things, all of which had been surrendered as having obstructed the growth of the inner life. Would that all who are so eager to destroy the gods of the heathen, were equally watchful to keep themselves from idols!

God's Plan Never Fails.

I happened to hear of a large disused yard and workshop, formerly occupied by a builder and contractor, and at once felt that this was the very accommodation we required. It was vain to think of linking on so great a work to any Prisoners' Aid Society; nor did I feel able to form a separate committee for this special agency. It was laid on my heart, therefore, to assume the entire responsibility, with no treasurer but the Lord himself. I did not undertake it without much thought and prayer. Like Peter, I kept saying, "If it be Thou, bid me come!" Then I waited for his reply.

It came at last. I was in the train on my way to spend two or three days in Llandudno, when as distinctly as possible I became conscious of the impression that I was to go forward; and that my God would be my treasurer and guide, failing me in no good thing, but leading me forward a step at a time. It is a glad thing for a man when he receives such an intimation as I did then. Nothing can hurt him, nothing daunt. All his need is met as it arises from those inexhaustible stores; and he realizes that the work is no longer his, but God's through him, and the whole weight of the responsibility is on the shoulders that bear the worlds. This is my record to the glory of God—that he never failed me. I had to use some of my own capital for that business: I passed through some terrific difficulties; I had much to plan and arrange: there was a great expenditure of time and energy; but I never regret having gone into it. There are fruits of the work existing in many places; and when I left Leicester, it was so arranged, through the goodness of God, that every penny of my private income was replaced.

"Put Religion in your Firewood."

I became a firewood merchant. A relief scheme, and had faint hopes of making my fortune! I purchased two horses and three carts, which went out laden with firewood two or three times a day, in charge of my drivers, who usually disposed of their stock. And then the Leicester folk awaked amusedly to see "F. B. Meyer, Firewood Merchant," amongst the other businesses for which that famous town was noted.

I had always taken a leading part in the temperance and blue ribbon movements; and the committee, of which I was president, was constantly engaged in a crusade against public-houses in Leicester and the neighborhood. It was then unanimously agreed that as I had dared to interfere with their trade, they the licensed shopkeepers would "boycott" my firewood; and as my principal business was done among small grocers, this was a serious matter. No grocer who had a license was free to buy our wood. Every epithet was heaped on me. Every bar-parlor rung with execration. And I was dared to go down certain streets of Leicester, under pain of personal violence. I walked down those streets the next day or two after in the most leisurely way, knowing that those who brag most are cowards at heart. Suddenly the sales fell away to about one-third their former amount; the carts came back, day after day, almost as they started in the morning, and the salesmen became very disheartened. I laid the matter before him on whom I ever looked as the chief Partner in the firm. And after two or three weeks the tide began to turn. The sales went up. The carts came back from their rounds empty, and we were all more hopeful. On one of these evenings, as a driver came in with his cart, I asked him what had altered the attitude of our customers, and he replied, "Well, sir, you see, the people don't like you any better than they did; but they say the religious firewood is better weight than the other firewood, and so they are coming back to us." It is a good thing to put your religion into firewood. It pays!

Two Novel Philanthropies.

I felt that I must discover some way by which respectable men, who were out of employment, might be enabled to help themselves. After considerable cogitation, I bought a ladder or two, some pails, and leathers, and started one or two men on the job of window-cleaning. Cards, on which my name was printed, which guaranteed their respectability, were left from door to door, to be followed up a day or two after. My friends throughout the town were very kind; and I think that, in many cases, windows were burnished to an extent that was a little out of the ordinary. Thus encouraged, I felt emboldened to try a larger venture, more especially as my ladders were too short to reach upper windows; and, notwithstanding my guarantee of respectability, my friends did not see their way to admit my proteges within their houses. Besides which, inducements were held out to me that I could do the large factories of the town at so much a window, if only I had ladders long enough to reach them. The result was that in a short time I found myself possessed of two of the longest ladders in the town. I think I can see them now, with my name printed down one side, "Rev. F. B. Meyer's Window-Cleaning Brigade." The result, as far as employing men who were out of work was concerned, amply justified my expenditure; and I had the satisfaction of employing men until they secured situations, which they had an opportunity of doing by moving amongst the residents and manufacturers of the town.

On the same line, and to give employment to the same class, I started the Messenger Brigade, something after the fashion of the Commissionaire Corps. This was intended more especially to help old men who were no longer fit for laborious work. We began with four, in different parts of the town. They stood at certain spots, waiting to be sent on errands, to be called in to do any odd jobs about the house. Had I remained in Leicester, I believe this might have been made a great success.

FIRST MIRACLE OF JESUS.

S.S. Lesson for Aug. 26. John 2: 1-11. Golden Text, John 2: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE visit of Jesus to Galilee was not exclusively for the sake of gaining as disciples Philip and his friend Nathanael. Guided as he always was by his Father, and doing nothing of himself but what he saw his Father do, he went by his Father's will to the marriage at Cana in Galilee. How far should we accept invitations and be present at feasts, is a burning question among earnest young converts; and many would make for themselves and others a hard and fast rule about these things. Jesus made no rule, but always to his Father. He could say: "I do nothing of myself. . . . He that sent me is with me; he hath not left me alone; for I do always the things that are pleasing to him." But it takes close and uniform attention to receive such guidance for our life as our Lord always received from his Father for his life. It was a marriage in the family, "the mother of Jesus was there;" and both Jesus was called, and his disciples, to the marriage. Jesus was free to bring his disciples with him, and his disciples did not need to leave him in order to attend this marriage feast. This is an important item in the matter of guidance. Do we want to go where we are not sure Jesus goes with us? Do we hanker after society where Jesus is not a welcome guest? Do we feel at ease where we are not free to speak of our Master, where we have enjoyments which he cannot share, and fellowship with that which is far from his heart? If he has indeed taken the first place in our lives, anything which separates from him becomes intolerable; the question of our enjoyment ceases to be a question, and the question of his will is conclusive.

It is a blessed marriage feast where Jesus is a guest; a type of the marriage feast where he shall be the Bridegroom, and of which it is written: "Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage-supper of the Lamb." Not only at the marriage feast, but it is blessed to have Jesus. There are no such trials and no such blessings as in married life; no such temptations, no such school, no such opportunities for Christ-likeness, as between two whom God has joined together. Everything of self in married life distorts the beauty of that unity which God has ordained. As long as the husband is occupied with what is due to him from his wife, he is making his wife into a slave and himself into a tyrant. As long as a wife cherishes in her heart a feeling of self-pity, Jesus is not reigning in this marriage. Just as soon as we learn to live in our married life, not unto ourselves, but unto him which died for us, and rose again, everything changes shape and color. The very things, which, when we consider them in the light of what is due to us, are intolerable, and make married life with some seem like a hell upon earth—an iron tether binding them to an instrument of ceaseless torture—are the things which, when yielded to God, fill the whole heart with praise and thanksgiving to God, and love to the one through whom the trial comes. If a husband is exacting, if a wife is perverse, if the situation is full of the elements of trial and suffering, then so much the more is God glorified and his servants filled with his own peace, and with praise to him, when none of these things move them, because they are permitted by him. Jesus, in the marriage, changes the whole situation, neither husband nor wife are dependent on the other, but on the Lord.

Wherever Jesus was, he was there for his Father. The family was poor, the provisions ran out, "they wanted wine." How often the very presence of Jesus shows us what we are in want of! As soon as he draws near to us we are which we have never discovered before. A Laodicean church can be "rich and increased with goods," and have need of nothing, until Jesus draws near; then the discovery is made with surprise that she is wretched and miserable, poor, and blind, and naked. How often, when God has been coming very near to his people, by his Word and by his Spirit, they make discoveries of their leanness and misery, of which they had not the smallest idea before. Many are at first discouraged when they begin to see how far they have come short. This is the greatest mistake; to know when we are sick is the beginning of the remedy; to know that we are ignorant is the beginning of learning. It should encourage, not discourage us.

The mother of Jesus saith unto him, "They have no wine." It was the beginning of the ministry of Jesus; as yet he had not taught in public. If, when a child in the temple he must be about his Father's business, or in the things of his Father, much more, now that his ministry was com-

"And there were set there six water pots of stone after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins a piece. Jesus saith unto them: "Fill the water pots with water, and they filled them up to the brim." It was all they could do, but it did not satisfy the need which was felt; Christ must do that. What a type of our service! An act, or a word in simple obedience to that which we learn in the Word by the Spirit; something so small in itself, and so powerless that we wonder as we say or do it; and yet at his word it becomes a power; just as the casting of the net by Simon Peter after the disciples had toiled all night in vain. We do not need to estimate the value of what we do or say in obedience to the understood Word of God; our part is to obey.

Water-Pot Used at a Wedding Feast.

Incident is in some aspects of it a surprise. It follows so soon after that fierce, weird, spiritual conflict in the Wilderness and the solemn scene at his baptism, that we are astonished to find him at a place of festivity. It is not likely that John the Baptist could have been induced to attend such a celebration, but he was an ascetic,

IN forming a conception of the human character of Jesus from the incidents recorded in the Gospels, the significance of his visit to the wedding at Cana must not be overlooked. The Draw out now. The change had been made. Christ had no occasion to look at what they drew out; he knew what had occurred and he bade them bear it to the governor of the feast. As the poet said, the "water saw its God and blushed." We must not despise common things or common duties; Christ can transform them into things divine. Ruskin gives a striking illustration of this tact in one of his delightful talks on science. He says: "The same black mud or slime from a footpath in the outskirts of a manufacturing town—the absolute type of impurity—is composed of four elements: clay, soot, sand and water. These four may be separated, one from the other. The clay particles, left to follow their own instinct of unity, become a clear, hard substance, so set that it can deal with light in a wonderful way, and gather out of it the loveliest blue rays only, refusing the rest. We call it then a sapphire. The sand arranges itself in mysterious, infinitely fine parallel lines which reflect the blue, green, purple and red rays in the greatest beauty. We call it then an opal. The soot becomes the hardest thing in the world, and for the blackness it had obtained the power of reflecting all the rays of the sun at once in the vividest blaze that any solid thing can shoot. We call it then a diamond. Last of all, the water becomes a dew-drop and a crystalline star of snow."

Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it. Mary gave good advice when she told the servants to obey Jesus. Sometimes a pleasure or amusement seems harmless and most desirable, but if in indulging in it we must disobey Jesus, we ought to forego it. Implicit obedience to him is the way of life and holiness and happiness. A story is told of a Prussian switchman which illustrates this kind of obedience. An express train was approaching and the switch was fixed for it to pass. Both the switchman's hands were engaged in holding the handles of the switch firm, when he heard a childish voice behind him. He turned his head and saw to his horror his five-year-old boy walking up the track toward the train, right in front of the locomotive. What could he do? To loose the switch and save his child would mean wreck to the train. He shouted to the child, "Lie down!" Instantly the child obeyed. After the train had passed, the switchman ran to the spot and found the child unhurt. That child learned that there might be a case in which obedience was life.

He knew not whence it was. Some people do not care whence their blessings come. Children often are ungrateful to the mother who works for them and their father whose labor provides them with home, food and clothing. But it is always a sign of a bad disposition when there is no desire to know and thank a benefactor. When Sir Ralph Abercrombie was mortally wounded at the battle of Aboukir, he was being carried to the hospital in a litter. He was in great agony, and some one brought a blanket and folding it put it under his head, which gave him great relief. He spoke of it and asked whose blanket it was. "Only one of the men's," was the reply. "A soldier's blanket," he said. "Find out the soldier's name." He was told that the soldier's name was Duncan Roy. "Then see," he said, "that Duncan Roy gets his blanket this very night."

The servants who drew the water knew. So it is now. When Christian people are in trouble they pray for deliverance and God answers their prayers, sometimes by unlooked-for means. Worldly people who hear of it say it was a fortunate coincidence, or that it was a slice of luck, but the Christian knows whence the good comes. He is like one of the servants who drew the water. In the time of the persecution of the Covenanters in Scotland a service was being held on a hill-side. During the service a troop of dragoons was heard approaching. The people were in a panic and the minister who alone preserved calmness pleaded with God for protection. It seemed useless for the soldiers were surrounding the hill and flight was impossible. But while the soldiers were ascending the hill, a thick, white, blinding mist came rolling over the hill-top which prevented any man seeing another even at the distance of three feet. It enfolded the little congregation in its embrace and hid them. They remained silent and listening intently. Soon the noises below and the shouts of the troopers indicated that they had lost their way. The commander thought only for the safety of his men and gave the order to get together and descend. The search for the Covenanters was abandoned for that day and they escaped.

CANA OF GALILEE.

even his mother to come in between his Father and him. "Woman," he said, "what have I to do with thee?"

Mine Hour is not yet Come.

Only God knows the right hour when everything is ripe for a thing to be done or to be said. Many a thing which God has willed to be done has been done too soon and spoiled. Moses hurried matters in Egypt, by taking things into his own hands. God's time was not come when he slew the Egyptian; and the real deliverance of God's people was hindered and not helped forward by an effort made before the time. It is our vocation to follow Jesus, not to precede him. Mary, too, had a lesson to learn. As a child, Jesus had always obeyed; he was subject to her and to Joseph. But she must retire before the heavenly Father whom her divine Son understood. Since he went up to be baptized of John, and since his temptation in the desert, he was no more the same, he had entered upon his public life, and Mary must draw back before the ministry of him, of whom it had been said to her by the angel: "That holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

Mary learned her lesson, and turning to the servants, said unto them, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." It was the teaching of her who had said to the angel Gabriel: "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word." By the grace of God, she brought forth a Saviour in our flesh, and she gives us this message which she first spoke to the servants at the marriage feast. May not the words be also prophetic of those who are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb? Can any be called who have not decided to do whatsoever he saith unto them?

which Jesus never was. The life of Jesus was so full of such friendly, genial, sympathetic feeling, that he draws very near to us as one of ourselves, and we love him as deeply as we reverence him. He was probably either on a visit to his new disciple, Nathanael, who lived at Cana, or was on his way to his mother's house at Nazareth when the invitation came. In a country where it is a point of honor to honor a marriage by unlimited hospitality for a period of at least seven days, the exhaustion of the wine would be regarded as very humiliating. Mary's remark to her son may have referred to the custom of guests making a present of wine or oil on such occasions. Christ's answer was not the disrespectful one that might be imagined from our version. It was the common form of address and was simply an intimation to her that he must choose his own time and manner of working. She appears to have been satisfied that he would help in some way, as she told the servants to obey him. The water-pots referred to, were usually placed in the gallery outside the doors of the rooms, convenient for the rinsing of the hands, and vessels as enjoined by the rabbinical law. They were often very large and handsome and the poor used to borrow for the ceremony the finest they could get. Their capacity varied, but in this case, John estimated it at two or three firkins, the firkin being a little over eight gallons. The entire quantity of wine made by Christ would therefore be about a hundred gallons. Much argument has been spent on the question whether it was intoxicating. There is nothing to show one way or the other, but the fact that among the humble people such as these were, these seven days' feasts were never occasions of excess would appear to indicate that the wine ordinarily used was not intoxicating.

A Typical Labor Conflict.

The Strike of the Miners at Cripple Creek, Colo., Followed by Conflicts with Armed Deputies—The Opportunity of the Church.

CHRISTIAN work at the Gold Camp at Cripple Creek, Colo., has been sadly retarded by the recent labor troubles. One of the most embittered and persistent strikes of this troublous year has occurred there, and the Gospel of peace and good-will has been neglected for the devil's voice of conflict and bloodshed. It is true that the services in the Methodist Tabernacle, and at Mr. Lyman's Preaching tent have continued to be held, but in the angry clamor and the excited feeling prevailing in the neighborhood the call to the better life has fallen on unattentive ears. The American School Union's two missionaries have continued their labors through the district and have done all they could to harmonize the antagonistic elements, but the struggle had to run its disastrous course to the bitter end.

For about six months the industries of the district have been practically suspended. Early in February the demand of the miners for higher wages than was offered was regularly formulated, and being rejected, was followed by a general refusal to work. One by one the chief mines closed and the scene of busy activity became the scene of idleness and discord. Then came the usual sequel. The mine owner attempted to introduce new men to take the places of their former employes. There is seldom any difficulty in finding such men, and there was none at Cripple Creek. The number of the unemployed is too large for the workmen to permanently cripple an industry. A man who is in regular work with a fair income may sympathize with his fellow-workers and feel that they are his brethren whom he would help rather than hinder in a struggle to improve their condition. But when he is out of work and he is hungry, his natural impulse is to provide for his own wants and accept the place of his brother at the wages his brother refuses to take. He is called selfish, he is warned that he is serving the interests of capital and is defeating the cause of the class to which he belongs, but hunger cannot be satisfied by argument, and he goes to work. In this way the mine owners were able to defy their striking employes and carry on their business at the rate of wage they thought it proper to pay. Then came the customary conflict with which we are sadly familiar in these unhappy struggles. The strikers perceiving that their tactics must fail, were more exasperated against the workingmen who were helping to defeat them than against their employers, attacked the new men and open war was declared. Three hundred armed men were conveyed to Cripple Creek to protect the new workers, and the conflict of words became a trial of brute strength in which several men were killed and many more wounded. The strikers built a regular fort, loopholed and entrenched and fought desperately, but the armed force against them was daily reinforced and in the end they were overpowered.

Nothing is more certain than that the Church will eventually be compelled to take up this burning question of the labor difficulty. Among the employers, as among the employed, there are Christian men who feel their responsibility and will listen to the appeals of disinterested religious teachers. In many cases, they are the only appeals to which they will listen, and it is for the preachers to use their opportunity. At the recent Christian Endeavor Convention, at Cleveland, O., this fact was recognized. In a carefully prepared resolution the delegates declared, "That we reassert Christ to be the centre of social unity; his righteousness to be the only basis of industrial peace; his cross of self-giving in service to be his mediator for the reconciliation of men; and his Spirit in human hearts to be the only power adequate to maintain or establish the brotherhood of man in the coming readjustment of human relations." It would be impossible for the Church to interfere in such details as the rate of wages to be paid, or the number of hours that shall constitute a day's work, but it can in these matters, as in all the affairs of life, emphasize and insist on the cardinal principles of Christianity, the love of God and the brotherhood of man, and show to both employers and employed how those principles are being ignored in this strife and how the conflict of class with class is a fratricidal war which is a disgrace to men who have declared themselves followers of Christ.

THE GOTHES AND THE BIBLE.

About 350 years after Christ the Goths appeared on the banks of the lower Danube, a people of blue eyes and blond hair, one foot taller than the Greeks and the Romans, freedom-loving, vigorous, irresistible in war. They crossed the Danube, swept over the Balkan Peninsula, made Constantinople to tremble, captured Rome and finally settled in Southern France and in Spain. With the numerous tribes of their fellow Teutons, they established many of those Christian nationalities that were to supplant the last universal monarchy of the pagan world. For, after the advent of Christ, the King of kings, there can be no universal monarchy on earth but his. These Goths had a Christian Bishop, Uphilas, who in 350 translated the Bible into their tongue, and planted the root of that deep-seated love of Bible study, so peculiar to the Teutonic race, which later on, in the Reformation proved most powerful to break the yoke of the modern Roman church monarchy.

Neander, the great German historian, in his history of the Christian church, relates a significant incident in the life of Jerome, a church-father-contemporaneous with U-philas. In 403, while in Bethlehem, engaged in learned Biblical research, he received a letter from Sunnia and Fretela, two Goths, asking for a verbal translation of several passages of the Psalms, which they had found translated differently in their Latin and Greek Bibles. Jerome was surprised at the intense interest in the Bible manifested by them, and in the introductory sentence of his answer, gives utterance to his surprise in the following words: "Who should have thought that the barbarian tongue of the Goths would search after the true sense of the original Hebrew text, and that, whilst the Greeks are sleeping and despising the divine Word, even Germany is exploring it."

MISSIONS OF A CENTURY.

A century of missionary effort has resulted as follows: Two hundred and eighty missionary societies have been organized, which have under commission 9,000 foreign missionaries, working in almost every unevangelized country on the globe, and 44,532 native assistants; nearly a million converts have been gathered into 7,800 organized churches, and 1,006,768 pupils into 7,000 Sabbath Schools; eighty Bible societies have given the Bible to the nations in ninety entire versions and 230 partial versions, the total circulation of the Scriptures during the century amounting to the enormous aggregate of 350,000,000 copies; hundreds of millions of pages of wholesome literature have been issued from mission presses; hundreds of thousands of patients have been treated by medical missionaries in hospitals and dispensaries; 70,000 pupils have been gathered into higher educational institutions and 608,000 children in village schools.

A Chat with Joseph Cook.

The Famous Bostonian has some Interesting Views on Recent Events.

WHEN in New York City a few days ago, Rev. Joseph Cook, LL.D., the famous lecturer was interviewed by a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He had just returned from a Western trip, and was disposed to talk quite freely concerning the recent labor strike and other events in that part of the Union. "I was in Chicago the night when about a million dollars worth of cars were burned on the Panhandle Road," he said, "I met a good many representatives of the fifty millions in the United States who are neither rich nor poor, and seemed to have personal opinions about the strike. The purpose of the Debs strike was to absorb all the labor unions in the country—the real object being to form and use a continental trip-hammer to advance the cause of organized labor."

"The strike failed through the audacity of its purposes. The power of the Federal government caused its collapse. My judgment is that Mr. Debs and his associates expected to be powerful enough to snap their fingers at the laws of Illinois. The Governor is well known not to be an extremist for law and order. Hopkins, Mayor of Chicago, is a favorite with the criminal classes. He was expected to treat very leniently any outbreaks that might occur. The next cause in importance was the refusal of Gompers of the American Federation of Labor and Arthur of the Engineers Union to support Debs."

orators declared that $2 a day would satisfy the men. They wanted the government to find work for them and guarantee it at this price. I talked with Kelley concerning the views and purposes of his followers.

"Do your men believe in Henry George's idea of single tax?" I asked.

"Most of my men never heard of Henry George," was the reply. "But I believe in single tax."

"Do your men believe in Edward Bellamy's idea of national ownership of railroads and telegraphs?"

"Most of them never heard of Bellamy either, but I believe in his ideas."

"What will you do at Washington?" I persisted.

"We shall get what we want. Grover and Congress will weaken when we get there."

"Well, don't do anything rash," I advised him.

"He promised that his men would not engage in anything contrary to law; nevertheless, in twenty-four hours afterward his people went off eastward in a train of box-cars which they are said to have stolen near Ogden. It was understood, I learned in Ogden, that the officials of the railroads going east helped them on to avoid trouble. At Omaha Kelley refused to accept a stolen train. At Omaha he could get no train. The army walked to Des Moines, and then floated on rude boats to St. Louis and Cincinnati. At last accounts there were about 200 of them ready to answer roll call."

"My impression concerning the movement was that for the most part the public treated the army far too generously. It fed the vagabonds and supplied most of the contributions until the thickly settled portions of the country were reached. There were some honest workingmen in the wing, but the general impression was that most of the men were tramps. In Iowa they refused work at $1.50 a day. Organized vagabondage is the best description of the element that was brought to the front. I didn't see one man whom I would have chosen for a foreman."

"What of social and political progress in Utah, Dr. Cook? Did you make any observations of that character?"

"I was in Salt Lake City just before the bill passed Congress admitting the Territory to Statehood. The annual meeting of the Mormons was being held in the Tabernacle, and the streets were full of people from country and town. The general appearance of the Mormon crowds was that of European peasants. I took pains to wear a hat in which I believed myself to be unrecognizable, and though I had been in Salt Lake City several times, I supposed I was not recognized. I went into a leading bookshop and asked for the latest volumes in polygamy. The clerk handed me a pamphlet entitled, 'Why we Practice Plural Marriage.' This I bought, and also another, and the young clerk, while I was paying him, said to me:

"We don't practise now what these pamphlets advocate."

"Why do you have such a large stock for sale, then?" I asked.

"Oh, we keep them to sell to strangers," he replied with a smile.

"I made no remark. He seemed to take me for a gullible stranger from the East. I told my Salt Lake City friends of the incident and they led me to understand that polygamic literature is not only widely circulated through the Mormon papers, but that even in the Mormon Sunday Schools it finds expression in the hymn books. One of the verses I read has these lines:

God bless the wife who staves,
And helps her husband all she can
To get a dozen wives.

You can buy these hymn-books in Salt Lake city to-day.

"Judge Anderson, of the United States Circuit Court, told me in Salt Lake City that President Woodruff, the head of the Mormon Church, lately testified under oath, on a trial, that a revelation restoring polygamy to its old position might be received at any moment. My impression is that we must strengthen the schools and churches of Utah, otherwise polygamy may, after all, be able to assert itself, free from national interference. We must so invigorate the better sort of enterprises, both educational and industrial, in Utah, as to prevent a dictatorship by the Mormons over the Gentiles. I welcome Utah into the Union, if she absolutely discards polygamy in good faith. There are the elements of a noble state in Utah, but the large mass of dangerous material there may give us more or less trouble yet."

HELP FOR COREA.

COREA, the land without a religion, and which has until a very recent date been closed to Christian missionary effort, is in a sore plight. In addition to all the horrors of a war of invasion, her twelve millions of population find themselves face to face with starvation.

In Seoul, the capital, hundreds are reported to be dying of hunger daily. In the other cities and the provinces the condition is equally distressing. The public granaries are empty and the war has already consumed what little stock of food was left.

This picture of a helpless nation, perishing for the want of food, is one that must appeal to the sympathies of every heart susceptible of human feeling. Providentially, it would seem, Corea's anxious eyes have turned westward toward the United States as the only source from which speedy relief can come. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has felt impelled to respond to this appeal without waiting to weigh the matter further. A nation is starving and that is enough warrant for action. The following communication has been forwarded to the Korean representative at Washington:

NEW YORK, Aug. 7, 1894.

To the Korean Charge d' Affaires,
Washington, D.C.

The reports of the alarming and pitiful condition of affairs among the people of Corea call forth our deepest sympathy. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will contribute one thousand barrels of flour to any cargo that may be sent for the relief of your starving people. Let us know how we can best help you to help them.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
LOUIS KLOPSCH, Proprietor.

We bespeak for Corea the sympathy of true-hearted Christian men and women everywhere, that its troubles may soon cease, and that it may, after a demonstration of Christian kindness from afar, be ready to welcome with open arms the messengers of the Gospel of our Saviour.

A GOSPEL PRESS.

ALL the secular newspapers of the day discuss all the questions of God and eternity and all the religious questions in regard to the past, present and future. There is not a single doctrine of theology but has been discussed in the last ten years by the secular newspapers of the country. The newspaper evangelized will be the right wing of the Apocalyptic angel. The cylinder of the Christianized printing press will be the front wheel of the Lord's chariot. I take the music of events and I do not mark it diminuendo; I mark it crescendo. A pastor on the Sabbath preaches to a few hundred or a few thousand people, and on Monday or during the week the printing press will take the sermon and preach it to millions of people. When I see the printing press standing with the electric telegraph on one side gathering up material and the lightning express train on the other side waiting for the tons of folded sheets of newspapers, I pronounce it the mightiest force in our civilization. So I commend you to pray for all those who manage the newspapers of the land, for all type setters, for all editors, for all publishers that, sitting or standing in positions of such influence, they may give all that influence for God and the betterment of the human race. An aged woman, making her living by knitting, unwound the yarn from the ball until she found in the centre of the ball there was an old piece of newspaper. She opened it and read an advertisement which announced that she had become an heiress to a large property, and that fragment of a newspaper lifted her from pauperism to affluence. And I don't know but, as the thread of time unrolls and unwinds a little further, through the silent yet speaking newspaper may be found the vast inheritance of the world's redemption.

WAR'S BARBARITIES.

AT an awful price of blood and suffering the world is becoming acquainted with the regions that for ages seemed little more than a myth, and nations that stood away back in the dim corridors of history come out on the stage to act a bloody part in this Nineteenth Century. It seems to me that all those who know how to pray should be more and more earnest in petition for the reign of universal peace. Surely, men die fast enough without this organized slaughter. The hearses come soon enough through the cemetery gates and the pestilences cut wide enough swath. Let the sword be scabbarded. God did not put the iron under the mountains for purposes of death, but for the forwarding of human industries. God did not put inventiveness in the human brain that it might fashion some new style of rifle or some further reaching "swamp angel," but to contrive new spindles to weave and better architecture to shelter and swifter modes of intercommunication.

The reports of the recent slaughter in the East strike us as barbaric, but all wars are barbaric. They may start about a technicality or a national misunderstanding, but before the first battle is over, the whole scene rolls back into the dark ages, and it becomes wholesale butchery, and war is only murder on a large scale. You cannot kill a man in a Christian way. Oh, what a world this will be to live in when the chief question with all individuals and governments is how to save life, rather than how to destroy it, how to make the world happy instead of how to make it miserable, and all men shall put into practice that sublime principle which Christ announced in his Olivet discourse: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." That day will come. I am not talking about an abstraction. You and I have no time to waste on that abstraction. The day of which I speak shall come, and we have a right to cheer each other with the anticipation.

So we who are now in the church militant, in the field, contending for the Lord of Hosts, sometimes victorious and sometimes worsted and driven back, keep our courage up with the thought that the chariots of God are 20,000, and all the mountains round about us, as in Elisha's time, are filled with the reserve corps waiting for the moment when they shall be put into the field, and all the forces of unrighteousness shall fly like withered leaves in the autumnal hurricane. The times are charged with destiny. People who live 100 years from now will sit in rapt wonder at those things which are to us every day occurrences. The wheels of God's Providence are making rapid revolutions, and when our Lord seated in his chariot tells his charioteer to drive rapidly, there must be something of infinite moment soon to come to pass. Let us have our faith ready for anything.

Ride on, King Jesus, and take into thine acknowledged possession the world that thou didst die to save, and when thou comest home from thy final victory, and all heaven shall turn out to bid thee welcome, may we who have worked in our small and humble way for the grand result, be found somewhere in the awaiting procession. Honor enough for us to hold the stirrup as the King mounts the white charger.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

H. B. Longsdorf, Herndon, Pa. Is it right for a Christian who has horses and carriages, to lend them to parties on Sunday to take pleasure rides and go visiting?

We are somewhat surprised that it should be found necessary to ask such a question. No Christian would knowingly lend his property for such a purpose.

J. L. Metcalf, St. Louis, Mo. Where was the Garden of Eden supposed to have been situated?

In Armenia, near the river Euphrates. Legend, tradition and Scripture point to that as the location, and geographers and scientists are almost united in the belief that it was the cradle of the human race.

Subscriber, Armstrong, Mo. Did Christ as a babe know all things, or was he like an ordinary babe?

It is difficult if not impossible to comprehend the union of the Divine and the human in Christ's nature. He could not have been an ordinary babe, as the Divine nature must have been potent in him even in infancy. But that he knew all things in the sense of secular knowledge cannot be believed. In fact Luke says explicitly (Luke 2: 52) that he increased in wisdom. Even after he commenced his ministry, he admitted that he did not know all things (Mark 13: 32). His divinity must have been restricted by his fleshly environment.

W. R. Loving, Petersburg, Tenn. Does the reference to Pharaoh in Psalm 136: 15 make it certain that he was drowned in the Red Sea?

Not absolutely. The poet would naturally think of him as being overthrown there whether he personally perished or not. Kings are often spoken of as representing nations. The reason that there is some doubt about his being drowned is that the Pharaoh generally identified as the Pharaoh of the Exodus lived several years after the sudden death of his first-born son. But his spirit and power were broken.

Constant Reader, Mechanicville, N. Y. What is the meaning of the reference to the "great house" and the vessels in II. Timothy 2: 20, 21.

The probable meaning is that the Apostle is referring to the visible church as containing some valuable and some useless members just as in a large house there are some vessels of gold and some of wood and earth, the former for important purposes and the latter for temporary or mean uses. The purging from these is either discrimination to be exercised by the pastor or the care to be used by the members in not allowing themselves to be corrupted by association with worldly men who have succeeded although unworthy in gaining admission to the church.

James Langley, Zanesville, O. How did the Apostles and evangelists die?

As far as record and tradition show, they ended their lives as follows: Matthew, martyred by the sword in Ethiopia; Mark, slain by the foes of the Church in Alexandria, being dragged through the streets and abused so that death ensued; Luke, martyred by hanging in Greece; Peter, crucified in Rome; James, beheaded at Jerusalem; James the Less, beaten to death in Jerusalem; Philip, hanged in Phrygia; Bartholomew, flayed alive; Andrew, crucified; Thomas, slain with the sword in India; Jude, shot with arrows; Matthias, stoned and beheaded; Barnabas, stoned to death by Jews at Salonic; Paul, beheaded at Rome by Nero. According to the traditions John was the only one who escaped the martyr's fate. At one time he was put into a caldron of boiling water, but he escaped with his life. Simon Zelotes was crucified in Judea.

A. W. Wawatsosa, Wis. 1. Was Lazarus the beggar identical with the Lazarus that Christ raised? 2. Who was Melchisedec? 3. What is meant by being possessed with devils?

1. No; Lazarus the beggar was a character, or type of a class, and like other characters mentioned by Christ in his parables, had not necessarily an actual existence. Lazarus, the brother of Martha and Mary, was an actual man. 2. Melchisedec was the King of Salem (see Gen. 14: 18-20). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews refers to him (see Heb. 7: 1-7) as a type of Christ in his characters of King-priest, and uses the fact of Abraham paying him tithes to show that the patriarch recognized a priesthood long before that of Aaron. His argument is to show that as the great high priest, Christ, although not of the tribe of Levi, might claim a more ancient type. The reference to Melchisedec being without father or mother, etc., simply means that nothing was known of his origin. 3. The demoniac was a great deal like our modern maniac in his symptoms. It has even been contended that the cause is the same in both cases, although that cannot be proved. The common opinion among the Jews was that if a man made himself the servant of the evil one, he would lose his individuality, and the devils would speak by him and through him.

E. J. Humphrey, Colorado City, Colo. What did Christ mean by saying Matt. 5: 14, that his people were the light of the world? We are taught elsewhere that Christ himself was the light of the world.

They were lights in view of the Spirit of Christ which was in them. When Christ left the world they were to take his place. In Prov. 4: 18 you have the same figure, "The path of the just is as a shining light." They were to give the light to the world. Some men who would never be impressed by a sermon or by reading the Bible, are attracted to God by the lives and goodness of Christian people whom they know.

Amelia Gates, Elmira, N. Y. What Jewish priest was it who aided Alexander in the conquest of Persia?

Your inquiry probably refers to Jaddus, who was high priest about the year 330, B. C. When he heard of the approach of Alexander's army, he called upon the people to join in prayer and sacrifice to God to avert the threatened calamity. In a vision he was commanded to go and meet the conqueror, clothed in his priestly garments, and he did so, being accompanied by a large body of the people, dressed in white. Alexander, instead of attacking them, hastened forward and greeted them. He explained his conduct by saying that he, too, had had a vision, in which the figure of Jaddus had appeared to him, and promised to give him the empire of Macedonia. The high priest showed him the prophecies concerning the overthrow of the Persian power by a Grecian conqueror, and Alexander immediately began his victorious campaign against Darius.

Katherine McCurdy. 1. Why was Egypt chosen as a refuge for Christ when Herod was about to kill the children? 2. How long did he remain there? 3. How long was it from the Exodus to Christ's going to Egypt?

1. Because it was the safest and most accessible place where Herod had no power to follow them. Also, because there was already a colony of Jews in Egypt and Joseph and Mary would feel that they would not be among utter strangers. 2. We are not told how long. Probably not more than three months. Joseph appears to have set out on his journey back as soon as he heard of Herod's death and to have arrived on the frontier about the time when Archelaus was appointed to succeed him. Thus, if the commonly accepted dates are correct, would be within three months of the flight. 3. The date of the Exodus is disputed. Some scholars fix it at B. C. 1491 and others at B. C. 1300. Four years would have to be deducted from either date to allow for the fact that the era was reckoned four years later than it should have been.

F. J. H. Cedarhurst, L. I. 1. Probably three months old, but cannot be definitely stated. 2. It is very difficult, at the present time, for unemployed tradesmen to secure work in many of the cities. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

BOUND FOR THE ARCTIC.

POLAR exploration is being pursued this year with increased vigor. Beside the expeditions already in the Polar regions, another is now on its way thither. This is the expedition fitted out at the expense of Mr. Alfred C. Harmsworth, an English millionaire, which has just sailed from the Thames. It is under the command of Mr. Jackson, an Arctic explorer of large experience, whose portrait, in his Polar costume, appears on this page, with pictures of his ship and the Russian houses he took with him. The ship is named "The Windward." It is a whaler of 321 tons, heavily armored with iron to protect her from the ice. She will carry the expedition to Archangel, where a quantity of stores has been collected. Houses of wood and felt, clothing of reindeer skin, and Siberian dogs and ponies await her arrival. When these are taken on board, she will proceed to the south of Franz Josef Land, where she will leave the party and return home. In the summer of 1896 she will be sent back to the same part of Franz Josef Land to meet the explorers and take them home. The exploring party consists of Mr. Jackson and seven scientific men carefully selected, of whom some have already had experience in far northern latitudes. They carry with them sledges, which, if open water is reached, can be stripped of their runners and used as boats. One of them is of aluminium and another of copper. With these they will try to reach the Pole, though their chief duty will be to make an exhaustive examination of Franz Josef Land, with its flora and fauna, and collect scientific information about it which will be of use to later expeditions. There is now a general belief that Franz Josef Land is the best if not the only practicable way to the Pole, and it is hoped that the exploration of the country may solve several problems connected with the search. Mr. Harmsworth, who has spent $125,000 in fitting out the expedition, has sought the counsel of the most eminent authorities on Arctic travel and has employed the best experts in devising ingenious methods of overcoming the difficulties which will be encountered. In equipment, clothing and food, the expedition excels any that has been sent out, and there is little doubt that, even if it fails to reach the Pole, it will make valuable additions to our knowledge of the Arctic regions. The careful study devoted to it, the foresight displayed and the earnest endeavor of each member of the expedition to fit himself for the efficient discharge of his duties, are in striking contrast to the conduct of the majority of men with respect to that journey which all must take beyond the grave. For that, although infallible directions are given, there is frequently no preparation. (Ps. 90: 12.)

Signals from Mars.

An interesting astronomical discovery has been made by Mons. Javelle of the Nice observatory. In describing it in a cable despatch to the "New York Herald," Prof. Javelle says that a number of bright points, exceedingly luminous, have suddenly appeared in the south region of the planet. They may be aurora, or gigantic forest fires, but he is more inclined to think that they are artificial lights set by intelligent beings on the planet with the object of attracting the attention of the inhabitants of this world. The idea was possibly suggested by the plans discussed some two years ago for signalling from this world to Mars. A French lady bequeathed twenty thousand dollars to any astronomer who should devise a means of signalling to Mars and it was then decided that the best kind of signal would be a number of lights arranged on a blackened surface of immense size in some desert: the lights to be successively in the shape of a square, a triangle and a circle. If there are geometers on Mars, they would at once see, supposing that they could see the lights at all, that they were arranged by intelligent beings and they might construct an answering signal. If Mons. Javelle's theory is correct, the people of Mars have anticipated us and are signalling on the principle suggested. It is calculated that a light four hundred thousand times as powerful as the search light now being set up at Fire Island would be needed to be perceptible on Mars, if there are telescopes there as powerful as we have; but at the present rate of scientific discovery there cannot be any insurmountable obstacle to the production of such a light. The discovery of Prof. Javelle has sent a thrill of fascinated interest through all the observatories in the world and the possibility of the lights on the planet being signals is eagerly discussed. If the astronomers come to the conclusion that they are signals, doubtless, an effort will be made to answer them. This will be natural and desirable, although of course, no practical benefit can come from it. The strange thing is that the general anxiety to establish communication does not lead more men to hold communion with heaven, which is certainly possible and of incalculable benefit. (Jer. 33: 3.)

An Eccentric Will.

A New York lady has been placed by the will of her mother in the unpleasant dilemma of losing a large income or losing her husband. Her mother, who died recently in France, was possessed of an estate valued at six million dollars. She has bequeathed the income of the whole to her daughter, with remainder to the daughter's heirs. The strange condition, however, is attached to the bequest that the daughter shall procure a divorce from her husband, or shall separate from him and remain apart from him. She is to receive the income quarterly on condition that she proves that during the preceding three months she has not been in his society. In the event of her not being able or willing to do this the income is to be distributed among a number of distant relatives. It appears that the daughter's husband, who is an eminently respectable man, had the misfortune two years ago to offend his mother-in-law, and she took this step to punish him. He and his wife are on affectionate terms, so that the will is a very cruel one. The wife has made no statement of her intentions, but it is believed by her friends that she will hold to her husband and renounce the bequest. That would be the course taken by any true and faithful wife, but there are some, who would applaud her for doing it, who cling to the world and its wealth though they know that it separates them from Christ to whom their obligations are more sacred than those of a wife to her husband. (Matt. 19: 29.)

Trolley Cars in Mourning.

The numerous deaths that have been caused in Brooklyn, N. Y., since the surface cars have used the trolley system, has been for some months a matter of public concern. Various measures have been suggested for the protection of pedestrians, but so far none of them has remedied the evil. A unique suggestion was made the other day by a Binghamton citizen who was visiting Brooklyn. He said that they had the trolley in Binghamton, but the motormen were much more careful there than in Brooklyn, having been taught caution by a wholesome discipline. An ordinance of the city requires the car companies to decorate with emblems of mourning a car which occasions the death of any person. Last winter a man was run over and killed. When that particular car appeared on the following day it was a largely personal, consisting chiefly of stocks and bonds and valuable jewels. These, with the title deeds to his real estate, the man kept in his iron safe of which no one but himself knew the combination. He died suddenly without divulging it and the executor was in a difficulty. He could not open the safe in which the will and the bulk of the property were. Several experts were employed, but they failed to open it. He was acquainted with the warden of Joliet prison, to whom among others he mentioned his difficulty. The warden said that he had a man under his care who, he thought, could succeed, as he had exercised his skill in a way that had brought him into trouble. The prisoner was appealed to and he readily consented to try. He sat down before the safe-door gave the handle a few sharp turns and then began carefully feeling for the combination. In about an hour he had found it and the door stood open. Probably his success will not lead to any commutation of his sentence. The proof he gave of his skill would rather be a reason for keeping him in prison. The more brilliant his talents, if they were misapplied, the more dangerous an enemy to society he would be. This fact is often forgotten in speaking of poets, orators, and other public men whose genius is combined with godlessness. Genius cannot save a man but rather adds to his condemnation if it is used in the service of Satan. (1 Cor. 1: 19.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Total Receipts of the British and Foreign Bible Society for the financial year closed this spring were about $1,170,000 of which about $350,000 were the proceeds of sales, and the balance chiefly gifts and bequests.

Successful Union Evangelistic Services have been held in Woodstock, Vt., under the leadership of Rev. George C. Needham, assisted by Mr. Fisk, a Princeton student who aided greatly as leader of the song service.

Evangelist R. G. Pearson, who was active in the Revival work in New York last winter, has just closed a series of meetings in Greenville, Tenn., with large results. The pastors and churches of the town united and asked Mr. Pearson to lead the meetings.

The Movement for the Union of Evangelical denominations was recently brought informally to the attention of the Archbishop of Canterbury who said he was disposed to prefer prayer for "godly union and concord" between all Christians rather than for organic unity.

Rev. Thomas Harrison has Arranged to Conduct Revival Services at Ocean City, N. J., near Atlantic City in connection with the great Camp Meeting which opens there on Aug. 20. Many thousands of persons are expected to be present and a time of rich blessing is hoped for.

The Value of medical missions is shown by the fact that of twenty-five recent donations to the Second Presbyterian Church in Canton, eleven had been treated as patients in the mission hospital, which is both medical and evangelistic.

The Baroness Langenau, of Vienna, recently spoke at a meeting in the West London Mission and presented it with a necklace worth $10,000, to be sold for the benefit of the Mission.

Two Lady Evangelists, Miss May French and Miss Hattie McGregor have been conducting revival services at the Baptist Church at Brookline, Vt. They have resulted in large additions to the church and the restoration of several backsliders.

Mrs. Diaz, wife of the President of Mexico, has founded many institutions for the benefit of her countrywomen, among them a day nursery, a society to teach women remunerative employment, and an institution through which girls out of work can find employment.

The Russian Bible Society recently commemorated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its receiving Imperial sanction. The organization was really effected five years before, and in thirty years it has put into circulation 1,588,413 copies, of which 393,507 have been on account of the American Bible Society.

A Lady was Chosen by a District Meeting in England to represent it at the West-Yan Annual Conference. A discussion ensued as to whether her election was legal, and a motion was adopted instructing chairmen of district meetings not to accept the nominations of women as representatives, until the question should be decided by Conference.

A Revised Version of the New Testament in French has been prepared and will be shortly published. It is the work of a committee of French Protestants, of whom the President was Pastor Dupuin of St. Andre. Five denominations were represented in the committee. The famous preacher, Mons. Bersier of Paris, was one of the members. There has been no authorized version since the old Huguenot Bibles were published, the use of which has long been discontinued, owing to the number of words now obsolete that Bible contains. The translation chiefly used is that of Prof. Segond of Geneva, which was published in 1885.

Help from a Burglar.

An executor in Illinois who was unable to administer an estate has received help from an unusual source. He was asked by one of his friends some months ago to become executor to his will and, having consented, was told in general terms the character of the document. The estate was

A Round of Visits.

Our Traveler Calls upon a Typical Syrian Housewife — The Prerogatives of a well-to-do Moslem Widow.

HAVING stipulated that our visits on this afternoon shall be confined to respectable people whose worldly circumstances are moderately good, I demur when Mrs. Jamal, holding up the hem of her clean white izzar, leaves a narrow dirty street for a cross-alley, narrower and dirtier yet.

When I say that a Syrian street is dirty, I seek to convey a depth of meaning hard to be received into the imagination of the dweller in Western cities. This particular alley is positively noisome. Refuse of the most objectionable description rots and reeks in corners and close to the walls. The least unsafe footing is in the middle of the street. The houses stand close together, are from two to three stories high, of stone, and badly lighted. Most of them have but a single window in each room; some have none, the door admitting all the light and air that find their way to the murky interior.

All the children who can walk alone are in the street. In commenting upon the circumstance, I check the censure upon my lips. Allie Dinmont retorted, when her husband complained to a visitor that she "would aye give the bairnies their ain waw." "It's little else I have to give them — puir things!" And the uncombed, unwashed, black-eyed elves strolling and scampering in what is no better than a filthy gutter, would seem to have precious little except their own wild will to make life endurable.

Six or eight troop at our heels as we mount to the third story of a building no better and no worse than its neighbors.

"I will take you first to see the people who own the house — people who are well-off, almost rich, for this part of the world," my conductress flings back to me over her shoulder, her pleasant eyes sparkling with fun.

I see the meaning of her arch look the next minute. We have climbed the stairway, built, as are all in the neighborhood, upon the outside of the house, and slippery with mud, and pause at an open door while my guide asks leave to enter. Two-thirds of one room constituting the "home," is raised by two steps from the rest, the door opening at the side of the lower portion. Near the edge of the upper step a woman is slicing carrots into a big metal bowl — copper or brass, but black as iron. Her legs are doubled under her; the floor is covered with dirty matting and she sits flat upon it. She wears a dingy cotton skirt, and a wadded jacket; upon her head is an equally dingy mendeel. A brazier of charcoal is not far off over which the meal she is preparing will presently be cooked; a divan cushioned with Turkey red cotton, runs around two sides of the apartment; in a recess is a pile of quilts and rugs for bedding. Under the divan are a water jar and an oil-jug, with three earthenware bowls of various sizes, also a coffee-pot and half-a-dozen cups. There is not another stick of furniture, not another utensil to be seen.

Without rising, the hostess says in Arabic that we are welcome, and motions us to seat ourselves upon the divan, going on with her work, placidly ignorant of any deficiencies in her garb or surroundings. The children crowd together at the bottom of the room, staring stolidly at us; an older woman than the mistress of the establishment, seats herself upon the matting, reaches out an arm to grab the solitary garment of an eighteen-month-old creeping dangerously near the steps, and when he screams and slaps her, smiles listlessly.

From her appearance I should take her to be sixty years of age, and am amazed at discovering the baby-boy is hers and not yet weaned. She was the sixth wife — and is now the widow — of a Moslem who could afford to please himself in the matter of a plurality of partners. Three were divorced and two died while he was alive. Three of the children we now see belong to the widow by right and birth; her step-sons and daughters are married. Her jointure as her lord's only legal relict, enables her to live independently of them, I am informed. The deceased was in easy circumstances.

The widow's idea of independent ease is to dwell as a boarder with the gain-loving proprietors of the three-story tenement. She and her children, the man of the house, his wife and two children, eat and sleep in this room. Upon hearing it, I gasped! The place may be fifteen feet square. It is certainly not larger than this computation would make it. There is but one window, and that is set high up in the thick stone walls. A pair of pet pigeons are tip-toeing about the floor, pecking at crumbs; there is even a dog upon the threshold, albeit he is an accursed animal among the Moslems. At night-fall the door will close all these creatures in, and the window remain shut for fear of the damp draughts. The floor will be covered with quilts, and eight human beings lie down to sleep in the clothes they have worn by day.

"Yet you tell me these are not of the poorest class? that hundreds of others live in the same way without losing respectability?" I inquire.

My interpreter raises her eyebrows, and makes a gesture that would be impatient were it not courteous.

"I do tell you that they consider themselves comfortable. They have houses and money. They want nothing. And are proud — so very proud that did they know that we are here to see how they live, we would not be let inside of that door. I have told them that you are my English teacher —" and at my look of surprise, she adds, gracefully, "Indeed, madam! it is I who have learned much — ah, so much from you! I know these people. They have good characters and kind hearts. They are not of my religion but I respect them. You wished to see the ways of the country, and you are seeing them."

This is uttered low and rapidly, with the impassive countenance we train ourselves to assume when upon such errands. But for the speaker's womanly wit and tact, I could not gain access to what I especially wish to inspect, the homes of the great middle-class of Syrians. I bow to the unintentional rebuke conveyed in her protest. If "these people" choose to sit cross-legged and eat and sleep upon the floor, it is surely their affair and not mine. My prejudices in favor of carpets, mattresses, tables and table-cloths, knives, forks and bath-tubs, would seem as outlandish to them as their peculiarities appear to me, while as to their "pride," — the wife of an American freeholder would resent yet more indignantly the intrusion upon her domestic life of a Jerusalem reporter — if there be such a thing.

I copy carefully Mrs. Jamal's deportment, as she takes leave of our entertainers, after ten minutes' chat in Arabic. I even utter after her the one Arabic phrase I have learned, "Mar Salaami," in withdrawing our feet from the door.

Visit No. 2 has livelier elements in it. In point of worldly circumstance the families represented in the group to which I am introduced are apparently superior to the people I set down as "No. 1." The room, approached, as before by an outer stone stairway, is larger than that we have just left, but looks smaller for having an iron bedstead, draped with mosquito netting, and a veritable bureau in it. A plump cushion covered with Turkey-red is laid across two sides of the room, close to the wall. Upon it sit, crossed-legged, the grandmother of the household, sewing upon a man's shirt, and a Nubian woman, as black as charcoal. A deep brand upon the left cheek shows that she was once a slave. Although manumitted by law some years ago, many African slaves have elected to remain with their former owners. This is evidently one of the family. While her mistress plies the needle, the negress folds her arms upon her stomach and leans lazily against the wall, a grin upon her face, and more curiosity in her rolling eye-balls than I have ever seen evinced by a native Syrian of either sex. Chairs are set for us by a young woman who enters hastily behind us. She is introduced as a married daughter of the old woman. Her room is upon another floor of the house, and this is virtually but one family.

The invariable brazier is in the middle of the matted floor, and the unavoidable coffee steams upon it. We have talked of the weather and the chances of more rain for five minutes before the coffee is poured into tiny, handleless cups by a representative of the third generation, a girl of fourteen who is to be married in a couple of weeks. She trips around the circle in stockinged feet, having left her sandals at the door; her calico gown, belted about a full waist, is clean and very much like what a New England farmer's daughter would wear while doing the morning's housework. Her brown wrists are banded with gold and silver bangles, eight or ten upon each arm; she looks really animated as, in taking the cup from her hand, I wish for her, through our interpreter, many years of happiness in her new life. The spirit of enterprise exemplified in bed, bureau and chairs, gives tone to the household. A breeze from the world outside of harem windows has stolen in here through some unguarded crevice. The talk has briskness and almost sprightliness in it. The coffee is thick after the manner of all Turkish coffee; it is, moreover, made excessively sweet out of compliment to the foreign guest, and a liberal pinch of allspice is added to it. A decoction of wormwood would be more palatable to one of the victims, but the alternative being to take one of the cigarettes assuming form in the supple fingers of the daughter, the draught is committed to an amiable, and just now, oft-abused stomach. The cigarette-maker has deposited her yearling baby upon the floor, and, with a bowl of tobacco upon her lap and a pile of papers upon one knee, wets fore-finger and thumb in her mouth before beginning each fresh roll. Her mother lays by her sewing, the Nubian loosens her lazy bones to accept a cigarette; the bride-expectant puffs as fast as the rest, and the baby does not cough when the room is soon blue with smoke. The top of the bureau is ornamented with three tripods of black wood inlaid with mother-of-pearl, all standing upside down. One is placed in front of me and several cigarettes and a box of matches are laid in seductive array upon it. Should I change my mind, overcome by the temptation, I need not be mortified by the necessity of asking for the luxury.

The cigarette is always offered, and I need not say, never accepted. My reputation for taste and good manners must suffer in the minds of the spectators, but they refrain from criticism, spoken or looked.

Coffee is made every hour in this room, and cigarettes are rolled by one or other of the women, all day long. They do literally nothing between meals, but sip and smoke and — as a pasha's wife told a visitor of her own method of passing the time — "just sit." The grandmother is a notable and stirring housewife in that she knows how to sew and occasionally make a garment for her soldier-son. She is further distinguished among her neighbors by preferring to sleep in a bed rather than on a quilt upon the floor.

The greeting bestowed upon Mrs. Jamal is cordial to affectionateness. She explains it aside, presently, the baby's screaming demand to be taken up and fed, absorbing the attention of the others.

"You see I run in once in a while, and tell them stories. They are only children — nothing more — and will listen for hours to tales of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Samuel, and all that, you know. I give them only Bible stories, but that they never suspect. Not that they would care, but the men object to having their wives and daughters taught the Christian religion. They say it makes them too independent. So, I must slip in the good I would do them — poor souls!"

A quick footstep sounds upon the stone stair. The women of three generations arise to greet the stalwart young fellow in uniform who appears in the doorway. One after another, they kiss his hands; his aged mother hastens to set the one unoccupied chair for him; the young niece serves him with coffee, his sister supplies him with a cigarette and lights it for him. He is not ill-looking, and his behavior is "quite the thing," according to his lights and those of his kinspeople. He has nodded to us, receiving without a word the attentions paid to him by his assiduous servants, and when we exchange "Mar salaamis" with the rest of the party and are urged to repeat the call, we leave him seated, his long legs stretched half-way across the room, the cigarette between his lips, his handsome eyes fixed upon the ceiling.

On Ararat's Peak.

Two Adventurous Americans make the Ascent of "the Mountain of the Ark."

SOME time ago, a fanatical priest claiming to belong to the Greek Church, excited some attention by a story to which he gave circulation concerning a journey he was said to have made to the summit of Ararat. On the highest peak, as he asserted, he found the remains of a gigantic vessel—no other than the ark of Noah. His story was promptly discredited for, although he had never even set foot on Ararat, there were many reliable travelers who had climbed the famous mountain, only to find its summit a mass of unbroken snow lying on the rocks and earth.

Two young American tourists, Messrs. Allen and Sachtleben, while traveling in Asiatic Turkey last year, ascended Ararat successfully. In writing their account of this exciting incident to the "Century," they recite the almost incredible hardships endured during the 14,000 feet climb, the intense cold, burning thirst and danger from glacier and avalanche, they say:

"We pushed and pulled one another almost to the top, and then, with one more desperate effort, we stood upon a vast and gradually sloping snow-bed. Down we plunged above our knees through the yielding surface, and staggered and fell with failing strength; then rose once more and plodded on, until at last we sank exhausted upon the top of Ararat.

"We were suddenly aroused by the rumbling of thunder below us. A storm was rolling rapidly up the southeast slope of the mountain. The atmosphere seemed to be boiling over the heated plain below. Higher and higher came the clouds, rolling and seething among the grim crags along the chasm; and soon we were caught in its embrace. The thermometer dropped at once below the freezing point, and the dense mists, driven against us by the hurricane, formed icicles on our frozen faces. Although we could scarcely see far enough ahead to follow back the track by which we had ascended, yet we were obliged to attempt it at once, for the storm around us was increasing every moment; we could even feel the charges of electricity whenever we touched the iron points of our alpenstocks.

"Carefully peering through the clouds we managed to follow the trail we had made along the gradually sloping summit, to the head of the great chasm, which now appeared more terrible than ever. We saw that it would be extremely perilous, if not actually impossible, to make a descent on the rocks along its treacherous edge in such a hurricane. The only alternative was to take the precipitous snow covered slope. Planting our ice-hooks deep in the snow behind us, we started. At first the strong head wind, which on the top almost took us off our feet, somewhat checked our downward career, but it was not long before we attained a velocity that made our hair stand on end. It was a thrilling experience; we seemed to be sailing through the air itself, for the clouds obscured the slope even twenty feet below. Finally we emerged beneath them into the glare of the afternoon sunlight; but on we dashed for 6,000 feet, leaning heavily on the trailing-stocks, which threw up an icy spray in our wake. We never once stopped until we reached the bottom of the dome, at our last night's camp among the rocks. In less than an hour we had dashed down through a distance which it had taken us nine and a half hours to ascend. The camp was reached at 4 p.m., just twelve hours from the time we left it."

THE GOSPEL ARROW.

In one of his addresses Mr. Moody related the following incident: "I read some time ago a story that illustrates the power of a single tract. A society was some years ago established to distribute tracts by mail in the higher circles. One of these tracts entitled 'Prepare to Meet thy God,' was enclosed in an envelope, and sent to a gentleman well known for his ungodly life and reckless impiety. He was in his study when he read this letter among others.

"What's that?" said he. 'Prepare to meet thy God.' 'Who has had the impudence to send me this cant?' And with an imprecation on his unknown correspondent he arose to put the paper in the fire.

"No, I won't do that," he said to himself. "On second thought I know what I will do. I'll send it to my friend B—." It will be a good joke to hear what he'll say about it." So saying, he enclosed the tract in a fresh envelope, and in a feigned hand directed it to his boon companion.

"Mr. B— was a man of his own stamp, and received the tract as his friend had done, with an oath at the Methodistical humbug, which his first impulse was to it tear in pieces.

"'I'll not tear it, either,' said he to himself. 'Prepare to meet thy God' at once arrested his attention, and smote his conscience. The arrow of conviction entered his heart as he read, and he was converted. Almost his first thought was for his ungodly associates.

"'Have I received such blessed light and truth, and shall I not strive to communicate it to others?'

"He again folded the tract, and enclosed and directed it to one of his companions in sin. Wonderful to say, the little arrow hit the mark. His friend read. He also was converted; and both are now walking as the Lord's redeemed ones."

PRAYER ANSWERED.

Remarkable instances of direct answer to prayer in South Dakota were recently reported in Western religious journals. The drought has been more general than for years. All parts of the State have suffered.

Rainmakers were at work during the latter part of May, but their work was a dismal failure. Small grain came to be in many places almost a total loss. The city of Aberdeen, blessed with a wonderful revival last winter, seeing the spiritual forces gathered there in danger of being scattered as well as the material, held a special service Sunday afternoon, June 3, to pray for rain. This was followed by several other similar services. The Bible was searched for Biblical warrant for such prayer. At length the mayor, himself not a Christian, called on the people to suspend business and gather in the Grain Palace, June 12, to ask God for rain.

That evening a light shower fell, and the next night a general copious rain refreshed all that region. Next, Huron prayed, holding several services, and then gave thanks. The mayor of Madison called on the people to suspend business for prayer, and within forty-eight hours they had their answer. The mayor of Watertown did the same, with like results. In Brookings, also, the mayor's proclamation called for prayer. The afternoon revival service was turned into one for study of the Scriptures and prayer. That evening the sermon was cut short that people might reach their homes before the storm. The following morning (Sunday) an audience that filled the opera house stood before God while the pastor led them in thanksgiving.

TWO PROPHETIC SYMBOLS.

Dr. Elliott's Interpretation in his "Hora Apocalypticæ" of the Symbols of the Travelling Woman and the Dragon.

IN the twelfth chapter of Revelation the travelling woman is spoken of as the mother of "those that keep the commandments of God, and the testimony of Jesus Christ," for they are denominated "the remnant of her seed."

She is evidently therefore Christ's true visible Church on earth. The woman's clothing with the sun as her robe of light, the moon (the crescent moon, I conceive) as the sandal to her feet, and the twelve stars as her coronal or diadem, must needs have appeared on the scene of vision very beautiful; and it might perhaps recall to St. John that description of the Bride in the Song of Songs: "Fair as the moon, bright as the sun, and terrible as a host."

As regards "the Great Red Dragon having seven heads and ten horns and seven diadems on its heads," a chronological indication seems to be given to the very use of the symbol of the dragon, since it was not till near the close of the 2nd century that the dragon was first used as a Roman ensign, nor till the third that its use became common, we might thence probably infer that the time represented in the vision was not earlier than the third century. A chronological indication of the same kind, but yet more restrictive, seems to be given in the use of diadems, not crowns, on the heads of the dragon, in signification of royal or ruling power. For it was not till the time of Diocletian, A.D. 300 that the diadem was adopted as one of the imperial insignia.

During this period the Church suffered grievous persecution. The sorrows as of a woman in travail had indeed come upon her. Her children were to be crushed, like a hydra-headed enemy of the State, by Maximian, the champion of Roman Polytheism and the Roman Empire. A medal depicting this was coined and is now in the Paris collection, where Maximian appears in the guise and with the name of Hercules destroying his hydra enemy. Similar in character to which is a medal of Diocletian, as Jove striking down with his thunder-bolt a Titan monster ending in serpents, in place of the lower half of the human body. In May, 311, however, light dawned on the Christians. From his sick bed the conscience-stricken Galerius issued an Edict of Toleration in their favor: an Edict which was published in the names of Constantine and Licinius, as consenting parties, as well as in his own; though not in those of Maxentius or Maximian. And when, in the course of the next two eventful years, the Roman Empire becomes tripartited between three emperors—the Christians emerged from these political revolutions thus variously circumstanced. In two-thirds of the Empire, embracing its whole European and African territory, they enjoyed toleration; and presently also, by virtue of the celebrated Milan Decree of Constantine and Licinius, issued March, 313, in their favor, the imperial kindly recognition and support; in the other or Asiatic third they were still, after but a brief and uncertain respite, exposed to persecution as before.

And now, was not the state of things in the Roman Empire one that well answered to the crisis depicted in the vision? First the Christian Church, united as one, and morally bright and beautiful—abundantly the more so from the purifying effect of the last persecution, appeared before the world ascendant, for the first time, in the political heaven: with the sunshine embracing it of the highest of the three Imperial dignities, and the light and favor beaming on it of the second also; moreover with the chief bishops resplendent at its head, as a starry coronal: the heads, now imperially recognized of the dodecapylon of the Christian Israel. The time at which she thus appeared corresponds to the fortieth week of gestation, calculated on the year-day prophetic chronological scale from A.D. 33.

The edict of favor to the Christians was but the precursor evidently to the establishment of Christianity, and by consequence its supremacy in the empire. Might not this be at least one fulfilment of the man-child's birth and assumption to God's throne? Then what next but the ruling of the heathens in the empire with a rod of iron? For it had long been evident that Christianity and heathenism could not consist together in power; and that on the elevation of the former there must needs follow the oppression, and finally the subversion of the latter.

THE CHRISTIAN'S JOY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning August
20. John 15: 1-11.

CHRIST'S object in those sweet and tender talks that he had with his disciples during the days when he was entering the shadow of the cross was no mystery. He was about to leave them alone in the world where they would have little sympathy and where they must encounter much opposition. He did not conceal from them that they would be hated and persecuted. Their whole future life would be one of poverty, hardship, harass and suffering and all but one would die an ignominious death at the hands of the public executioner. Not a cheerful prospect; but any one of them might escape the misery of such a lot by deserting the cause and abjuring Christ and his work. They might live the ordinary human life in ease and comfort having domestic happiness with home and wife and children and friends. The two alternatives were open to them. Fidelity to Christ with persecution and heavy trouble, on the one hand and desertion of him with peace and comfort, on the other hand. Why should they choose the former? In a few words Christ tells them what they will gain and says that his conversations with them were designed for that specific purpose. "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you and that your joy might be full." So, then, Jesus when near a shameful death had a joy, and could communicate it, so that it would become theirs and it was a joy that would be full.

The expression is deeply significant. No man apart from Christ can say that his joy is full. There is always some bitter drop in the cup. The happiest man has some trouble to vex his soul. We know by experience and by our association with others that no man is perfectly and completely happy. So, Christ was promising something unknown in the world, and he was telling these men how it could come to them. They were to have it by union with him—a strange, unearthly but very real and close mystical union, as vital as the branch has with the vine. We have to grope in the dark for an understanding of such a mysterious union, yet there are things in life that may help us to reach it. The companionship of a husband and wife where there is a true union of spirit, is one. Thousands of men buffeted and harassed in business, are supported and encouraged by the tender love and sympathy they receive in their homes. We wonder that they can be so cheerful in their troubles, and we reach their secret source of equanimity only when we see their domestic life. Friendship often gives such strength. A man is cheerful and helped by some other man who knows his trials and loves him and stands by him. A child crippled or afflicted in some way draws strength to bear his hard lot from father or mother. Each would feel that all the joy in life would depart if he lost the one on whom he leans. Thus we gain some light on Christ's meaning in speaking of the joy that comes from union with him. And his words were true. They have been fulfilled in the experience of thousands. All who have ever entered into that union know that it means fullness of joy.

THE MONTREAL Y. M. C. A.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Montreal, has reason to be proud of the beautiful home a picture of which, with the well-kept grounds surrounding it, appears on this page. The building, which with its site is valued at $175,000, is the largest and best equipped of the buildings owned by the Association in all Canada. It has also the largest number of members, which the latest report gives as 1,532. More than half of these are on the active list, which speaks well also for the spirituality of the Association. It was established in 1851, only seven years after the movement was started by George Williams in England. It thus antedates the New York Association by a year, competes with Boston for the position of the senior Association on this side of the Atlantic. It has an excellent gymnasium, bath, etc., and does an extensive work in giving secular education to young men. Twelve branches are taught under its auspices and about three hundred young men are registered as pupils. Lectures, sociables and other entertainments are frequently given, making the institution a valuable acquisition to the intellectual life of the city. Nor is the spiritual side of the work neglected. Three religious meetings are held every week with an average attendance of ninety-eight and a Bible class once a week, which has an average attendance of eighty-three.

A SAILOR'S INDEBTEDNESS TO THE KING'S DAUGHTERS.

The efforts of the King's Daughters on behalf of seamen are among the most successful of their many labors for Christ.

One incident sent to the "Silver Cross" shows what is being done. A worker in the cause writes: A seaman on the White Star Steamship Majestic, came into our Mission one night under the influence of liquor. He had lost his wife and child, and had tried to drown his sorrow in the intoxicating cup. He listened attentively to the words spoken by one of the Daughters, and resolved to give up drinking and take the pledge. He had a small bottle of whiskey in his pocket which he threw overboard when he returned to his steamer. The following night he came again to the meeting, a sober man. While listening to the appeal from one of the ladies, he made up his mind in all things to follow Christ. He was converted, and wears the silver cross and anchor.

A seaman from the Cunard steamship, Umbria, told us that our efforts to get him to sign the pledge had been the means, in the hands of God, of saving his soul. He had become hardened in sin and kept away from all that was good. His wife was a Christian, but at home, in Liverpool, when the minister came to see them, he would go out of the house, and refuse to hear any one talk on religious subjects. One evening, after a solemn service, I spoke to him very kindly and said, "My friend, will you not be willing to take the pledge for one month, and tell us when you come back from England if you have kept it?" At first he thought he could not keep it, but finally said, "I will put my name factor of measureless power in the spiritual activities of this age. These are noble objects for a paper to serve—grand ends to promote—worthy of the highest ability and the most complete consecration of the life devoted to their achievement.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey's selection of music for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is one of the new pieces composed for use at the Christian Endeavor Convention at Cleveland. It appears on page 521. Mr. Sankey intends making other selections from this new Christian Endeavor Hymn Book, which will be published in this journal.

An appeal has been issued to Epworth Leagues of the New England Southern Conference, to come to the help of Missionary Secretary C. C. McCabe with contributions. It is signed by the Conference President and by the Presidents of the Providence, New Bedford and Norwich districts.

At the Rally of the Epworth Leagues of Troy Conference at Round Lake, a special appeal was made for contributions to the fund of a quarter million dollars for missions. The delegates pledged themselves to raise as large a sum as possible and have it in the Secretary's office on the day following Thanksgiving Day.

The membership of the Johannesburg, Southern Africa, Y. M. C. A. now numbers over one hundred, and the Association is doing a very vigorous work. Mr. Hastings, of the Standard Bank, has been elected president.

The Christian Endeavor Societies in and about Chicago held a great rally on July 26 in the Union Park Congregational Church. The spacious edifice was full to overflowing. Not less than 2,000 were present.

An advice from Chefoo, North China, says: "Native Y. M. C. A. work opened lately. Dr. Corbett, of the American Presbyterian Mission, presided. Four or five Christian natives spoke. We have opened a second place (off the great street), and at present it is hoped to work the two three nights a week each."

Mr. Miron A. Clarke, secretary of the International Y. M. C. A. Committee for Brazil, writes that he is now about recovered from the yellow fever, while Mrs. Clark is also recovering from an attack of the disease. They do not tear a second attack, and therefore begin anew their work with courage.

An immense photograph is being sold in London of a group of delegates to the recent Jubilee celebration of Young Men's Christian Associations. There are 2,500 portraits in the group.

At the annual Convention of the Marshalltown district, held at Toledo, Iowa, recently forty-one Senior Chapters, twenty-one juniors, three companies of Epworth guards, and one d'elarte class were reported in flourishing condition.

The handsome building of the Young Men's Christian Association in the French capital has been cleared of debt. On his return from the Jubilee celebration, Mons. A. Andre, Regent of the Bank of France, called a meeting of the leading Protestants of Paris and after giving an account of the Association's work, headed a list of contributions with a handsome sum and invited them to complete it. Mr. James Stokes, of New York, responded liberally and before the meeting closed the whole amount required had been paid in.

down." God helped him to keep his promise. He yielded his heart to him and became a Christian, also a member of the Order, and is now wearing the little silver cross.

AN EPWORTH MANIFESTO.

In introducing to his readers the new organ of the Epworth League in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Dr. S. A. Steel gives the following outline of his idea of the mission of the League and its paper: "The Epworth Era" is the organ of the young people of Southern Methodism. The Church has established it for their benefit. It is to strive to lead them to Christ; to help them in their work; to assist them in all departments of Christian service; to encourage and aid them in the study of good literature; to stimulate them to noble deeds; to attach them in intelligent and unshakable fidelity to the church, which is the body of Christ; to voice their opinions; to report their progress; to magnify their importance as a Social Life in Japan.

Some Interesting Peculiarities of Asiatic Etiquette—Woman's Position and Influence.

RECENT events in Japan have directed increased attention to the condition of affairs in that country, which is to-day foremost among Asiatic nations in all that relates to social and political progress. Its people are much given to pleasure, and social observances among them are multiplied and exaggerated to an extent that, to Western minds, seems useless and incomprehensible.

In Kioto, which is the religious center of the Mikado's Empire, ceremonialism rules everything, religion, politics, and social observances included. Its people regard themselves as the most cultured part of the nation, and pride themselves upon their ancestral lineage and elegant refinement. Our illustration on this page from a photograph received from Rev. Mr. Kato, a native Christian Congregational preacher and teacher in Japan affords an idea of the ceremonious forms observed during a simple social visit between neighbors. Rigid punctilio characterizes every social function, whether it be an afternoon call, an evening party, or a mere introduction.

Japanese ladies of the better class are slight, but handsome, with complexions which might be compared with those of the ladies of Europe or America; indeed some ladies of the Court are quite as white as their Caucasian cousins. They dress in picturesque fashion, their robes being brilliant with color and rich with silks and delicate stuffs that seem especially suited to the climate.

Woman in the Mikado's realm occupies a social position which her sisters in China may well envy. She is the friend and companion of man in a domestic sense, not his slave. There are many features in social life in the large cities that are offensive to Western taste, but in thousands of Japanese homes the position of the wife and mother is honored and respected as it is with ourselves. The wives are virtuous and exemplary, the husbands kind and affectionate. Children, especially, are made much of in such homes. As they grow up, they are taught the thousand and one little social observances that are so dear to the Japanese feminine heart, and which are regarded as indispensable to the training of youth.

It has been humorously, and yet not inaptly, said by travelers that one of the principal recommendations about a Japanese house is that it needs hardly any furniture. Its picturesquely-papered walls and polished ceilings give it at all times an attractive appearance, even though empty. For the rest, a few mats, flower-stands and screens fill up the spaces very nicely. But there are many homes in Japan where tables and chairs, and even bedsteads, are by no means unknown.

Western housewives would probably be more surprised by a peep into the interior of a Japanese kitchen than by anything else in the domestic establishment. Among the natives, cooking ranges are unknown. Many use a couple of earthen ovens no bigger than good-sized flower-pots; yet it is astonishing how skilfully the average housewife can cook with such simple utensils omelets, soups, broiled chickens, puddings, baked, boiled and fried potatoes, and other appetizing dishes. With a grid-iron, a fry-demands of the religious duties imposed by the two prevailing creeds of the country, Buddhism and Shintoism.

Christianity is making gradual progress in Japan, and within the last twenty-five years many missions have been established in the leading cities, and numerous converts made. They are not a gloomy nor morose people, and those who hear the Gospel, listen patiently, and many accept it heartily, finding in its consolations and promises something to sweeten their lives and endow them with a higher and holier purpose.

Health in the Home.

There is nothing that impresses the mind of a guest more sadly than the absence of health in American homes, writes E. Marguerite Lindley. One can scarce call on a friend where the conversation is not largely the condition of some invalid member of the family absent or present, who claims the sympathy of loving hearts. Health, absolute and unimpaired seems phenomenal; and daily headaches, backaches, indigestion, etc., are as fully anticipated as is the earth's revolution. It is not entirely the fault of the present generation of women and girls. Custom has demanded that education of the body be neglected, and custom is a recognized leader in every circle regardless of hygienic laws. Nature's laws, God's laws, if so strong argument is needed to claim attention of women.

It is custom, not health, comfort or duty that rules the majority of women. Would the true mother but pause and consider that

THE GOLDEN SIDE.

THERE is many a rest in the road of life
If we only would stop to take it;
And many a tone from the better land
It the querulous heart would make it.
To the soul that is full of buoyant hope,
And whose beautiful trust ne'er faileth,
The grass is green and the flowers are bright
Though the winter's storm prevaileth.

Better to weave in the web of life
A bright and golden filling,
And do God's will with a cheerful heart,
And hands that are ready and willing,
Than to snap the delicate, minute thread
Of our curious lives asunder,
And then blame heaven for the tangled ends,
And sit and grieve and wonder.

FOOD AND HAPPINESS.

MORAL and intellectual, as well as physical character, remarks a philosophical writer, depend to a very large extent upon the character of our diet, and when pious women tell me they are so actively engaged in Christian work that they have no time to attend to culinary matters, or look after the food that goes upon their home tables, I say to them: No church work, no temperance work, no benevolent work, no good work of any kind, can be done effectively without the aid of good food, and only through the aid of good, wholesome, well-prepared food can the noblest results of Christian effort be obtained in this world or the world to come.

The best of cookery will not prove a panacea for every human ill. It will not eradicate disease and death. It will not even banish from the earth all social and political evil, but it will do much to increase the aggregate of earthly enjoyment. It will add greatly to the comfort, health and happiness of suffering humanity. It will develop more fully the physical, mental and moral vigor of men and women, enable them to realize that the world is full of joy and beauty, and encourage them to lead cleaner, sweeter and more effective lives.

Use of Leisure.

Time is money to him whose main purpose is to make money; but to him whose first aspiration is to acquire character, time is character. It is in leisure time that one feels the fullest freedom of the will. Our busy times are busy partly by a sort of compulsion of necessity or of habit. We are hardly conscious of a deliberate choice in the matter of their occupation. But in the disposal of our leisure time, we are conscious of a free, full and independent use of the will. It is this matter of willing that germinates and roots character. Says Herbert, the eminent German pedagogue: "The will is the seat of character; the kind of decision of the will determines the species of character." It is in his leisure time, therefore, that a man gives the set to his character. Equally with the operation of breathing and the beating of the heart, the character-forming process is going on without leisure, without vacation, whether we would have it so or not. This is a thought for week-day and Sunday, for the winter evening, and conspicuously for the summer vacation.

THE CEREMONIAL OF RECEIVING VISITORS IN A JAPANESE HOME.

ing pan, a few clay bowls for boiling purposes, and a charcoal fire, she is equipped for any culinary task. And the men are just as capable cooks as the women; indeed, there are many Japanese households where men cooks are employed by preference.

Although class distinctions are sharply marked in Japan, there is in most cases a bond of sympathy between "samurai" and "heimin," master and servant, that sometimes receives open and pleasant demonstration. On the day of the New Year festival, servants who have been kindly treated by their master, show their high esteem for him by elevating him bodily some half-dozen times in the air. Altogether, they are a happy, light-hearted people, who extract as much amusement out of life as possible. At the same time, it must be said of them that they do not neglect the her child is far better fortified for intellectual adult life with health thoroughly established, granting no concessions to any ailments, than with a crowded mind toppling over a poorly developed body. Education would not be the incubating process it is now, and we should have strong, enduring men and women in lieu of a people destined to succumb early to nervous disease and heart failure. Mothers deplore these conditions after they are once present and censure the imprudence of other mothers, yet not one mother in a thousand works earnestly to prevent it in her own case. She must follow custom's demands instead of Nature's and insist beyond all reason upon the piano, the school-books, the easel, everything that involves concentration of will power. What wonder hearts and nerves are over-worked and yield early to disease.

CHAPTER VIII. CROSSING THE DESERT.

LIFE often seems to be full of cross purposes. Zerola was on her way home, counting the days and hours until she would reach the dear house in Nazareth and lay her head on her mother's bosom. She was longing, too, to see Thæon and tell him how she had loved him through all her sufferings. He, too, would be at Nazareth, she thought, and in a few more days she would be with him, and their long-delayed marriage would take place. Vain hopes, both of them! Mary and Thæon, had they known of Zerola's coming, would have been as eager for it as she. They would have been at Nazareth waiting to welcome her and pour into her ears the glad story of love and sympathy, wherewith we comfort the sorrowing and help the sufferer to forget his troubles. But they knew not, and Mary was in Egypt, hoping yet to gain tidings of her long-lost daughter, and Thæon was in Rome seeking her place of concealment. It was to an empty and deserted nest that Zerola was flying on the swift, white-winged vessel.

Disappointment must add its sharp, envenomed stab to the wounds already borne, and it is, as all know, a wound hard to bear. Who is there that has not learned the sting of that laceration, the ache from that blow, the heart-sinking from that crushing weight? The mountains of life on which we breathe the exhilarating air of hope and joy are surrounded by the valleys in which we pant for air and our spirits sink and our limbs are heavy and numb. We stand on the higher levels looking off to other heights near and far, glowing in the sunlight and radiant with celestial glory. Those, too, our feet shall tread. We will go to them and bathe in the cool dews and sun ourselves in the pure light above the clouds. Would that we had wings as an eagle that we might fly from one glorious mountain top to another. But we can reach them only by descending into the valley and ascending wearily and painfully, with feet bruised by the rocks and torn by the briars of the thorny road. With many a stumble and painful fall we descend and ascend, and the hours of exhilaration on the mountain-tops are separated by long intervals of toil and aching pain. On the summit the joy we have seems only the prelude to greater joy to come, while it is really the prelude to sorrow, whose depths are measured by the elevation on which we stand.

And all classes share the same experience, although some stay longer than others on the mountain-top. Less eager are they for new joys and new delights and are content to enjoy without effort or anticipation. But even to them the bitter water of disappointment is no unknown cup. They whom they love and hope to keep ever at their side, die or go to distant lands. Or the love that seemed destined to grow and give fruit, withers and dies being unreciprocated. The affection that seemed personal and disinterested proves to have been mercenary and the discovery wrings the heart and drains it of its life blood. Our hopes wither, our plans are thwarted, our affections wasted, and did we not know that life is but a school to fit us for higher conditions, we should despair. To Zerola, as to Mary, the cup of disappointment must be presented and it was already mixed. What was life worth to the maiden without mother or lover? Liberty and the recovery of sight were only a mockery without the two loved ones. Her elation on the voyage was preparing her for the more acute suffering when she should find the emptiness at the end of it. Mary was spared that pain. She hoped only for tidings, while Zerola was hoping for the joy of personal reunion. But even Mary's hope failed at last. No sure intelligence of her daughter could be obtained, and she set out on her long and weary journey homeward, sick at heart and despairing.

Happily, both Mary and Zerola knew the only remedy for these distressing experiences. Very dear to both was he who said: "My peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth, give I unto you." The peace promised has been given freely and liberally to all who have gone to him for it and, shielded by that garment and standing firmly on the rock, they found that the storms of life might be defied. In her dungeon, Zerola had been supported by it, and in her home Mary experienced it, even when, like Jacob, she mourned for her beloved one, dead to her although alive. They knew that even at the worst, if no more in this life, should either behold the other, he was the resurrection and the life, and beyond the extend their strong arms and shelter the raven and the nightingale. Far to the north Mount Serbal's granite slopes, engraved with ancient writings and strange symbols, greet the first beams of the morning sun and welcome the first twinkling of the evening star.

Twilight brings a mysterious calmness to the desert, not the stillness of peaceful repose, but rather a timid, voiceless awakening; the very sands beneath your feet seem trembling to tell their dread secrets—well it is if your camel keeps from stumbling over some grim skeleton—well if your cheek recoils not from the fancied touch, the clammy kiss of some spectre seeming to rise from the dark graves and flit down the lonely caverns.

Here thoughts of all kinds crowd through the human mind—thoughts simple and mysterious, noble and unworthy; sometimes angels from holier worlds than this, sometimes the enemies of men; thoughts of the dim, dark past, of its sighings and its yearnings, of its victories and its triumphs, of its failures and its ruins; thoughts of the dimmer unknown future, thoughts of immortality, of its longings and its beckonings—for the soul shrinks from an eternal grave, and so pausing in the midst of this forever to catch some echo of the past, some whisper of the future, feels the place whereon it stands is holy ground, feels its heart throb in unison with the great warm heart of humanity; thoughts of riches and of poverty, of the wealthy hundreds and the of the usual kind, except that no ornaments of gold or silver shone or tinkled on either the harness of the camel or the litter of the rider.

Just when a short distance from the edge of the foliage bordering the trackless waste, the woman spoke to the camel. It careened a moment, then kneeled. Eager eyes glanced all around, scanned the turfs of arbutus and acacias languishing at the foot of Serbal. Yes, this was the very place: there was the granite boulder. So, placing her sandal upon the neck of the camel, the woman stepped upon the sand. As she walked toward the palm-tree her flowing robe falling in folds almost to the black thongs of her sandals according to the custom among nations of the East, there was a certain power of spirit—seemingly subdued by some gentle passion—surrounding her like an atmosphere which you could feel but not define.

Soon she stood beside the granite; and that very boulder was the stone that marked her husband's grave. The night was beautiful: the blue hills standing dim in the distance like dark-clad sentinels, nightingales singing among the waving branches of the trees, purple clouds tinged with silvery light casting their shadows on old Mount Serbal and drifting ever onward toward the lovely land of Palestine.

And the stars were shining, and they shone upon the grave. The woman now was kneeling, kneeling beside the grave beneath the palm-tree and praying,—Mary the Mother of Zerola was praying to him whom she believed to be "too wise to err and too good to be unkind,"—praying to God the Father of the Nazarene and of all mankind.

Meanwhile the dromedary had arisen and was browsing on the camel-grass growing in the neighborhood, having wandered some little distance from the place where left by its rider.

The night was dark now, but more beautiful. A calming Presence seemed to give the desert that holy charm, that almost sacred stillness wherein the soul of the traveler feels each blade of grass, each palm-tree leaf, the rocks, the hills and all the stars are whispering those beckoning truths that angel hands have engraved in eternal gold deep down in the unvoiced thought of every man and every woman.

Mary soon arose and saw where the camel had wandered to. Walking towards it she observed far up the mountain what seemed to have the appearance of a cross. Then all the story she had heard from the lips of the mother of Jesus flashed through her mind:

the star shining above Bethlehem announcing the birth of the Saviour of men, the flight from Herod across this same desert, and then the warm, welcome friendship of the Egyptian woman, the childhood of the boy, the conception of his purpose in life, the manhood of the Man, then long, happy years of sacrifice and self-devotion, the deeds of kindness prompted by love, and then—the cross! Again she stood in imagination in the throng on that darkest night the world has ever known and beheld the Christ die for his fellow-men, on the Cross at Calvary.

But she must hasten back to Nazareth. Soon the camel and its rider had traveled far over the desert. And in the Eastern sky wandering beams of golden light looked like angels of the morning—for the day was coming—and the woman saw them, but was not glad. How could she be? Her husband in a desert grave, Zerola in a living tomb. Her husband buried by her own hands, when on the way to Egypt; her daughter exiled by her own people when on the way to Nazareth.

"Had my husband lived," thought Mary, "and had we seen the Egyptian woman, life would not look so rayless, almost hopeless; for we thought her letter meant that she could aid us in our search. But she, too, has gone: exiled to Rome! This has been a cruel, unjust world. Four yearning years seeking our daughter—and she is not found! O Zerola, on earth I fear we shall meet—never—NEVER! O Father, teach me to live; teach me to say as Jesus did, 'Thy will be done.'"

Thus did the traveler on the desert pass the night.

HOMEWARD TO NAZARETH—CROSSING THE DESERT OF PARAN.

grave, reunion was sure. The prophets of their nation had seen this hope dimly, and their poet King had sung of it: but he, their kinsman after the flesh had brought life and immortality to light and proclaimed his victory over the grave. They had seen him after the Cross and the Sepulchre; they had heard his words of peace and benediction, and in the trials that were now come upon them, those words were their comfort and support.

Mary's way to Nazareth lay through the country which her forefathers trod under the guidance of Moses. The desert of Paran must be crossed, and then she would be on familiar ground, and Paran itself she had crossed more than once before, and it was hallowed to her by solemn associations, for there her husband died and was buried.

Here her forefathers had been laid to their last rest a thousand years. Beside the cool waters the palm-trees threw soft waving shadows on their graves. Beside the jagged rocks, safe from the noon-day sun, their last remains reposed, long covered by the sands. For here her ancestors, despising the oppression of Pharaoh and his princes, had ceased to be a race of slaves. Here was Sinai, destined to be forever sacred to all the nations of the world. And many a holy tale the prophets and the priests had written in the Temple scrolls, made this desert hallowed in her memory.

Far, farther than the eye can see, the dreary waste lifts its barren almost lifeless bosom to the unfeeling caresses of the desert winds as they grasping toss the sea-like sands and whistling, moan and howl through the wild caverns of the mountains. Far to the east, the cedars, tall and proud, poor millions, of bright happy homes of pleasure and of sweetest hope, of dark miserable hovels of pain and despair, of children's faces curved with virtue, of others seared with vice—and wonders if this be justice! Thoughts of love and thoughts of hate, thoughts of sorrow and of joy, thoughts of things and men, of being and of doing; thoughts worthy of the shadow, thoughts worthy of the sunlight.

But memory is not always queen nor thought at all times king: the mind knows that he who hears the raven's cry, hears also the carol of the nightingale, and so yielding to the charm of beauty, not less holy, perhaps, feels the thrill of an Eastern night.

Paran was now in darkness, yet not silence. Frequently the roar of a lion rang through the forest and echoed from the rocks of the desert, heard only by one, the woman traveling alone along the winding caravan road which at the foot of Mount Serbal, or among the shrivelled, struggling herbage that fringed the parched sands of the desert proper, could easily be distinguished, but farther on amidst the black-and-white drifts was entirely lost. Though a leopard or a hyena sometimes rose and straggled or galloped off to right or left, it was not because it had been awakened from its slumber by the tread of the camel, for on being reminded that it was not of the Bactrian but of the true Syrian breed, the reader will at once perceive that that would be as noiseless as stately, and further that in curvature of neck and color of body, the dromedary would not be without some of the grace and charin of a white swan. The furnishings of this ship of the desert were almost

Their Hearts in the Work!

Friends Everywhere Helping to Swell the Moody Gospel Fund—More Consecrated Gifts—A Letter from Mr. Moody on "Soul-Winning."

HERE is nothing that affords such sweet and enduring satisfaction to the human heart as that which we do for the love of others. And when such service is rendered from the highest of motives, and in the name of Him whose love for fallen man was beyond all other love, it is doubly consecrated and blessed. This is the service in which every one who is helping the Moody Bible Institute Gospel Fund is now engaged. To the multitude of our friends who have already aided so nobly and generously in this campaign for souls, Mr. Moody, through the medium of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, addresses a word of fraternal encouragement, recognizing in each coadjutor a brother or a sister who, like himself, is striving to carry out the expressed will of the Master in spreading His kingdom and knowledge of His truth throughout the land.

"I want to thank you again," he writes, "from the bottom of my heart for the generous support the Bible Institute is receiving from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Your check for another thousand dollars has just come to hand. I cannot tell you what a help it is to us just now. Surely God will bless the Institute when so many friends are giving us their prayers and their sympathy. Ask your readers to pray that God will follow their gifts with His blessing, so that every man and woman within our doors may do yeoman service in winning souls unto His kingdom."

What the Bible Institute has done in spiritual work among the unevangelized masses in the past, has already been explained in these columns; what it may accomplish in the future depends upon the generous support of the Christian men and women of America in the present emergency. With such an appeal from so consecrated a servant of God as Mr. Moody still ringing in their ears, we cannot believe that any one professing an interest in the Christian cause, will withhold the sympathy and assistance that are so much needed now.

It is proposed to so increase the working capacity of the Institute that a sufficiently large force of Christian workers of both sexes may be trained there to carry the Gospel into the homes of the vast mass of non-church-goers in our large cities, to tell the story of Jesus in the streets, in tents, in slums, and alleys, in the markets, workshops and factories, and among the idle and criminals. This is a duty, in the performance of which Mr. Moody desires and confidently relies upon the co-operation of God's people everywhere. Large sums will be needed for carrying out the project; but the same Divine power that placed the work in his hands will not permit it to suffer for lack of means.

We are privileged to publish extracts from some of the letters received from former students at the Bible Institute who are now actively engaged in the Gospel field. These are specially interesting, as showing how serviceable the training they received there has been, and how valuable such an experience will be to others, who feel called to devote their lives and energies to this important work:

J. B. C. "I came from the Institute into this work (S. S. Missionary and the Bible knowledge and training have enabled me, by the grace of God, and through the power of His Word, to lead many to accept Him as their personal Saviour."

L. E. B. "I regard the time spent in the Bible Institute as the most valuable of my life."

F. E. E. E. Colo. "My study at the Institute was of invaluable assistance to me. It better prepared me for my life-work and gave me a clearer insight into the Word, and the best foundation I ever had for the study of the Word."

J. H., Okla. "I praise God to-day for what Moody's Institute has done for me. While my voice was not heard much during my short stay there, yet I was absorbing all I could like a sponge, and now God is blessing the truth as I learned it from the lips of Mr. Torrey."

C. A. L., Kan. "I have been here almost two years. Am continually using the notes of lectures gotten at the Institute. The Lord has been using the exposition of the Scriptures (the only way I preach) to the building up of Christians and the saving of sinners."

A. S., Mich. "One great source of blessing to me is the daily remembrance of the Institute and the noble work it is doing. It is a delight to remember the blessings so freely received whilst engaged in study, and also the helpful intercourse with my fellows."

E. E. T. Minn. "The instruction and experience received while at the Bible Institute is a great help to me in my present work (minister), and my heart is filled with gratitude to God because he led me to go there."

G. F. A., Ill. "Last week I was ordained and was glad to learn from the council that they had never ordained anyone who gave them so much satisfaction. It was sad to record that my 'soundness of views' was rather a new experience to them. They told me that there is generally a good deal of hedging on matters of doctrine."

Wm. N., Ill. "I deem it right and proper to thank yourself (Mr. Torrey) and the Institute in behalf of our church for the blessing which we believe was derived from having one of your heralds preach Christ so faithfully to us. Surely from a heart of real Christian experience and thorough consecration."

B. A., Mich. "Am very thankful I was directed to the Bible Institute, for there I learned certain lines of truth which have opened up the whole Bible to me in a wonderful way."

Rev. R. D. B., Neb. "Mr. J. R. S. and his wife have been with us in the Gospel Union tent which was pitched in the court house square. The tent was filled every night for four weeks and many who never enter a church had the Gospel preached to them. . . . House to house visitation was made by ladies under the direction of Mrs. S. . . . We were all impressed with the thorough-going manner in which converts were instructed and started in the Christian life. . . . These workers are so efficient that I feel sure they will be a blessing to any people they may visit."

Among the many contributions to the Gospel Fund during the present week is one from a lady (M. B. P., Mount Washington, Md.), who sends us a set of doilies made by herself in her seventy-seventh year, to be sold for the benefit of the Fund. There are six in all, of the most beautiful designs, in drawn work of silk and linen of finest quality, all the patterns different, and every piece a gem of delicate, artistic workmanship. Each doily is about seven inches square, fringe included. These will be sold to the highest bidder and the proceeds applied to the Fund. We invite offers from our readers for this beautiful contribution.

In describing the bed-spread contributed to the Fund by Mrs. Evelyn M. Dick of South Boston, the dimensions of the spread were omitted. It measures seven feet by five feet ten inches. It is a splendid piece of artistic work, hand-knit, white-shell pattern; the pattern showing 447 pieces, and occupying many months of loving labor. The donor directs that it be sold for the benefit of the Fund and offers will now be received.

The subscriptions to the Moody Gospel Fund during the week are acknowledged below:

A LAND WITHOUT A RELIGION.*

CATAclysm which at once and completely overthrew an existing faith, did actually take place in Korea, and the land to this day has never recovered from its effects. As to the way in which it came about, the following is a Korean explanation: It was at the time of the great Japanese invasion of three hundred years ago. Up to that time, Korea was like its neighbors, who have ever been rather tolerant than otherwise of religious beliefs. They have usually harbored two or three at a time, which have managed to live at peace in the placid bosom of the race. The invasion took place just as the sixteenth century of our era was lapsing into the seventeenth. In 1598 Kato and Konichi set sail from Japan—much as William the Conqueror did from Normandy, with only the reciprocal change of continent for island in the two cases—to subjugate their neighbor kingdom across the sea; and after a passage of much the same length, they landed at Pusan, as he did at Pevensey. There is certainly something grander in a flotilla bound for conquest than in an army. We are moved by the daring that braves both Nature and man. So was nature touched herself, and she let them across in safety. Then began the march up from the sea; for, unlike England, there was no gallant Harold to oppose them—none who, after worsting one enemy, had marched (as is even to-day a marvel in tactics) from sea to sea to front the other foe. Korea was paralyzed by the boldness of the deed. She seems hardly to have realized the situation. Her seclusion has always colored to her mind the actions of the outside world with something of the impossibility of fulfillment of a dream. And the Japanese column moved on with the irresistible force of a natural catastrophe.

The invaders were plucky then, as they are plucky now. For all that, they did not despise strategem, so Korean tradition informs us; for the two rival generals were racing by different roads to the capital, and time, for once in the history of the East, became of account. Neither could afford to stop and lay siege, lest his rival should get ahead of him. To gain access, therefore, to those citadels which they could not take by assault, the Japanese adopted a disguise ready at hand. Some of them donned the broad-brimmed hats of the Buddhist priests, that sweep down on the sides so as to conceal completely the face of the wearer. They gave men the appearance of mush-rooms walking. Thus insured against detection, the invaders gained admittance to the outstanding castles and put the garrisons to the sword.

The inoffensive priests suffered for the depredations of the wolves in sheep's clothing. When the Japanese withdrew, which did not happen permanently till thirty years afterward, the Korean Government decreed that for future safety no priest should ever, on any pretense whatsoever, set foot within the gates of a walled city. The expulsion of the priests was naturally followed by the gradual disappearance of the buildings. The body of religion—its structures—crumbled again to dust, and the spirit winged its flight from persecuting man to rest among the mountains. So religion in Korea died.

Such is one explanation. But there is grave reason to doubt it. It savors far too much of a desire to father upon the hated victorious Japanese the destruction of everything that Korea has lost. The account given in the native histories is more prosaic, but more trustworthy. The other is interesting as showing up one side of the Korean character—an utter untrustworthiness in matters between themselves and others. It comes out even more markedly in their accounts of battles which they are forever winning, and yet somehow after which they invariably retreat.

According to the historical version, some centuries ago there were two parties in the State—one wedded to Confucianism, the other equally attached to Buddhism. The Buddhists had grown exceedingly corrupt. A struggle took place between the two parties; the Buddhist supporters were worsted, and their expulsion was decreed and carried out. Buddhism was banished; thenceforward it lived only in the depths of the country.

THE historian pauses to sum up and emphasize once more the main lesson of his narrative. It is that "righteousness exalteth a nation, and sin is the reproach of any people." God had called his son Israel out of Egypt, delivered his chosen from Pharaoh, given them a pleasant land; but "Israel had sinned against Jehovah their God, and had feared other gods, and walked in the statutes of the heathen." They had failed therefore in fulfilling the very purpose for which they had been set apart. They had been intended "to uplift among the nations the banner of righteousness" and the banner of the One True God. Instead of this, they were seduced by the heathen ritual of

"Gay religions full of pomp and gold."

They decked out alien institutions, and alike in frequented and populous places—"from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city"—set up "matstseboth" (A.V., "pillars") and "Asherim" on every high hill. The green trees became "obumbratices scelerum," the secret bowers of their iniquities. They burnt incense on the "bamoth," and served idols, and wrought wickedness. Useless had been the voices of all the prophets and the seers. They went after vain things, and became vain. Beginning with the two "calves," they proceeded to lewd and orgiastic idolatries. Ahab and Jezebel seduced them into Tyrian Baal-worship. From the Assyrians they learnt and practised the adoration of the host of heaven. From Moab and Ammon they borrowed the abominable rites of Moloch, and used divination and enchantments by means of belomancy (Ezek. 21: 21, 22) and necromancy, and sold themselves to do wickedness.

Nor was this all. These idolatries, with their guilty ritualism, were not confined to Israel, but also

Infected Zion's daughters with like heat,
Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
Ezekiel saw, when, by the vision led,
His eyes surveyed the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah.

And thus, when Jehovah afflicted the seed of Israel and cast them out of his sight, Judah also had to feel the stroke of retribution. And it is idle to object that even if Israel had been faithful she must have inevitably perished before the superior might of Damascus, or Nineveh, or Babylon. How can we tell? It is not possible for us thus to write unwritten history, and there is absolutely nothing to show that the surmise is correct. In the days of David, of Uzziah, of Jeroboam II., Judah and Israel had shown what they could achieve. Had they been strong in faithfulness to Jehovah, and in the righteousness which that faith required, they would have shown an invincible strength amid the moral involution of the surrounding people. They might have held their own by welding into one strong kingdom the whole of Palestine, including Philistia, Phœnicia, the Negeb, and the Trans-Jordanic region. They might have consolidated the sway which they at various times attained southward, as far as the Red Sea port of Elath; northward over Aram and Damascus, as far as the Hamath on the Orontes; eastward to Thapsacus on the Euphrates; westward to the Isles of the Gentiles.

There is nothing improbable, still less impossible, in the view that, if the Israelites had truly served Jehovah and obeyed his laws, they might then have permanently established the monarchy which was ideally regarded as their inheritance, and which for brief and fitful periods they partially maintained. And such a monarchy, held together by warrior statesmen, strong and righteous, and above all, secure in the blessing of God, would have been a thoroughly adequate counterpoise, not only to dilatory and distracted Egypt, which had long ceased to be aggressive, but even to brutal Assyria, which prevailed in no small measure because of the isolation and mutual dissension of these southern principalities.

But, as it was, "Assyria and Egypt"—the two world powers in the dawn of history, the two chief sources of ancient civilization, the twin giant-empires which bounded the Israelite people on the right hand and on the left—were cruel neighbors, between whom the ill-fated nation was tossed to and fro in wanton sport like a shuttlecock. They were cruel friends before whom it must cringe in turn, praying sometimes for help, suing sometimes for very life—alternate scourges in the hand of the Divine wrath. Now it is the fly of Egypt, and now it is the bee of Assyria, whose ruthless swarms issue at the word of Jehovah, settling in the holes of the rocks, and upon all thorns, and upon all bushes, with deadly sting, fatal to man and beast, devastating the land far and wide. Holding the poor Israelite in their relentless embrace, they threatened ever and again to crush him by their grip. Like the fabled rock which frowned over the narrow straits of the Bosphorus, they would crash together and annihilate the helpless craft which the storms of destiny had placed at their mercy. Israel reeled under their successive blows. As was the beginning, so was the end. As the captivity of Egypt had been the cradle of the nation, so was the captivity of Assyria to be its tomb.

In any case the principle of the historian remains unshaken. Sin is weakness, idolatry is folly and rebellion; uncleanness is decrepitude.

"LOVING THE WORLD."*

Katie looked doubtful. Harold glanced from her to his mother, and back again.

"One command is clear, at all events," he said. "'Love not the world.' The gist of the whole matter lies there—in the heart's affections; in the loving or the non-loving." "But what is really and truly meant by 'the world?'" asked Katie.

*From Life in a Nutshell, by Agnes Gilberne; a delightful story for the young. Pp. 222; cloth covers. A. J. Bradley & Co., Boston, publishers.

"You might get various answers to that question," Harold said, smiling. "In an ordinary way, people count 'the world' to mean all those who are a little more gay than themselves—all those who allow what they themselves do not allow."

"Yes, I know. It is most dreadfully puzzling. If one could only be quite sure what the Bible exactly means by 'the world!'" "I should say that first there is the simple and every-day meaning of this actual world in which we live—the earth and the things contained in it. We are not to love this world as our home. It is not to be first in our hearts. As citizens of heaven, we are 'strangers and pilgrims' on earth, and the things of earth are to be secondary—used and enjoyed, but not loved with any absorbing affection, and held at all times loosely."

"Yes, and—"

"There is also the meaning of 'the world' in the sense of all that is in opposition to God. 'Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world . . . is not the Father, but is of the world.' You see the true dividing-line. Whatever a man thinks, says, does, allows, is either 'of the Father' or 'of the world.'"

Katie said "Yes," slowly.

"In the days when St. John wrote, the matter was comparatively an easy one. A sharp dividing-line then existed between the persecuted Church and the fashionable heathen world. But things now are much more complicating and puzzling, for the Church glides into the world by gradual stages. So far as we have power to see, there is no sharp visible line of demarcation."

"It is just all that which makes everything so dreadfully difficult," said Katie. "How is one ever to know what is really right?"

"First of all, make up your mind distinctly, that your decision is to be, not merely your own, but under the leading of the Holy Spirit. You must ask Divine guidance, and wait for it. Secondly, make up your mind no less distinctly that your decision is to be for yourself individually, not for your friends and acquaintances. For yourself you must decide—for others you need not."

Does economy bore you?

It ought not to, always. Take the matter of washing with Pearlina, for instance. That is a pleasant economy. There's your work made light and short for you; and while your doing it, in this easy, pleasant way, you can be thinking of the actual money that you're saving by not rubbing things to ruin, as in the old way.

That ought to be pleasant to think of, whether you're doing the work yourself, or having it done.

Millions use Pearlina.

Send it Back

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled. and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearlina, be honest—send it back.

The Island of Lepers.

Dr. Talmage tells of the Sadness and the Cheerfulness of Molokai—Unrecognized Heroes who Supplement Damien's Work—The Story of William Ragsdale.

MID-OCEAN, NEAR TASMANIA, JUNE 23, '94.

THE most of the world's heroes and heroines die unrecognized. They will have to wait until the roll is called on the other side of the Dead Sea. I have seen no celebration of the courage and fidelity of Rev. S. Waiwaiolo, who died two years ago in the leper settlement of the Sandwich Islands, nor of the Rev. M. Pahio, who himself struck with leprosy, goes right on with his evangelic labors except when especial ever of his disease prostrates him, and will continue his work of love until he has neither foot to walk nor tongue to speak, because of the dreadful disintegration. But once in awhile there are circumstances which thrill the world with the same story like that of the brilliant Belgian Catholic priest, Joseph Damien, who, after a week's consideration of whether he had better do so, accepted the appointment as missionary to Molokai, the Isle of Lepers, for sixteen years administering to the leprosy and then dying of the leprosy. When told by his physician that he had the fell taint upon him he showed no alarm nor even agitation, but said, "As I expected. I am willing to die for those I came to save." The king knighted him and a memorial slab designates his resting-place, but Protestantism has joined Catholicism in the beatification of this self-sacrificing ecclesiastic.

A Tribute to Damien.

That moral hero completely transformed the Isle of Lepers. It was before his work began a pen of abominations. No law, no decency. All the tigers of passion were let loose. Drunkenness and blasphemy and libertinism and cruelty dominated. The moral disease eclipsed the physical. But Damien dawned upon the darkness. He helped them build cottages. He medicated their physical distresses. The plague which he could not arrest he alleviated. He settled the controversies of the people. He prepared the dead for burial, and digged for them Christian graves, and pronounced upon them a benediction. He launched a Christian civilization upon the wretchedness. He gave them the gospel of good cheer. He told the poor victims concerning the land of eternal health, where the inhabitant never says, "I am sick," and the swollen faces took on the look of hope and the glassy eyes saw coming relief, and the footless and the limbless and the fingerless looked forward to a place where they might walk with the King robed in white, and "everlasting songs upon their heads."

Good and Christlike Joseph Damien! Let all religions honor his memory. Let poetry and canvas and sculpture tell the story of this man who lived and died for others, and from century to century keep him in bright remembrance long after the last leper of all the earth shall have felt through all his recovering and revitalized nature the voice of the Son of God saying, "I will! Be thou clean."

The blood is the life. It is the source of nerve strength and is that upon which good health depends. Hood's Sarsaparilla makes good blood and cures all blood diseases. Get only Hood's.

The Regime of Molokai.

The eternal pathos of Molokai has attracted the attention of all nations, because it is a leper colony. It is a small island, but it contains a continent of woe. It was established in mercy. Leprosy was so rapidly advancing in the Sandwich Islands that the entire population was imperiled. To control and extirpate the ghastly evil, it was necessary to put it by itself on an island not easily accessible. But those banished there are made as comfortable as possible. In one year this leper settlement cost the Hawaiian Government $55,000. Every week each patient is allowed four pounds of salmon; nine pounds of rice; one pound of sugar, or, if preferred, from five to six pounds of beef, and twenty-one pounds of "paiai," which is a near approach to bread. Leprosy reigns there. The victims have bands of music, all the players lepers; they have churches, all the worshippers lepers; they have carriages, all the drivers and occupants lepers; they have hospitals, all the nurses and patients lepers; they have drama, and all the actors lepers; they have schools, all the teachers and scholars lepers; marriages are performed, and the contracting parties are lepers; children are born there, and they are mostly lepers. Everything that pustule and scarification and inflammation and gangrene and disfigurement can do, is done here. Science, which has successfully fought back most of the world's disorders, has here closed its pharmacy, put back into the case its surgical instruments, and come down to the government boat and retreated from this island of death. Thank God this dominion of death is being broken, and he will have to dismount this sepulchral throne. Segregation of the victims will complete the overthrow of the foul plague, and in these islands a leper will be as rare as in America, where most of the people never saw a leper.

Cheerful, Though Doomed.

What most strikes a visitor at Molokai is the placidity and cheerfulness of the victimized. One would think they could never smile, never sing, never get out from under a sense of despair. But whatsoever agonies may fill the hearts of these lepers, they appear to the beholder as in a resignation that amounts to good cheer. They seem among the happiest people on earth. Many of them on horseback come galloping down the road. Songs roll over the fated village by day and night. Hawaiian nature adjusts itself to circumstances. We have often seen people who through pulmonary or Bright's disease, were certain of early demise, and yet a mirth bubbling and resonant. The fact is we must all die, and yet we manage to keep cheerful, and why should not those struck by leprosy fatality have sunshine in their countenance and talk?

The mercy of the Hawaiians has made this colony of doomed inhabitants more tolerable than in most lands. I have seen in the suburbs of Jerusalem and Damascus scores of those cast out for this disease and inhabiting caverns and tombs. Beaten of the elements, living on the coin which passers-by may fling to them, while day by day they are rotting alive. Let us thank God that those smitten with incurable sores, in the Sandwich Islands, have homes, and schools, and churches, and food, and nurses, and alleviations, and parterres of sweetest flowers under arches of bluest skies.

The Story of William Ragsdale, Leper.

No respecter of persons is this physical calamity. William Ragsdale, a popular lawyer was sent there. He was eloquent both in Hawaiian and English, and could make his audiences weep, and laugh, and shiver, and resolve. He had the satire of a Junius, and the impassioned abandon of an O'Connell. No one suspected he was a leper before the day when he sent a letter to the authorities, surrendering himself, and saying that on the morrow he would go aboard the steamer for Molokai. He spent the morning of the day of his departure in riding around to say good-by to his friends and just before the hour of sailing, came down to the boat, his neck adorned with gardenia, and turned around and made a fare-well address, closing with the words: "Aloha! May God bless you, my brothers!" Hundreds of the people and a glee club accompanied him to the boat, and they rent the air with lamentations as the boat swung off from its moorings. He took a Bible and some law books with him into his dreadful exile, and the prayers of churches were offered that he might have courage and peace in the remaining days of his earthly tarrying. Queen Emma's cousin, Hon. Mr. Kaco, was also sent to Molokai, and there was no power in his royal connection to keep him outside of that island.

Mrs. Napela, of high social circle, had her cottage of enforced exile on that island of sepulchres. A legislator of the Hawaiian Islands is there closing his life. He was probably a good legislator in the days of his health, but I cannot help thinking what a good thing it would be if all the leprosy legislators of the earth could be put in some island by themselves. Such a banishment would be a mighty thinning out at Albany, Harrisburg, and Washington legislatures, State and National.

The United States Government could afford to provide such a Molokai, and the moral lepers sent there could have their legislature and Congress and board of aldermen and army and navy all of the same blotch. But while the Hawaiian legislator could be found out and sent to the so-called "Isle of precipices," the moral leper is not so easily designated, because he has the blotch not so much on his forehead as on his heart. What every State and Nation now needs is a Molokai or Isle of lepers.

Conversation about leprosy with a former member of the Board of Health for the Hawaiian Islands revealed to me the following facts.

Q. "In what part of the system does leprosy begin its work?"

A. "It attacks the nerve-centres."

Q. "No Cure Now Known for the Plague."

Q. "Are there any cases of cure?"

A. "The only cases I recall are those mentioned in the Bible: Naaman the Syrian hero, and the ten cases that Christ cured, nine of them too mean to acknowledge the divine medicament."

Q. "What in ordinary cases is the velocity of the disease, and how long before it completes its work?"

A. "Well I have known one case last sixteen years. I think the usual duration is five or six years."

Q. "Is it contagious?"

A. "There are different opinions about that. I have seen in married life the husband or wife a leper for years, and the partner in life always in good health. I have known a leprosy parent to have a healthy child. I was talking on this subject with an eminent physician who said to me, 'Do you see those two children playing together? The one is a leper, and the other my own child, and I have no fear about contamination.'"

Q. "How many patients are there in Molokai at the present time?"

A. "About one thousand."

Only two weeks ago, a ship took twenty-five more lepers to Molokai. The scene of parting is said to be so heart-rending that but few people go to the wharf to witness it. The wailing and howling at the parting of families, as the filial, and fraternal, and paternal, and maternal bonds are broken, is something that haunts the memory. Not long ago a young man, sentenced to the leper island, declared he would not be taken alive. He shot three of those who were attempting to segregate him, and then hid in a hut until a cannon on a neighboring hill bombarded the hut into a wreck. Then a relative went to the hut and found the young man dead.

The Doctor of the Future.

But do not let us give up discouraged. Leprosy as well as cancer and all the other unconquered ailments will yet be cured. I do not know where the cradle now holding the coming doctor is being rocked, whether at Molokai, or in Honolulu, or on the banks of the Thames, or the Rhine, or the Tiber, or the Ural, or the Hudson, or the Savannah. Nor do I know from what college he will unroll his diploma, nor in what laboratory he will make his experiments, nor in what decade he will give proclamation of the world's emancipation from diseases as yet incurable, but he will go through the same persecutions that Dr. Jenner did because of his discovery of a way to halt small-pox, and as Dr. Keeley has endured because of his almost supernatural cure of alcoholism, and the new discoverer will run the gauntlet of caricature, and expulsion from medical societies, and will, like the most illustrious Being of all ages, become the target for expectation, but the discoverer will give leprosy the command, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther," and that disease will wriggle and crawl and shrink out of the world, and after the medical emancipator is dead, the nations will build a monument so high to his memory that the granite shaft will dispute with the skies the right of possession, and in the epitaph thereon the clicking chisel will try to atone for the slanderous tongue, and the world that held back from the discoverer the bread or honest praise, will give him a storm of post-mortem commemoration. Forward the whole column of surgeons and physicians for the conquest of leprosy and cancer.

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment. EDWIN COLEMAN, MAIZE, KAS.

OCEAN GROVE'S SILVER WEDDING.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF OUR GREATEST CHRISTIAN SUMMER CAMPING-GROUND.

A Magnificent Outcome to Twenty-five Years' Unremitting, Divinely-blessed, Gospel Endeavor—How the New Mammoth Auditorium Looks—Largest Hall of Religious Assembly in the World—A Spiritual Experiment that Influences a Continent.

TWENTY-FIVE years have now sped with attractions toward which the heart of Christian America seems to gravitate, Ocean Grove enters upon a new era of increased spiritual possibilities and responsibilities. There, for a quarter of a century, thousands upon thousands of Christian men and women have assembled every summer, drawn thither by common spiritual impulse, for the purpose of mingling praise and worship with the advantages of an outing by the sea. All these years, since it was first established as a midsummer Mecca for the spiritually-minded, its influ-a State, but a whole nation. Methodists, and indeed Christian people of many other denominations, look forward every summer to spending a portion of the season there, and many come very long distances to do so. Many a soul awakened to the new life in Ocean Grove, has been fruitful in bringing other souls afar off to the same happy condition.

To present a complete history of Ocean Grove would almost fill an entire issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; therefore we will attempt only a sketch in outline of the leading events connected with this grand old Methodist camping-ground—probably the greatest in the world of its kind. In 1869 there were only a few cottages on a strip of sandy coast to mark the site upon which now stands a populous little city. Here, in summer, a few families had come for several seasons, finding rest and recreation with all the advantages of beautiful surroundings and cool ocean breezes, and that a religious service should be held in their tent. He agreed, and a few friends were invited. Rev. E. H. Stokes, D.D., the presiding elder of the district, was asked to deliver an address. Dr. Stokes complied, and chose for his text the first words of the Bible, "In the beginning, God." The choice was significant, for that text became since the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association was organized, and in the celebration, this year, of its "Silver Anniversary," the grand old pioneer organization, together with the beautiful city it has founded by the sea, and all the dwellers therein, is entitled to the felicitations of every Christian community in the land. It is an event that marks an important stage in the history of modern religious progress in America; for the whole record of Ocean Grove, from first to last, is a demonstration of the most successful experiment in practical godliness that has ever been placed on authentic record. This year, with a growth in numbers that is phenomenal, with multiplied resources such as its originators could not have even dreamed of, with a new Auditorium vaster than any building ever before erected for religious purposes and ence has been growing and expanding to such an extent that it has now become national. The pure, elevated, wholesome life that is to be found in this city by the sea, permeates not a township, a county or without the annoyance and frivolities of a fashionable watering-place. To these tent-dwellers it was an ideal spot, so quiet and reposeful, that a lady who was passing her vacation there suggested to her husband the appropriate motto of the little community, and suggested the spiritual and material life, energy, and wondrous growth that were to follow. The services were continued, and the attendance increased. Started as an experiment, they began to assume a permanent shape, and soon thirteen clergymen and thirteen laymen obtained a charter from the New Jersey Legislature, under the title of "The Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association," in which they covenanted to devote the land to religious uses forever. The promoters, were men of strong faith and indomitable energy, and went forward in their work with a will. With keen business sagacity, they planned the little town, and every year saw its borders widening. Beauty, sanitation and comfort were kept steadily in view. An army of

AN ONLY SON.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Luke 7: 12-15. "Now when he came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow; and much people of the city was with her. And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And he came and touched the bier: and they that bare him stood still. And he said, Young man, I say unto thee, arise. And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother."

THE text calls us to stand at the gate of the city of Nain. The streets are a-rush with business and gayety, and the ear is deafened with the hammers of mechanism and the wheels of traffic. Work, with its thousand arms and thousand eyes and thousand feet, fills all the street, when suddenly the crowd parts, and a funeral passes. Between the wheels of work and pleasure there comes a long procession of mourning people. Who is it? A trifler says, "Oh, it's nothing but a funeral. It may have come up from the hospital of the city, or the almshouse, or some low place of the town;" but not so says the serious observer. There are so many evidences of dire bereavement that we know at the first glance some one has been taken away greatly beloved; and to our inquiry, "Who is this that is carried out with so many offices of kindness and affection?" the reply comes, "The only son of his mother, and she a widow." Stand back and let the procession pass out! Hush all the voices of mirth and pleasure! Let every head be uncovered! Weep with this passing procession; and let it be told through all the market-places and bazaars of Nain, that in Galilee to-day the sepulchre hath gathered to itself "the only son of his mother, and she a widow."

There are two or three things that, in my mind, give especial pathos to this scene. The first is, he was a young man that was being carried out. To the aged, death becomes beautiful. The old man halts and pants along the road, where once he bounded like the roe. From the midst of immediate ailments and sorrows, he cries out, "How long, O Lord, how long?" Footsore and hardly bested on the hot journey, he wants to get home. He sits in the church, and sings, with a tremulous voice, some tune he sang forty years ago, and longs to join the better assemblage of the one hundred and forty and four thousand, and the thousands of thousands who have passed the flood. How sweetly he sleeps the last sleep! Push back the white locks from the wrinkled temples; they will never ache again. Fold the hands over the still heart; they will never toil again. Close gently the eyes; they will never weep again.

But this man that I am speaking of was a young man. He was just putting on the armor of life, and he was exulting to think how his sturdy blows would ring out above the clangor of the battle. I suppose he had a young man's hopes, a young man's ambitions, and a young man's courage. He said, "If I live many years, I will feed the hungry and clothe the naked. In this city of Nain, where there are so many bad young men, I will be sober, and honest, and pure, and magnanimous, and my mother shall never be ashamed of me." But all these prospects are blasted in one hour. There he passes lifeless in the procession. Behold all that is left on earth of the high-hearted young man of the city of Nain.

There is another thing that adds very much to this scene, and that is, he was an only son. However large the family flock may be, we never could think of sparing one of the lambs. Though they may all have their faults, they all have their excellences that commend them to the parental heart; and if it were peremptorily demanded of you to-day that you should yield up one of your children out of a very large family, you would be confounded, and you could not make a selection. But this was an only son, around whom gathered all the parental expectations. How much care in his education! How much caution in watching his habits! He would carry down the name to other times. He would have entire control of the family property long after the parents had gone to their last reward. He would stand in society a thinker, a worker, a philanthropist, a Christian. No, no. It is all ended. Behold him there. Breath is gone. Life is extinct. The only son of his mother.

There was one other thing that added to the pathos of this scene, and that was, his mother was a widow. The main hope of that home had been broken, and now he was come up to be the staff. The chief light of the household had been extinguished, and this was the only light left. I suppose she often said, looking at him, "There are only two of us." Oh, it is a grand thing to see a young man step out in life, and say to his mother, "Don't be down-hearted. I will, as far as possible, take father's place, and as long as I live you shall never want anything." It is not always that way. Sometimes the young people get tired of the old people. They say they are queer; that they have so many ailments; and they sometimes wish them out of the way. A young man and his wife sat at the table, their little son on the floor playing beneath the table. The old father was very old, and his hand shook so, they said, "You shall no more sit with us at the table." And so they gave him a place in the corner, where day by day he ate out of an earthen bowl—everything put into that bowl. One day his hand trembled so much he dropped it and it broke; and the son, seated at the elegant table in mid-floor, said to his wife, "Now, we'll get tather a wooden bowl, and that he can't break." So a wooden bowl was obtained, and every day old grandfather ate out of that, sitting in the corner. One day, while the elegant young man and his wife were seated at their table, with chased silver and all the luxuries, and their little son sat upon the floor, they saw the lad whittling, and they said, "My son, what are you doing there with that knife?" "Oh," said he, "I—I'm making a trough for my father and mother to eat out of when they get old!"

But this young man of the text was not of that character. He did not belong to that school. I can tell it from the way they mourned over him. He was to be the companion of his mother. He was to be his mother's protector. He would return now some of the kindnesses he had received in the days of childhood and boyhood. Ah, he would with his strong hand uphold that form already enfeebled with age. Will he do it? No. In one hour all that promise of help and companionship is gone. There is a world of anguish in that one short phrase, "The only son of his mother, and she a widow."

Now, my friends, it was upon this scene that Christ broke. He came in without any introduction. He stopped the procession. He had only two utterances to make; the one to the mourning mother, the other to the dead. He cried out to the mourning one, "Weep not;" and then, touching the bier on which the son lay, he cried out, "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise! And he that was dead sat up."

I learn two or three things from this subject, and, first, that Christ was a man. You see how that sorrow played upon all the chords of his heart. I think we forget this too often. Christ was a man more certainly than you are, for he was a perfect man. No sailor ever slept in ship's hammock more soundly than Christ slept in that boat on Gennesaret. In every nerve, and muscle, and bone, and fibre of his body; in every emotion and affection of his heart; in every action and decision of his mind, he was a man. He looked off upon the sea just as you look off upon the waters. He went into Martha's house just as you go into a cottage. He breathed hard when he was tired, just as you do when you are exhausted. He felt after sleeping out a night in the storm just like you do when you have been exposed to a tempest. It was just as humiliating for him to beg bread as it would be for you to become a pauper. He felt just as much insulted by being sold for thirty pieces of silver as you would if you were sold for the price of a dog. From the crown of the head to the sole of the foot he was a man. When the thorns were twisted for his brow, they hurt him just as much as they hurt your brow, if they were twisted for it. He took not on him the nature of angels; he took on him the seed of Abraham. "Ecce homo!"—Behold the man!

But I must also draw from this subject that he was a God. Suppose that a man should attempt to break up a funeral obsequy: he would be seized by the law, he would be imprisoned, if he were not actually slain by the mob before the officers could secure him. If Christ had been a mere mortal, would he have a right to come in upon such a procession? Would he have succeeded in his interruption? He was more than a man, for when he cried out, "I say unto thee, Arise!" he that was dead sat up." What excitement there must have been thereabouts! The body had lain prostrate. It had been mourned over with agonizing tears, and yet now it begins to move in the shroud, and to be flushed with life; and, at the command of Christ, he rises up and looks into the faces of the astonished spectators. Oh, this was the work of a God! I hear it in his voice; I see it in the flash of his eye; I behold it in the snapping of death's shackles; I see it in the face of the rising slumberer; I hear it in the outcry of all those who were spectators of the scene. If, when I see my Lord Jesus Christ mourning with the bereaved, I put my hands on his shoulders, and say, "My brother," now that I hear him proclaim supernatural deliverances, I look up into his face and say with Thomas, "My Lord and my God." Do you not think he was a God? A great many people do not believe that, and they compromise the matter, or they think they compromise it. They say he was a very good man, but he was not a God. That is impossible. He was either a God or a wretch, and I will prove it. If a man professes to be that which he is not, what is he? He is a liar, an impostor, a hypocrite. That is your unanimous verdict. Now, Christ professed to be a God. He said over and over again he was a God, took the attributes of a God, and assumed the works and offices of a God. Dare you now say he was not? He was a God, or he was a wretch. Choose ye.

Do you think I cannot prove by this Bible that he was a God? If you do not believe this Bible, of course there is no need of my talking to you. There is no common data from which to start. Suppose you do believe it? Then I can demonstrate that he was divine. I can prove he was Creator, John 1: 3, "All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made." He was eternal, Rev. 22: 13, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." I can prove that he was omnipotent, Heb. 1: 10, "The heavens are the work of thine hands." I can prove he was omniscient, John 2: 25, "He knew what was in man." Oh yes, he is a God. He cleft the sea. He upheaved the crystalline walls along which the Israelites marched. He planted the mountains. He raises up governments and casts down thrones, and marches across nations and across worlds and across the universe, eternal, omnipotent, unhindered and unabashed. That hand that was nailed to the Cross holds the stars in a leash of love. That head that dropped on the bosom in fainting and death shall make the world quake at its nod. That voice that groaned in the last pang shall swear before the trembling world that time shall be no longer. Oh, do not insult the common sense of the race by telling us that this person was only a man, in whose presence the paralytic arm was thrust out well, and the devils crouched, and the lepers dropped their scales, and the tempests folded their wings, and the boy's satchel of a few loaves made a banquet for five thousand, and the sad procession of my text broke up in congratulation and hosanna!

Again, I learn from this subject that Christ was a sympathizer. Mark you, this was a city funeral. In the country, when the bell tolls, they know all about it for five miles around, and they know what was the matter with the man, how old he was, and what were his last experiences. They know with what temporal prospects he has left his family. There is no haste, there is no indecency in the obsequies. There is nothing done as a mere matter of business. Even the children come out as the procession passes, and look sympathetic, and the tree-shadows seem to deepen, and the brooks weep in sympathy as the procession goes by. But, mark you, this that I am speaking of was a city funeral. In great cities the cart jostles the hearse, and there is mirth, and gladness, and indifference as the weeping procession goes by. In this city of Nain, it was a common thing to have trouble and bereavement and death. Christ saw it every day there. Perhaps that very hour there were others being carried out: but this frequency of trouble did not harden Christ's heart at all. He stepped right out, and he saw this mourner, and he had compassion on her, and he said, "Weep not."

Now, I have to tell you, O bruised souls, and there are many everywhere (have you ever looked over any great audience and noticed how many shadows of sorrow there are?) I come to all such and say, "Christ meets you, and he has compassion on you, and he says, 'Weep not.'" Perhaps with some it is financial trouble. "Oh," you say, "it is such a silly thing for a man to cry over lost money." Is it? Suppose you had a large fortune, and all luxuries brought to your table, and your wardrobe was full, and your home was beautified by music and sculpture and painting, and thronged by the elegant and educated, and then some rough misfortune should strike you in the face, and trample your treasures, and taunt your children for their tattered dress, and send you into commercial circles an underling where once you waved a sceptre of gold, do you think you would cry then? I think you would. But Christ comes and meets all such to-day. He sees all the straits in which you have been thrust. He observes the sneer of that man who once was proud to walk in your shadow, and glad to get your help. He sees the protested note, the uncanceled judgment, the foreclosed mortgage, the heart-breaking exasperation, and he says, "Weep not. I own the cattle on a thousand hills. I will never let you starve. From my hand the fowls of heaven peck all their food. And will I let you starve? Never—no, my child, never."

Or perhaps this tramp at the gate of Nain has an echo in your own bereft spirit. You went out to the grave, and you felt you never could come back again. You left your heart there. God has dashed out the light of your eyes, and the heavy spirit that that woman carried out of the gate of Nain is no heavier than yours. Do we not all know? There is an uplifted woe on your heart. You have been out carrying your loved one beyond the gate of the city of Nain. But look yonder. Someone stands watching. He seems waiting for you. As you come up he stretches out his hand of help. His voice is full of tenderness, yet thrills with eternal strength. Who is it? The very one who accosted the mourner at the gate of Nain, and he says, "Weep not."

Perhaps it is a worse grief than that. It may be a living home trouble that you cannot speak about to your best friend. It may be some domestic unhappiness. It may be an evil suspicion. It may be the disgrace following in the footsteps of a son that is wayward, or a companion who is cruel, or a father that will not do right; and for years there may have been a vulture striking its beak into the vitals of your soul, and you sit there to-day feeling it is worse than death. It is. It is worse than death. And yet there is relief. Though the night may be the blackest, though the voices of hell may tell you to curse God and die, look up and hear the voice that accosted the woman as it says, "Weep not."

Earth hath no sorrow
That heaven
cannot cure.

I learn, again, from all this that Christ is the master of the grave. Just outside the gate of the city, Death

measured lances; and when the young man rose, Death dropped. Now we are sure of our resurrection. Oh, what a scene it was when that young man came back! The mother never expected to hear him speak again. She never thought that he would kiss her again. How the tears started, and how her heart throbbed, as she said, "Oh, my son, my son, my son!" And that scene is going to be repeated. Did you notice that passage in the text as I read it? "He delivered him to his mother." O ye troubled souls! O ye who have lived to see every prospect blasted, peeled, scattered, consumed! wait a little. The seed-time of tears will become the wheat harvest. In a clime cut of no wintry blast, under a sky palled by no hurtling tempest, and amidst redeemed ones that weep not, that part not, that die not, friend will come to friend, and kindred will join kindred, and the long procession that marches the avenues of gold will lift up their palms as again and again it is announced that the same one who came to the relief of this woman of the text came to the relief of many a maternal heart, and repeated the wonders of resurrection, and "delivered him to his mother." Oh, that will be the harvest of the world.

godly consecrated men and women—some of whom have long since passed to their reward, there spent their lives for Christ.

Here oft they sat, and with their friends conversed,
And prayed, and sung of Jesus' precious blood—
Here many a time the story they rehearsed:
Then sweetly passed in triumph up to God.

Among those who were identified with its early Christian triumphs we recall the names of Rev. John S. Inskip and Mrs. Martha J. Inskip. Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, Rev. Alfred Cookman, Mrs. Phoebe Palmer, George W. Cheesman, and others. Among others who have striven for souls there and whose voices have moved the mighty multitudes are Bishops Spencer, Vincent and Newman, Bowman, Walden and Fowler, Thomas Harrison the well known evangelist, C. H. Yatman with a special mission to the young people, Chaplain C. C. McCabe, Rev. Geo. W. Evans with a genius for Sunday School organization, were presented by Mr. George Potts of Ocean Grove from his own quarries in Pennsylvania. Mr. and Mrs. John A. Osborn, also of Ocean Grove, contributed the corner-stone. There are seven main trusses twenty-one feet apart and each with 161 feet span. Besides these there are eighteen angle trusses, the whole weight of iron and steel used in the building being 550,000 lbs. The building is lighted with 800 incandescent electric lamps, so wired that the number can be doubled if needed, six miles of regulation wire being used. The area of the ground floor is 225 feet by 161 feet, or nearly six-sevenths of an acre. The lower floor contains 5315 folding chairs, the platform 384, and the galleries about 4,000, making a total of about 9,700 seats from each of which the speaker can be seen. Even in the hottest weather, the great building is remarkably cool and always pleasant. The altar rail is 98 feet in length. Trusses, galleries and everything connected with the Auditorium have been tested for strength and with entirely satisfactory results. The first estimate of the cost of this

The Summer Services this year were arranged specially with a view to the anniversary. Sabbath, July 1, was Auditorium Opening Day, when Rev. Dr. Stokes, Rev. T. Hanlon, Rev. C. H. Yatman and others conducted the morning and evening services, the President of the Association preaching the opening sermon. On July 12th, the 25th Anniversary was appropriately celebrated, Rev. Dr. J. R. Day, Chancellor of Syracuse University, preaching the sermon in the forenoon, and Dr. Joseph Cook, the famous Boston divine, in the evening. Chancellor Day delivered the anniversary address to a great audience at eight P. M. August 9th to 12th inclusive were devoted to Dedication services. All the bishops of the Methodist Church were invited, but many could not attend, being absent in foreign lands. Bishops Bowman, Walden and Fowler attended together with Chaplain McCabe, Dr. A. J. Palmer, Dr. C. E. Mandeville and the resident leaders, and the audiences were large and appreciative. A considerable sum was raised, completely wiping out the debt on the new Auditorium.

The religious activities of Ocean Grove during the present season are numerous and varied. Almost every day of the week is fairly occupied, and the vast attendance at the different gatherings shows that the interest never flags.

Temperance, Home and Foreign Missions, lectures illustrated by stereopticon and otherwise, concerts, King's Daughters, Epworth League, and a great variety of other work closely related to church matters take the place of the trivialities that usually occupy the attention of the worldly-minded at the average seaside resort.

This week ushered in the great event of the year at Ocean Grove—the Annual Camp meeting, which continues from August 26th to 30th, inclusive. Many dignitaries of the Methodist Church are participating, and the Grove was never so crowded as now. A large number of speakers, many of them of national reputation, have been invited to deliver addresses, the opening sermon being preached by Bishop E. G. Andrews of New York, on August 21. Not only is the great Auditorium itself crowded to overflowing daily during the Camp Meeting, but there are largely attended gatherings in the Temple every morning under the leadership of Rev. C. H. Yatman. Holiness meetings in the Tabernacle daily, with Rev. Geo. Hughes in charge, and Twilight meetings also in the temple. Every Sabbath evening, while Camp Meeting lasts, there are surf meetings, at which thousands sit down on the beach and listen to the living words of truth from the lips of eloquent speakers, as the multitudes of old were wont to assemble on the shores of Galilee's sea to hear the words of life as the Master himself uttered them while he sojournd here on earth.

INTERIOR VIEW OF THE NEW AUDITORIUM AT OCEAN GROVE, N. J.

Rev. Thos. Hanlon whose unique and interesting Bible Class of nearly 3,000—the largest in the world—is a leading religious feature of the Grove, and last and most indefatigable and devoted of all, Rev. E. H. Stokes, whose entire energies have been consecrated to the work.

When it was decided to erect a new Auditorium for Ocean Grove on a grander scale than ever before, a Building Committee was appointed consisting of Dr. Stokes, chairman, and Messrs. Geo. W. Evans, T. J. Preston, David H. Brown, A. H. deHaven and Hon. W. O. H. Skirm, with W. H. Stokes as secretary.

Frederick T. Camp was the architect of the new Auditorium which is now universally acknowledged to be the largest evangelical audience room in the United States, if not in the world. Ground was broken for the foundations on December 2, 1893. Some idea of the area occupied may be gathered from the fact that 173,934 square feet or 6,442 cubic yards were excavated before the concrete and cement work could be laid. Its foundations are probably more substantial than those of any of our great public buildings, special care being taken in this respect with a view to assuring the safety of the large audiences that gather there. The cap-stones for trusses and gallery columns magnificent building was $50,000, but this was exceeded by several thousands. Viewed as a whole, it is a model structure, light but strong, inviting and homelike even when most densely filled and with every provision for the safety and comfort of the vast assemblages that gather there.

It was not without regret that Ocean Grove bade goodbye to its old Auditorium. That building, which had been the successor of several previous Auditoriums, each larger than its predecessor, had become very dear to the hearts of Methodists all over the country, and to thousands belonging to other denominations. Some idea of the spiritual battles that had been fought and won in these successive buildings may be gathered from the statement made by President Stokes that 12,873 religious services had been held there, or an average of one and one-half services every day during a period of twenty-two years, summer and winter included; that in twenty-four years 7,050 souls had been converted, 4,000 sanctified, 4,500 reclaimed and 55,800 especially helped—a grand total of 72,250 individuals who had been added to the army of Christ through the direct influence of the Ocean Grove meetings. 1894 has been the busiest, and in some respects, the most eventful season in the entire history of the Grove.

JESUS CLEANSING THE TEMPLE.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 2. John 2: 13-25.
Golden Text, John 2: 16. By Mrs. Baxter.

JESUS went up to Jerusalem; his Father's house was the centre of attraction to him. The people, the distinguished personages, the buildings, the variety of commodities in the bazaars, had no attraction for the son of God. At thirty years of age, his steps turned where they had turned at twelve years of age, to the temple. Unwelcome and painful sights were there; a brisk trade was going on in the outer courts of the holy sanctuary of God, in the beasts and birds which were required for sacrifice; and money changing for those from the colonies and other countries, who had brought foreign money to Jerusalem, was going on, and proving to be a thriving concern. It was like a large market, no respect there for the presence of God. And yet it was his Father's house, but none around him marked him, or knew who he was or whence he came. Did the Son of man, at that hour experience what many a child of God has experienced when called of God to take any very unusual step in obedience to him; which would, without doubt call forth opposition and persecution? Was this, was not this one of the times in which he was like as we are," and when, looking away from things which are seen and temporal, he, as well as we, had to look at things unseen and eternal, and to recognize the hand of God only, leaving all consequences to him? "He learned obedience by the things which he suffered," and this was probably one of those times of suffering, in which, having obeyed, he obtained the right to be "the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him." He was retiring, and loved to be alone; again and again, we read of his going apart away from the multitude. He did not make his voice to be heard in the streets: the vulgar, repulsive self-assertion which characterizes many, even of God's children, was not to be found in Jesus. He was "meek and lowly in heart." Thus we may infer that it was no easy step for him to take, when, in obedience to his Father, he took the position of Son over that Father's house, made a scourge of small cords, and drove out by sheer physical force these desecrators of the sanctuary, with their sheep and oxen, and turned out the changer's money, and overthrew the tables, and said unto them that sold doves: "Take these things hence; make not my Father's house a house of merchandise."

But how could he gain authority over this people? The Son of man knew what Paul the Apostle teaches, that none who go on God's warfare, go at their own charges. God could never send his beloved Son, — he had "emptied himself," and taken the form of a servant — to do a work which he had not previously prepared. We have never to calculate how far it is possible to us to obey God; we deal with a Creator as well as with a Father, and his resources are infinite. He has all power over the hearts of men, and can dispose them as he wills. Of course the Lord Encountered Opposition.

The chief priests and rulers had never objected to the trading done in the temple courts; who was this that took upon himself so much? His disciples understood him, and to them it was the fulfilment of Ps. 49: 9, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up," but with the Jews it was otherwise; they asked of him: "What sign shewest thou unto us, seeing thou doest these things?" Something had struck them, that this young peasant should be able, in one half hour, to accomplish the reformation of an abuse and a desecration which had long been a crying shame in Jerusalem; they would not condemn what was done. Their consciences were aroused. But then, who sent him? who was he? what authority had he? Jesus answered them and said: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." It was a sign which came to pass afterwards, for "he spoke of the temple of his body." But they had only materialistic ideas, they thought he spoke of the outward temple, and rejoined: "Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days."

This was one of the many words which Jesus spoke at the bidding of his Father to such as could not understand his meaning at the time. Only when he was risen from the dead did his disciples remember he had said this unto them. Then they believed the Scripture and the word which Jesus had said. "Was it not John himself that remembered on the very morning of the resurrection, the remarkable saying of Jesus: When he looked into the empty tomb where Jesus had been laid, it is said expressly of him and he saw and believed. For as yet they knew not the Scripture that he must rise again from the dead. God may sometimes send us with a message to those who are not yet in a state to understand or to receive it. Let us be careful how we go as messengers of God, and not be afraid when, in all soberness, it is pressed upon us to say such and such a thing to a person, or a congregation, to whom it does not seem at the time to be adapted. God knows what he is doing: it may be a word which will bear its fruit at another time. A young Christian man was at a small gathering, where the deep truths, which touch a true preparation of heart and life for the coming of the Lord, were dealt with. This young man did not understand, and he thought: "I could teach that man much more than he knows." But the same year, the Lord allowed him to come into severe trial, and then the words which he had formerly despised came back to him in power and transformed his life. If Jesus likened the temple to his human body, he has likened the Church to his mystical body, and as the time of his coming draws near, that body must be cleansed and all spirit of merchandise must be driven out.

Seeking Self in Holy Things.

A Christian man said, not long ago: "I have given large sums to such and such a mission, I think I ought to have a voice in it." Is not this something of the spirit of bargaining or merchandise? Was not that brother seeking his own in the things of God, not really giving but investing his money with the expectation of reaping power and influence? Is this worship — is it not rather merchandise? Is it not the very spirit which led the buyers and sellers in the temple to make the most they could of temporal good for themselves out of the worship of others? But there is a more subtle way in which the spirit of merchandise manifests itself. How many there are who expect to get so much enjoyment from a religious service, so much spiritual sensation out of their prayers, so much comfort for themselves out of Scripture readings, or so much credit from others out of Christian work! They have not yet yielded themselves to God, but their thought is to make God and his worship minister to them. They make God's house a house of merchandise and God's worship a means of gain to themselves. How can such watch and wait for Christ as the Bridegroom who will take to himself only those who have a spirit like his own. This is not the spirit of the Bride, who even forgets her own country, and her father's house. So the King desires her beauty, it is the impress of his own, the divinely wrought conformity to him, which has been brought about by the Spirit of God on a truly willing mind.

Before the Lord can accomplish his ministry in us and make our whole being a place of God's indwelling, or true place of worship where he shall be honored, he must be allowed to do a very effectual cleansing from all which is not true worship, all which disputes his rights as the One to be considered in our lives. And thus it is with his Church. But the church of Christ as a whole does not understand her calling, she justifies the buyers and sellers, and allows the mixture of the earthly and the heavenly. "That woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess" holds rule still in the Church of God, mixing up her abominations with "works and charity, and service, and faith, and patience." (Rev. 2: 19, 20.) The doctrine of Balaam is still extant among those who hold fast Christ's name, and have not denied his faith.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

JOHN is the only one of the four Evangelists who relates the incident of the lesson. But for his Gospel we should not know that Jesus ever went to Jerusalem after that visit when he was twelve years old, until his last visit, when he was betrayed and murdered. The other three evangelists record a clearance of the Temple such as John describes, but they place it as occurring during that last visit. We infer, therefore, that after Jesus had driven the bankers and traders out of the Temple at the beginning of his ministry, they returned and were again installed there and again driven out when Jesus went to the city on his last visit. It may be, however, that there was but one clearance and all four evangelists describe the same event. Jesus was shocked, as many a devout Jew must have been, by the spectacle of these traders within the hallowed precincts. They were, doubtless, in the outer quadrangle of the great space of nineteen acres which the Temple occupied. It was a noble square, lined with graceful Corinthian columns, which were arranged so as to form alcoves where the Rabbis might read and explain the law to visitors. But when Jesus visited it, it had become a noisy, busy market, where the lowing of the cattle, the cooing of the doves and the altercations of the money-brokers were the pervading sounds, and no teacher could make himself heard. The shrewd Hebrew had long been aware that the nearer he could establish his business to the Temple, the better for his business. About two million Jews were in Jerusalem at the Passover season and many of these came from distant lands where they were engaged in business. They needed animals and birds for sacrifice and they had to pay the annual Temple tribute of half-a-shekel to the treasury. Their coming was an opportunity for business not likely to be neglected by the Jerusalem Jews. There was a demand for half-shekels, which must be the "money of the sanctuary," not the Roman money of commerce. It was a small coin worth about twenty-eight cents and at this season the money changers made a profit of four cents in supplying it in exchange for other money. There were stores on the streets leading to the Temple, where oxen and sheep and doves were sold to people for offerings, and others where the sanctuary half-shekel could be obtained. A few privileged dealers were, in the time of Annas, admitted to the Court of the Gentiles. Annas made his bargain with them, but their presence there was represented as merely for the convenience of worshippers. They brought in the animals and doves and piles of coin and sold them there. Then there came to be a regular ring. The Levite whose duty it was to examine the offerings, to see that they were without blemish, as enacted by law, could reject any that were brought, and it was soon found that he was apt to reject those purchased outside the Temple. The worshipper soon learned that it was better to deal with one of the tenants of Annas in the Temple Court, than buy at a cheaper rate outside, with the risk of having his purchase thing back on his hands by the Levite. There was general indignation at the corruption, and therefore when this young Teacher drove the dealers out, they did not resist, as they easily could have done, but submitted through the fear of public opinion. Not even the Levites interfered, but they did not forget the act. A deadly hatred of Jesus was implanted in their hearts, and when he was brought up for trial three years later, it was his remark made on this occasion about destroying the Temple that they brought against him.

Found in the Temple. That was the place where a devout Jew would wish to be found. Perhaps some people seeing a man go regularly to the Temple might at once presume that he was devout; but he might be going there only for business. It is a sad thing when people attend church merely for what they may get for it in profit or reputation. In a famous painting the artist has given a suggestive lesson on this subject. At a distance it appears like a venerable friar, with a book before him and his hands clasped in devotion, but on closer inspection it is seen that his hands are not clasped in devotion, but are squeezing a lemon, and it is not a book before him, but a punch-bowl.

The changers of money sitting. It is remarkable that in the days of adversity and persecution the church has had more purity and power than in her days of prosperity. Thomas Aquinas went on one occasion to wait upon the Pope Innocent IV. in his palace of the Vatican. He found the Pope in his treasury examining the accounts and checking the bags containing large quantities of gold and silver. Innocent looked up as the good doctor entered and said, quoting the words of Peter, "you see the days are past in which the church has to say silver and gold have I none." Aquinas replied, "It is true, holy father, and the days are past, too, when she could say to the lame man, rise and walk."

Drive them out. In the Greek Mythology is the story of ten labors imposed on Hercules. One of these was to cleanse the stables of King Augeas, in which 3,000 oxen had been kept. Many years had the stables been used for this number of beasts, and they had never been cleansed. The immense labor was accomplished, according to the mythical story, in one day. Hercules is said to have performed it by changing the course of the rivers Alpheus and Peneus, so that they would run through the stables and carry away all the filth and pollution. That, of course, was only a fable, but many a heart that was full of sin and impurity has been cleansed when the streams of divine grace have been sent through them, leaving behind them purity and holiness.

My father's house a house of merchandise. Everything connected with the worship of God should be pure. Yet that which should be purest is sometimes polluted with vile motives, and then it is the vilest of all vile things. Ruskin says that the Savoyard's cottage, standing in the midst of an inconceivable inexpressible beauty, set on some golden bank of sloping sward, with clear fountains flowing beside it, and wild flowers and noble trees and goodly rocks gathered around it in a perfection, as of Paradise, is itself a dark and plague-like stain in the midst of the gentle landscape. Within a certain distance of its threshold the ground is foul and cattle-trampled; its timbers are black with smoke, its gardens choked with weeds and nameless refuse, its chambers empty and joyless, the light and wind gleaming and filtering through the crannies of their stones. A mute emblem of a church without spirituality.

They believed the Scripture. The whole Bible should be believed — its warnings and its promises. It is worthy of it. The Talmud has the story of a peasant girl separated from her betrothed. He had been called away to a distant land on business. He is long detained, and some say he will not return. The girl waits in patience, and friends pity her, and rivals mock her, and enemies taunt her, and say she will never see her lover again. But she goes into her chamber and there turns over the letters he has written and reads again the promises he has made, and is comforted. They may say what they will, she believes him and is sure that he is faithful to her. When on a joyous morning he returns, and hears all that has been said of him, he wonders that the girl kept her confidence in him unshaken. But she shows him the treasured letters and tells him that they kept her firm. So, the Talmud says, Israel may be sure that God will yet return and gather his people. So the Christian is sure that Christ loves his church and will yet glorify it.

TO HELP STRICKEN KOREA.

MINISTER YE SUNG SOO INTERVIEWED IN WASHINGTON BY "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

Over a Million Suffering, and Seed and Food Needed—Help to Korea Now May Open Her Gates to the Gospel—A Golden Opportunity for American Generosity.

WHEN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in last week's issue, gave publicity to the facts regarding the terrible sufferings of the Korean people in consequence of the famine now raging in that unhappy country, it was not beyond expectation that the generous heart of the American people would be touched by such a story of distress. Dr. Klopsch's telegram to the Korean Minister at Washington, Mr. Ye Sung Soo, offering to contribute one thousand barrels of flour toward any cargo that might be raised for the sufferers was made in sympathy for the people of Korea and with no thought of taking further steps in the matter. That tender, however, has been the means of stirring up a great sympathetic and humanitarian movement throughout the country as unexpected as it was unpremeditated. The Korean Minister at once telegraphed urging THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to become the custodian of a Relief Fund for his afflicted country and the American press, with a most unanimous and unmistakable voice, supported him in the demand that this journal should act in such a capacity. While we cheerfully accept this duty, we consider it a striking public recognition of the prompt and splendid generosity displayed by our readers in both the Russian Relief movement two years ago and the Food Fund last winter—a generosity that stands without a parallel in the history of unselfish public beneficence.

Before taking any conclusive attitude in Korean appeal, it was deemed advisable that an interview should be had with the Minister, when the actual condition of affairs in that country could be learned from authoritative sources. Accordingly, Dr. Klopsch, accompanied by Mr. G. H. Sandison of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff, proceeded to Washington and met Minister Ye Sung Soo by special appointment in the offices of the Legation. With him were his secretary, Mr. Jarng Bong Whan, who acted as interpreter, Mr. Pak Yong Kiu, an intelligent young attaché, and Mr. Seville Brown, an American gentleman, familiar with Korean affairs and a warm friend of Minister Ye. (The Korean custom in writing or pronouncing names is to place the surname before the given name.)

The group in the Legation which give welcome to the visitors was a picturesque one—Minister Ye (his costume was a long loose coat of shining silk, white and delicate, and white breeches, with shoes of the pattern peculiar to Korea), aged and venerable-looking, with his high-peaked Korean cap, long hair, beard and mustache, heavily streaked with gray, sat beside his Secretary, Mr. Jarng, a young, smooth-faced, bright-eyed, alert Asiatic, and Mr. Pak, an attaché, also young, and with the thoughtful contemplative face of a student. There is something of the mild, benignant air of a philosopher about the features of Minister Ye that speaks of innate goodness of heart and a noble nature. He comes of a famous Korean family, and he has a number of children, but none of his household are with him in this country. The Legation is in one of the loveliest locations in Washington, the "Iowa Circle." It is a large building, and there is a stillness pervading it that amounts almost to sadness.

After having received through an interpreter full confirmation of the reports current concerning the distressing famine in Korea, and of the utter helplessness of the Government to afford the necessary relief, Mr. Klopsch asked Minister Ye to what causes he attributed the present condition of his country.

"Two years ago," responded Mr. Ye, "our country had too much rain to raise any crop, and last year we had hardly any rain, with like disastrous effect. This year the Japanese and Chinese invasion took place at the very time when our farmers were required in the fields, and our people were driven by the invading forces from their homes to the mountains. As we are principally an agricultural nation, the distress resulting is pitiful in the extreme."

"To what extent is Korea now suffering from famine?"

"As regards territory, four out of her eight provinces are affected, and over a million people are facing starvation."

"Has your Government adopted any effective measures for relief?"

"Our people are poor, our country is poor and our Government is poor. There is not much that we can do for ourselves, but what little could be done has already been done. As long as one Korean possesses a meal, he will gladly share it with another."

"What do your people stand in special need of?"

"Most urgently food is wanted, but that, of course, cannot be secured here and shipped in time to be of practical service to my starving countrymen. But almost equally important is seed. Give us seed that we may be able to sow for next year's harvest. If we can get this, permanent relief is sure to result, and hunger will soon be banished from our land."

"What can you grow to advantage in Korea?"

"Oh, almost anything—wheat, oats, beans, barley, corn and rice."

"Should we arrange to send you a cargo of grain, how can it be best shipped?"

"From San Francisco to Chemulpo, the sea-port of Seoul, the capital of Korea."

"How long would the trip consume?"

"About twenty-five days."

"If the people of this country should supply the grain, would you furnish the vessel?"

"I think I could get friends of Korea to do so. Korea has some very warm friends among Americans who know us."

"Do you think that such a vessel, in view of the present conflict between China and Japan, would be likely to safely reach its destination?"

"Yes, indeed. We have this morning received positive assurances at both the Chinese and Japanese Legations in this city, that if necessary they would provide a convoy for the relief-ship."

"What facilities are there in Korea for the distribution of these supplies among the afflicted districts?"

"We have rivers and floats, good roads, horses, cows and oxen."

"Have you any railroads to facilitate this labor of love?"

"We have no railroads in Korea."

"Would the Government undertake the free distribution of this seed?"

"Most certainly. My Government will welcome your commissioners and help them in every possible way to quickly and safely and surely carry out your instructions."

"Would not the present war seriously interfere with agricultural pursuits?"

"Only temporarily. This war will not last long. The commercial interests of European nations are too great to admit of that, and a halt will soon be called. Then the condition of our country will be deplorable indeed. With no means, no food, no seed, no prospective harvest and the cost of living greatly increased by the war, what can they do, and to whom can they appeal but to the generous people of this great and friendly nation?"

"Is there not danger that even after its distribution, this seed would be diverted from the purposes intended, and be confiscated by your Government for back taxes?"

"Not at all. I will pledge the word of my King, whom I represent, and the honor of Korea, that such will not be the case, and that not one grain shall miscarry if Government efforts can prevent."

The coinage of Korea is peculiar and hard for a foreigner to comprehend. There appears to be no exact equivalent to the value of a tael, in Europe or America. Fifty yang (pronounced "yen"), equal $1 in gold; one yang is worth one hundred cash (or poon), and thirty yang are the equivalent of a Japanese dollar.

It is the personal desire of Minister Ye that all contributions should be sent in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as custodian of the Relief Fund. Their receipt will be promptly acknowledged and they will be held in readiness for the vessel which the Minister has pledged himself to furnish to carry them to Korea.

This may prove the beginning of a great work for God and humanity—a work all the more consecrated because it comes thus unexpected and undirected by any act on the part of the American people. They are chosen out as God's almoners to Korea for some Divine, mysterious purpose to be revealed hereafter. That the result will be a blessing to Korea in the increase of friendly relations with our great Republic is assured; but the greater blessing will be the spiritual outgrowth of this movement. "Nations shall be born in a day," and this beneficence may be the entering wedge to open the heart of the Hermit Kingdom to the Gospel of Jesus. Korea is a land without a religion. Touched by the sympathy of Christian America, it may open its doors to welcome our missionaries as it never yet has welcomed the disciples of any creed, since it expelled the Buddhists three centuries ago. It will thus be made, through the exercise of the golden virtue of Christian charity by ourselves, a land ripe for missionary enterprise, welcoming the Gospel and its teachers and keeping in touch with the most advanced Christian nations of the world.

ANTIQUITY OF OUR CALENDAR.

OUR year as we now reckon it is of Egyptian origin. So far as history reaches back into the darkness of the early ages we are led to believe that the dusky brown people by the banks of the Nile were the first to study the motions of the sun and stars and make them the measure of time. And some recent discoveries in Egypt, by careful students, seem to show the way in which the early astronomers were enabled to count the days in the solar year. The great temples on the Nile were built with a long entrance of columns leading from the river to the interior shrine—a kind of tunnel; sometimes it was lined with sphinxes or huge granite figures. Its mouth was turned toward a certain part of the heavens where the light of the setting sun could enter it only once a year. It was either at the summer solstice, when the sun was furthest in the north, or at some other periodic position of sun or star.

We may imagine the Egyptian astronomer watching in the inner shrine for the opening of the new year. The long line of columns served as a telescope by which he could catch the first beam of the setting sun. Suddenly the red light would flash through the tunnel up to the Holy of Holies; the moment it reached the shrine the philosopher would mark the hour, and know that another year had begun. From that point in time he could count day after day until, when the three hundred and sixty-five days had passed, once more the red beam of light streamed into the tunnel, and another year had passed away. In this way it seems probable that our days were first counted and divided.

Other nations, and even the Greeks and Romans, used the moon as their guide, and divided the year into lunar months. But it was found, as time passed on, that great irregularities crept in; the months no longer corresponded to the seasons; April became June, and the autumn months winter. The Egyptian sun-year was then generally adopted. But even this was disordered and altered by the ignorance of the Roman priests; and at last Julius Cæsar, who was fond of astronomy, resolved to correct the calendar; it is his year that we now use, and to his friend, the Egyptian Sosigenes, we owe our division of time.

WAR NEAR MOUNT HERMON.

Dr. H. H. Jessup, of Syria, now in New York City, has written an interesting article on the condition of affairs in Eastern Syria. A dispatch appeared in the daily journals lately stating that four hundred Circassians and Druzes had been killed or wounded in a fight in Syria. To most people it was an item of small interest; to Dr. Jessup's eyes it was a matter of much significance. It was to him a flash of light in the East, revealing conditions which were not unexpected to him and which he well understands. He finds the explanation of the fight in a political movement which has been steadily promoted by the Sultan of Turkey, and by which the Sultan is endeavoring to supplant the Bedouin tribes of the Hauran by a Circassian population who are loyal to the Sultan, and who are gradually taking possession of the rich lands over which the Bedouins have ridden in former times. The Arabs, and also the Druzes in the region of Mt. Hermon, claim that these fertile fields on which the Circassians are planting their homes and building villages are their pasturage grounds, and they are fighting off the intruders. The Circassians have held their ground as yet, but hostilities often break out, and the dispatch on which Dr. Jessup comments is simply the brief record of one of many battles.

The Press and the Famine.

Leading Newspapers Urging Help for Korea through "The Christian Herald."

KOREA'S sufferings have been widely commented upon by the press of the country generally, and the leading newspapers have been prompt in their approval of Minister's Ye's suggestion that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be made the depository for all contributions of food or seed, intended for the famine sufferers in that country. First to espouse this humane course was the "New York Sun," which said editorially:

American civilization should move promptly for the relief, as far as possible, of the hunger-maddened farmers and peasants of this peaceful, agricultural, friendly people. The flag of the United States is respected by both China and Japan, and supplies sent out for the starving Koreans to the American Legation at Seoul could not go wrong. Subscriptions of money for this purpose might well be forwarded through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York, if that newspaper, which has been earliest in its perception of the urgency of the case, will consent to be the agent of the humane impulses of our citizens.

Much to Secretary Gresham's regret, he has been compelled to inform Dr. Louis Klopsch, of New York, that it will be impossible for the United States to furnish a war ship or transport for the transportation of provisions to the starving peasants of Korea without any authorization from Congress. Telegrams, tendering grain and other food supplies, have been received at the Korean Legation, and the Minister wishes it stated for the benefit of these and intending contributors, that the material offered should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York. He has also telegraphed to an agent in San Francisco inquiring as to the cost of chartering a steamer at that port to carry provisions to Korea. The American Trading Company, of New York, which has commercial relations with China, Japan and Korea, has volunteered to do everything in its power toward furthering the charitable scheme, and it said to be certain that the governments of Japan and China will aid in seeing that the contributions reach their destination and that they are properly distributed.

The Washington "Post" has the following, editorially:

The Post has already made mention of the charitable movement on behalf of the famine-stricken people of Korea, inaugurated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, and so gratefully and pathetically acknowledged by the Korean envoy at this Capital. It is comforting and reassuring to observe the generous response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's suggestion which has been elicited in every part of the country. These manifestations of the real spirit of humanity and brotherly love are honorable to the country and the generation. They represent a form of Christianity understood in every language and capable of asserting itself to the worshippers of every God. They are better than dogmas, more eloquent than sermons, more convincing than any argument. They embody the noble Samaritanism of which our own Saviour has spoken to us, but of which we too often lose sight in the ardor of doctrinal enthusiasm. They explain themselves to the very darkest mind; they touch and stimulate the most wretched heart.

We understand that our evening contemporary, the Star, has undertaken the kindly office of receiving contributions, and we trust that Washington will in this deserving cause display the same zealous generosity that has in the past made its name everywhere respected and beloved.

A very large number of other journals throughout the country have published similar views approving of the humanitarian project of sending help to Korea, which looks to this Republic for aid in its present dire extremity.

INSANE THROUGH A MIRROR.

Some years ago there was a missionary bazaar held in a Christian city in aid of African missions. When the bazaar was finished, it was found that a number of articles were left unsold. Some of them, it was thought, might be very handy for the mission, so it was decided to send the lot out to Africa. Among other things was a box of little hand mirrors, that had been given by a merchant. The mirrors took the people's fancy, and their fame was carried far beyond the station. The knowledge of this wonderful thing came to a princess of a distant powerful tribe. She had never beheld her dusky countenance, except as a double silhouette, in a placid lake. Being a princess, she was told by everybody that she was most beautiful; whereas, she was one of the plainest women in the whole tribe. A messenger was dispatched for one of the mirrors, which he procured and at once returned to his mistress. When she got possession of it she took herself off to her own place, that she might have a good look at her beauty. When she beheld herself as she was, with one blow of her hand she dashed the glass to pieces. She ordered the missionaries off her territory, and published an edict forbidding looking-glasses being brought into the country. Are there not many in other lands who, when they are brought face to face with God's looking-glass, with the hideousness of their sin, and they cannot deny the fact, blame the mirror?

EDUCATION.

THE world's population is mightily increasing, and we want in all departments more trained hands and hearts and heads. The world can never have a surplus of educated men. You say that hundreds of those well educated turn out nerveless and useless. Yes, but how much worse their deficit had no opportunities been afforded them. The work will go on until thorough education will come within reach of all the people, and ignorance will be forever banished from the world. What is now called a liberal education will come to help laborers in all departments, until chemistry and geology shall be harnessed to every plow, and science will prune and trim and enrich and redeem every orchard, and mathematics and natural philosophy will help in the construction and management of all machinery, and those things that are now considered the luxuries of education will become the common and universal possession of all the people. So much has the standard of collegiate education been advanced that those who used to graduate with honors from universities would not be qualified to enter some of our modern colleges.

The speeches now made by the young men at commencements are far superior to those of our boyhood. The old humdrum about Greece and Rome has been exchanged for harangue about things of here and today. The sylphs and dryads and naiads and the gods have gone out of business. Longfellow turns out to be a better poet than Homer, and Bancroft a better historian than Herodotus, and we have fifty orators who can beat Demosthenes. The absurd halo has melted from the brow of the ancients, and the old philosophers could not keep up with a class in our Polytechnic or Packer. Washington got angry and pitched a negro servant out of the window at Mount Vernon, and in the biography of Thomas Jefferson we find that the signing of the Declaration of Independence was hastened by the fact that next to Independence Hall, Philadelphia, was a livery stable, and that the horse-flies left their perch one day and attacked the American Congress and bit and stung the members so that those who could not before get their courage up to sign the tremendous document, at the intolerable annoyance of the flies, hastily penned their names so as to get off and away from the circumscribed irritation.

College education has been revolutionized and the mind of the student is not so stuffed with the heavy baggage of Latin and Greek that he has no room for practical, every-day information. Look at the graduates of this week and last week and next week, and you will find vast improvement in physique. By regatta and base-ball club and gymnasium and military drill, a class of healthy men is launched for the voyage of life from the dry dock, instead of those crazy crafts that were loaded to the water's edge with physical infirmities enough to sink them before they got out as far as quarantine. In many of the institutions a great advancement has been made in the fact that male and female education go side by side, just as God intended it. He put the two sexes beside each other in Eden. He puts them beside each other in the family, and why not in the colleges? There are those who talk of woman as though she were a satellite of man or an annex to the lords of creation, and seem to think that she was a divine after-thought. But, judging of old times by the fashion plates of other centuries, the granddaughters are far superior to the grandmothers, and the fuss which they used to make a hundred years ago over a very good woman shows me that feminine excellence, which is common now, was rare then. At the beginning of this century a woman was considered well educated if she could do a sum in rule of three. Algebras and geometries were to her inaccessible heights. Now look at the books in all departments of knowledge under the arm of the school-miss. This land will not be what it ought to be till woman has equal opportunity for thorough education with man. She has greater responsibilities, and certainly should not have less opportunities. Blessed be God for the brightening prospects of schools and colleges and churches and nations.

"GOD'S COUNTRY."

YOU ought not to regard a man who does not believe in God any more than you should regard a man who refuses to believe in common decency. Your pocketbook is not safe a moment in the presence of an atheist. God is the only source of good government. Why not, then, say so and let the chairman of the Committee on Resolutions in all political conventions take a pen full of ink and with bold hand, head any document with one significant "whereas," acknowledging the goodness of God in the past and begging his kindness and protection for the future? This country belongs to God, and we ought in every possible way acknowledge it. From the moment that on an October morning in 1492 Columbus looked over the side of the ship and saw the carved staff which made him think he was near an inhabited country and saw also a thorn and a cluster of berries—type of our history ever since the piercing sorrows and the cluster of national joys—until this hour, our country has been bounded on the north and the south and the east and the west by the goodness of God. The Huguenots took possession of the Carolinas in the name of God. William Penn settled Pennsylvania in the name of God. The Pilgrim Fathers settled New England in the name of God. Preceding the first gun of Bunker Hill, at the voice of prayer, all heads uncovered.

In the war of 1812 an officer came to General Andrew Jackson and said: "There is an unusual noise in the camp; it ought to be stopped." General Jackson said, "What is the noise?" The officer said: "It is the voice of prayer and praise." And the General said: "God forbid that prayer and praise should be an unusual noise in the camp; you had better go and join them." Prayer at Valley Forge, prayer at Monmouth, prayer at Atlanta, prayer at South Mountain, prayer at Gettysburg. "Oh," says some sceptic, "the Northern people prayed on one side and the Southern people prayed on the other side, and so it didn't amount to anything." And I have heard good Christian people confounded with this statement, when it is as plain to me as my right hand is. Yes, the Northern people prayed in one way and the Southern people prayed in another way and God answered in his own way, giving to the North the re-establishment of the Government and giving to the South larger opportunities, larger than she ever had anticipated and harnessing all her rivers in great manufacturing institutions, until the Mobile and the Tallapoosa, and the Chattahoochee are Southern Merrimacs, and the unrolling of great mines of coal and iron, of which the world knows nothing, and opening before her opportunities of wealth which will give 99 per cent. more of affluence than she ever possessed. Oh, you are a stupid man if you do not understand how God answered Abraham Lincoln's prayer in the saddle, and answered all the prayers of all the cathedrals on both sides of Mason and Dixon's line. God's country all the way past; God's country now. Put his name in your pronunciamientos. Put his name on your ensigns. Put his name on your city and State and national enterprises. Put his name in your hearts!

We publish in this issue a musical selection from the new Christian Endeavor Hymn Book, by Mr. Sankey, as used at the recent Christian Endeavor convention at Cleveland. Other choice selections from the same source will appear from time to time in these pages, by special arrangement.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

If any of "The Mail-Bag" readers have any booklets, religious papers or Testaments, for which they now have no particular use and wish to aid those who are destitute of such literature, they can do so by sending the same to Rev. M. Copley, Louisiana, Ky.

M. E. Port Penn, Del. The inclosed quotation has given me so much food for thought, that I thought I would pass it on. It is this: "A deep impression was made on the writer's mind, a few days ago, in hearing the close of a conversation on the street, in which one said, 'It won't make any difference to us a hundred years from now.' Now, stop one moment and consider. Will it make no difference to you a hundred years from now what your thoughts and actions were while on this earth? What do we learn from the Bible about Dives and Lazarus on this subject?"

M. Hall, Roscobel, Pa. A preacher recently said in a sermon preached here that a sinner is a child of the devil and a Christian is a child of God. Is not the sinner also a child of God?

In the sense of his being one of God's creatures, he may be called his child, but as he is in rebellion against God, is not obeying him, nor knowing him, he must be accounted unworthy of the name. Through Christ he may become truly a child of God by being transformed by the Holy Spirit which God will give to those who ask him.

Mary Colan, South Bend, Ind. Does the command in Numbers 15: 30, 31 imply that if we do evil, knowing it to be evil, there can be no forgiveness?

No, otherwise few would be forgiven. The command was one of those necessary for the maintenance of discipline in the peculiar circumstances in which the people were placed. They came out of the corruption of Egypt and were going to a land in which they would be surrounded by idolaters. Severe penalties were therefore prescribed which do not concern us or apply to the future life at all.

Mrs. E. J. Barnes, room 704, Brown's Block, Rockford, Ill., writes: "I see in the MAIL-BAG that 'Old Farmer' would like to pay the cost of a personal worker in his stead in the Moody Training School. I have long been anxious to enter that school, but have no means at command. I have done personal work in the evangelistic line in the departments of W. C. T. U. I would like to devote my life wholly to the service of my Master, and I realize the necessity of a training for the work. I have no family ties to hinder, only two children who are settled in life."

G. W. M., Port Wine, Colo. How can a young man cure himself of extreme diffidence, sensitiveness and timidity?

Probably the best means of inducing self-reliance and confidence is to accustom oneself to the society of intelligent men and women as much as possible. Join in the conversation, even though you may be able to contribute very little to it, and strive by every means to overcome the disposition to reticence and silence. Read interesting books on recent topics and store your mind with good material for conversation. An excellent help is to join a debating club.

W. F. Lovelace, Wynne, 1. Is there any direct command to use wine at the Lord's Supper. 2. Are the two accounts of the creation in Genesis accounts of different acts or of the same creation? 3. Should foot-washing be practiced in the churches now?

1. Christ's object appears to have been to institute a common meal which should be a sign of brotherliness and fellowship—an acknowledgment that union in him was a bond so close as to obliterate social and class distinction and to make it a holy sacrament. In using bread and wine he used the elements common at the time in Palestine, and although he gave no direct command as to what should be used, his example has always been followed. 2. There was but one creation. It is thought that extracts from two or more original documents were used in the preparation of the work of Genesis. 3. Foot-washing is based on the words of Christ (John 13: 14). It would be a childish literalism to infer that Christ was commanding a practice for perpetual use. At that time, when sandals were worn, the custom of washing the feet of a guest was common, and was performed by a servant. The whole connection of the passage shows that Christ by his example and his words was simply inculcating humility and a readiness to serve others even by menial acts. In our day, they who have his spirit and desire to follow his example and precept, may do so in better ways than in washing a man's feet.

G. R. Brown, Salisbury, Ky. 1. Where in the Bible do you find it stated that Nahor was older than Methuselah? 2. If ancient Jerusalem is from "fifty to seventy feet below the modern town," can it be truly said of our visits there that we visit the place and scenes of the Saviour's wonderful works, and do we really know that modern Jerusalem is over the very spot where stood ancient Jerusalem?

1. See answer to G. B. Fullerton and others in this issue. 2. The original sites of all very ancient cities are more or less covered by debris, and Jerusalem is not an exception. Otherwise, the location, general scenery and surroundings are unchanged. The identity of modern Jerusalem with the city of our Saviour's time has never been doubted.

Constant Reader, Baltimore, Md. Is it a brother's duty to support another brother who has spent a small fortune in dissipation, refused to help his relatives when he might have done so, and now throws himself on his brother, creating dissatisfaction in the latter's family?

How far help may be extended to an erring brother, under such peculiar circumstances, must be left to the individual judgment and conscience, always bearing in mind that one's own wife and children have a first claim upon a man for support, before all others. Our Saviour counsels forgiveness and forbearance to the uttermost, and the Christian spirit will not permit a man to cast off his own brother, as long as he has it in his power to help him, but persistent offending by a spendthrift, to the extent of impoverishing others, need not be endured. Probably a complete cessation of all supplies would bring him to his senses and induce better conduct hereafter.

J. F. R., Fort Sherman, Ia. Suppose a man to have believed himself converted, to have joined the church, but on account of unpleasantness in the church and personal misfortune, to have withdrawn from membership; and suppose that then being taunted by old associates and being provoked by other things, he denounces the church and declares openly that henceforth he will serve the devil—in such a case has the man committed the unpardonable sin, or if he repents and tries to live right will he be forgiven?

He need have no doubt as to God forgiving him, if he sincerely repents and pleads the merits of his Saviour. The fact of his being concerned about his salvation and earnestly desiring God's forgiveness, shows that he has not committed the unpardonable sin. The Holy Spirit is evidently drawing him and God never tantalizes a man by implanting desires which will not be gratified. Christ, who pardoned Peter, and restored him to his Apostleship, after he had denied him with oaths and curses, will not reject a repentant backslider in these days.

H. A. Bachelder, Oakland, Me. 1. Is it generally believed by Biblical scholars that we are near the time of Christ's Second Advent? 2. Is it sin to read secular newspapers on the Sabbath?

1. Biblical scholars are divided on this subject into two schools. One school expects the Lord's coming before the Millennium and the other expects it at the close. There is consequently a difference of a thousand years between them. The pre-millennarians believe that the present time so closely resembles the time indicated in prophecy as that in which the Lord would come, that they expect his advent within a few years. Many of them base that belief also on a calculation of the dates and periods mentioned in Daniel and the Revelation. 2. Without presuming to declare the practice sinful, we should consider the Christian who spent the Lord's Day in reading secular newspapers a man who did not rightly appreciate the purpose of the day or value the opportunity it affords for laying aside worldly things and gaining spiritual good and doing spiritual service.

Win. Hair, Pomona, Cal. If, as some teach, the world is near its end, how are we to understand the statement Rev. 20: 4, that certain persons would be raised from the dead a thousand years before the general resurrection? If they have not been raised, it would appear that the world must last at least another thousand years?

We do not think that any intelligent people teach that the world is near its end. Prophetic expositors teach that it is the dispensation not the world that is near its end. Most of them are agreed that Christ will appear to summon his waiting and expectant people to himself and will then, after an interval of about three years come to the earth and will reign for a thousand years and that all this must take place before the end or regeneration of the earth.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

COREA, THE HERMIT KINGDOM.

COREA, to her sorrow, occupies, at the present time, a larger share of the world's attention than ever before in her history. Ordinarily, but little interest is taken in the affairs of the strange kingdom, which so reluctantly opened its gates to foreigners as to have earned for itself the title of "The Hermit Nation." Now, however, that China and Japan are engaged in fierce conflict on her soil and England, Russia and France are watching the struggle with jealous vigilance, Korea is for the time a land of world-wide interest. The more that is learned of her, shows in what striking contrast to Western nations are all her institutions and national life. On this page is a picture of Fusan, the most southern port of Korea, which is distant from the Japanese coast but little more than fifty miles. It has a magnificent natural harbor, in which a large navy could be accommodated. The bold headlands which protect it from the sea were once well cultivated and occupied by a thriving Korean city. But the King of Korea conceived the idea that if signs of prosperity were observed from passing vessels, foreign nations might be tempted to invade the country. He, therefore, commanded the people to remove inland and the headlands were reduced to a state of desolation which could invite no visitors. After the headlands are passed, the bay opens in a broad expanse of smooth water. Two villages, of which the Japanese occupy one and the Chinese the other, line the shores of the bay. The Korean city is farther inland and is not visible from the bay. Mr. A. B. de Guerville, who visited it on his way to Seoul as the World's Fair Commissioner, gives to the "New York Herald" a graphic account of its people. He says that they are handsome and well made and dress in long, loose garments of white muslin. They welcomed the Americans with good humor and with boundless curiosity. He describes the city of Fusan as abominably dirty and looking like heaps of mud. Subsequently he had an audience with the king at Seoul, which is a much more important city, with many foreign business houses and two imposing hotels. He found the king a man of considerable intelligence, who was deeply interested in all that he could learn of America. The primitive character of the people was conspicuous everywhere. Their history goes back to a period before the time of Solomon and their rigid isolation has rendered them a most interesting, but in the presence of nineteenth century civilization, a most bewildered people. They are now in the throes of a national convulsion and are besides in the terrible grip of famine, the result of the failure of the harvests in two successive years. An appeal on behalf of the starving millions has been issued to the American people by the Korean minister at Washington. A liberal response will assuredly be made and our readers will be pleased to see by the correspondence published on another page, that the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is officially recognized as the leader in the movement. The Koreans have hitherto been hostile to Christianity, as appears from the letters sent to us by Dr. Hall, who is laboring as a medical missionary there, but they are likely to take a new view of it when they find by experience that it is a faith which prompts its followers to feed the hungry and pity those who are ready to perish. (Matt. 25: 34-40.)

A Search for an Heir.

Inquiries are being made for a man who was formerly an inmate of the almshouse at Albany, N. Y. He is a Swede by birth but has been many years in this country. A fellow-countryman used to visit him occasionally at the almshouse, who told the officials there that he had known their charge in Stockholm. According to his account, the man belonged to one of the most wealthy families in that city, but had been cast off by them on account of his evil ways and his propensity for squandering his money. In some way he had managed to pick up the trade of machinist during his wanderings about the United States, and about six months ago he heard of some work and left the almshouse to secure it. Nothing has been heard of him since that time; but last week his friend went to the almshouse to inquire for him. He said the man had fallen heir to about half a million dollars and advertisements were appearing for him in the Swedish papers. The fortune came from his uncle, a banker in Stockholm, who believed in his nephew and had released the prisoner. Probably no plea for mercy by the prisoner on his own account would have availed to save him from a heavy sentence but for the sake of those who loved him he was allowed to go free. It is so that the sinner may hope for pardon. Not for his own sake but for the sake of Jesus who loved him and died for him he is forgiven. (John 3: 16.)

A Dog's Mistake.

A boy residing in upper New York is lying in a dangerous condition, as the result of a dog's mistaken effort to rescue him. It is the boy's habit to take a bath in the East River every morning during the summer. He has become an expert swimmer and takes a delight in plunging from the head of the spile at the end of one of the piers. A few days ago he was taking his favorite exercise, when a man with a big St. Bernard dog strolled down the pier. The dog seeing the boy in the water became excited and dragging his chain out of the man's hand jumped into the river. In a few minutes he had reached the boy's side and grabbed him by the arm. The boy tried to fight the dog off and was badly hurt in the struggle that ensued, but was finally dragged out of the river by the powerful animal. It appears that the St. Bernard has saved three persons from drowning and was doctor says it was due to the patient's physical condition, but the patient says it was caused by the doctor's want of skill in setting the limbs at the time of the accident. If it should be proved that the limbs were not properly set, even though the cause was the surgeon's reluctance to cause pain, the verdict will probably go against him. There are cases in which the firm infliction of pain is the greatest kindness. It is often so in spiritual matters. God severely reproached the ancient prophets that they had healed the hurt of the daughter of his people slightly. (Jer. 6: 14.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Missionary Presses in the Turkish Empire print about forty million pages annually, and over one-half of these pages are God's Word.

The Sacred River Ganges is to Lose its special sanctity after next year, according to a prophecy in the Hindu Scriptures. The Nerbudda will then be the holy stream of India.

The Death of Dr. Leslie Stevens, Superintendent of the Central China Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church is announced. He died of dysentery at Nanking on July 27. He was one of the most devoted and earnest workers in the China field.

Sir John Burns, the Managing Director of the Cunard Steamship Company, has given directions, at the request of a British chaplain, that no ship of that company in the Mediterranean shall work cargo on Sunday in ports abroad any more than they would at home.

For Some Years There has been Going on a movement in Germany in favor of a stricter observance of the Lord's Day. Recently the Consistory of Hanover issued a pastoral letter to the ministers and church councils reminding them "that it is the duty of the church to lead the members of congregations from Sunday rest to Sunday hallowing."

The Recent General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, reports a prosperous year. The churches have received 1868 communicants and reduced the debt of the previous year $45,000.

At the Dedication of the New Auditorium at Ocean Grove, N. J., on Sunday, August 12, the whole of the debt on the new building was cleared off. The subscriptions in the morning amounted to $13,000 and in the evening the balance of $12,000 was promised. The entire cost of the building was $65,000.

Rev. Daniel Wilshire, the President of the Baptist Union in the Bahamas, writes that there are now three thousand members in the Union which has its own building and is doing valuable work. The English Baptist Missionary Society still retains an agent there but the burden of the aggressive missionary work is evidently on Mr. Wilshire's shoulders although he receives no salary from the Society.

The Rev. B. Fay Mills has been engaged to serve as stated supply for one year for the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Albany, N. Y. The church grants Mr. Mills leave of absence for several weeks during the year to meet such engagements for evangelistic services as have been made already. It is understood that if the arrangement is mutually satisfactory Mr. Mills will become the regular pastor of the church.

The First English Baptist Church in the Orange Free State, Africa, has been opened; it seats 250 persons. The constitution of the church is framed on the basis of union. "The membership of the church has, from its establishment, been open to believers who have not been baptized according to the usages of the Baptists, and it will remain open to them."

The Burnham Industrial Farm at Caanan Four Corners, N. Y., where incorrigible boys are cared for and trained in farm work has a few vacancies for consecrated Christian workers who have tact and skill in the management of boys. As it is a benevolent institution the salary paid is of the smallest, but there are abundant opportunities for Christian usefulness. The superintendent is Rev. John Dooley to whom applications should be sent.

A Panic was Narrowly Escaped in the Congregational Church at Thomastonville, Conn., on Sunday evening, July 29. The spire of the building was struck by lightning soon after the service commenced. The electric light wires conducted the electricity all over the building, the lights were put out and the lamps broken, the glass and porcelain scattering down in a shower upon the congregation. A panic was averted, however, by one of the deacons who began singing the Doxology, in which the congregation soon joined.

At the Camp Meeting of the Christian Alliance at Old Orchard, Me., on August 12, Rev. A. B. Simpson appealed for funds to prosecute the foreign missionary work of the Alliance. The response was enthusiastic. One person gave a piece of real estate worth $1,000; another gave securities of the value of $10,000; several persons gave valuable jewels. The cash gifts were similarly large. One gave $5,000 and several $1,000 each. Below that amount there were many contributions of $500 and $100. In all, over forty thousand dollars was raised at the one meeting for foreign missions.

A Novel Experiment in the Fight Against the saloon is being tried at New Rochelle, N. Y. A large two-story building has been hired and furnished at a cost of $3,000, contributed mainly by the Christian people of the town. The ground floor is devoted to a refreshment room in which tea, coffee, lemonade and sandwiches are sold at cost price; a reading room supplied with daily and weekly papers and an amusement room where there are appliances for chess, checkers, dominoes, etc. The upper floor is occupied by dormitories and shower baths. Here a man may get a bath, bed and breakfast in perfect cleanliness and neatness for thirty-five cents.

THE WAR IN COREA—FUSAN, THE SOUTHERN PORT OF COREA.

made him his heir. The almshouse officials could give no clue to his whereabouts and he has not yet been found. It is supposed that he is still wandering about the country seeking work and unconscious of the fortune awaiting his appearance. It is assumed that if he knew of it, he would apply for it; yet there are many who have been told again and again of the eternal riches which they might have from God through Christ, who never seek them. (1. Peter 1: 4.)

Saved by His Victim.

The release of a highway robber on the plea of the prosecutor occasioned a pathetic scene in a New York court a few days ago. A man was charged before Recorder Smyth with having snatched a purse from the hand of a lady on the Boulevard. He was undoubtedly guilty for more than one person had witnessed the crime and when he was caught the purse was in his possession. One witness, however, failed to appear and the man was remanded. When he was brought up the second time, the lady whom he had robbed went on the stand and asked the Recorder to release the prisoner. She said that she had visited his wife and found her a most worthy woman who had seen better days. She had a young infant and the prisoner's father who was aged and helpless lived with them. She pleaded that for the sake of these three the Recorder would let the prisoner go and she further promised to find work for him and give him the opportunity of earning an honest living. The Recorder was naturally reluctant to overlook so serious a crime but eventually the lady's pleading won him over and he doubtless under the impression that the boy was in need of similar service. The boy's parents naturally do not feel toward the dog as do the friends of the three persons whom he rescued from drowning, but are indignant over the needless suffering their son is passing through. Sometimes worldly people feel similar indignation against Christian workers when they witness the suffering that often follows conviction of sin before peace comes through believing; but it is never justifiable for the sinner is never, like the boy, in no danger or able to save himself. (II. Cor. 7: 9.)

Doctor and Patient in Litigation.

A suit for the recovery of a fee of four thousand dollars, is shortly to be tried in the Court of Common Pleas of New York. It is brought by a surgeon for services rendered to a man who was injured by being thrown from his horse. A cross suit has also been filed by the patient against the surgeon for five thousand dollars damages sustained by the surgeon's unskillful treatment. The patient's arm and leg were broken by the fall from his horse and there were other minor injuries. He was in a very nervous condition when the surgeon examined him and there was some difficulty in setting the limbs. He was in intense pain which the surgeon was humanely desirous should not be unnecessarily increased in the operation. The man lay helpless for more than six months, and several serious operations were performed, owing to the broken bones failing to unite. That fact is admitted on both sides, but the litigants differ as to the cause of the failure. The

A Round of Visits.

An "Afternoon Out" with Two Young Matrons of Widely Different Types—Child-wives and their Burdens—Mrs. Jamal's Good Work among the Girls.

(Concluded.)

SIT No. 3 of this one of our "afternoons out" is paid to a young matron who would be comely were she less slatternly and plumper. Her room is without a window, and if the sun had not shone out brightly for the quarter-hour of our stay, we should not be able to see from one wall to another of the gloomy confines.

My guide knits her brows disapprovingly and sighs in entering. Her second remark to the hostess is a protest. A cradle is drawn near the door that the light may fall upon a weazen-faced baby, sitting upright in it. His eyes are startlingly large and dark in the small visage; the fingers eagerly outstretched to the bowl in the mother's hand, are like the claws of a bird. He is too hungry to notice the strangers, yet Mrs. Jamal intercepts the vessel.

"You are not going to give him this?"

She shows it to me.

"Curdled!" I say. "We call it 'loppered milk'!"

"It is lebben, and old lebben at that, sour like vinegar and mouldy, and not too clean. Child! child!" turning to the mother, "don't you know that babies should have sweet milk? the freshest you can get? Goat's milk if you cannot get cow's?" And again to me and despairingly—"What can be expected of a mother who is hardly more than a baby herself? She is but fourteen now."

The girl-wife laughs childishly, and good-humoredly, and proceeds to hold the nauseous-looking mess to the greedy lips.

"He eats it every day. He eats nothing else," she says carelessly.

"He looks like it!" retorts the visitor. "Ah, madame, it is cases such as thus that make the heart ache. I have known this girl since she was six years old. She was married at twelve. She cannot cook, she cannot sew; her baby's clothes must be made by somebody else, and you see what a place this is for a husband to come to at night. I would teach her if I could, but they never learn anything after they are married."

The mother looks around at the earnest tone, and laughs again, comprehending nothing except that her friend is troubled, and about her, and profoundly indifferent to censure as to praise. The chamber is as ill-furnished as her mind. No "Franji" innovations in the shape of beds with legs to support them, seats to match, and chests of drawers, have perverted Syrian simplicity here. A roll of dirty bedding in one corner, a brazier of hot ashes, the coffee-pot simmering upon it, a big bowl, the cushioned bench against the wall, and the cradle, make up the list of household goods and chattels. The order of unwashed humanity; of past cookery, in which onions took an active part, and of stale tobacco-smoke blend queerly and powerfully with the pungent fumes of the boiling coffee. Seasoned as I have thought myself to be by now, to assaults upon the olfactory organs, I am thankful to be allowed to retreat to the outer air. My companion lingers a moment longer to explain that we have not time to accept the coffee the good-natured hostess would press upon us, and to subjoin a few more words of neighborly counsel.

"Not that it will do any good," continues the mentor in rejoining me. "But I cannot help liking the poor child. She is of such a good disposition and loves her baby. Her husband is much older than she, and has steady work, and would be kind to a woman who made his home comfortable. I try to make her understand this, and to encourage her to keep things clean and learn to sew and cook his food well. As you have seen, she but laughs. She ran wild upon the street until she was married, just as those girls are doing now"—directing my notice to a knot of children scrambling over a broken wall at the bottom of the street, chattering and shrieking like so many parrots. "What can mothers expect who let their daughters grow up so, but that they will have homes and babies like those you saw just now?"

She is so much absorbed in the subject, and so intent upon shielding her white izzar from the pollution of pavement and wall, that she does not at once hear a soft call from the landing of a flight of steps bulging over the street.

The summons is repeated, and we look up to see a woman beckoning importunately. She pulls her "mendeel" forward over

We have been seen from other doorways. Mrs. Jamal still cuddles the baby when two more women enter; one leads a child; her companion carries another in her arms. Salutations and introductions over, the mother of the toddler prefers a request. A piece of dark blue cloth is thrown over her shoulder, just purchased for her by her husband, and she would like to make a jacket out of it for herself. With frank disregard of conventionality, or what we account conventional usages, Mrs. Jamal lays by her "izzar," spreads the cloth upon the matted floor, kneels down beside it, measures and chalks a pattern upon it with workmanlike skill, and cuts out the garment as swiftly and well as if she were a trained tailoress. The women follow every movement with keen interest, and I am almost as much engrossed.

It is doubtful if my conductress has ever heard of "zenana missions," under that name. She would be surprised were I to dub her "a home-and-foreign-missionary." She is merely a Christian woman, dwelling among her own people; a housekeeper, wife and mother, happy in her home, and longing to make other homes as happy as hers.

I have already learned to distinguish Christian women from Moslem wherever I see them, and silently conclude (correctly, as I learn presently) that the bearer of the baby belongs to the Greek Church. It is not an expression of superior intelligence alone that characterizes the Christians, but a general alertness of bearing and play of countenance, a sort of self-respectfulness, it I may thus phrase it. "This woman has a soul of her very own," it seems to say. "She thinks, feels, hopes and lives her

Sandreczky, whose Children's Hospital is one of the noblest monuments to Christian enterprise in Jerusalem, and to whose courtesy and professional skill foreign residents and visitors alike bear grateful testimony, once said the same thing in effect to me:

"In the Moslem's opinion, the most mischievous idea that could get possession of the mind of his wife or daughter, would be belief in the equality of the sexes. Whatever tends to overthrow the tenet of masculinity—that is, patriarchal—sovereignty, is a direct blow at the Mohammedan religion. The woman who suspects her own individuality is dangerous."

Here is the key-note to what makes mission work among the followers of the Prophet especially difficult and discouraging. It is not uncommon for an English or American visitor to a harem, small or large, to be warned not to speak of Christ or his religion to the women, and frequent calls from the pale-faces would excite a degree of suspicion which would lead to exclusion. It follows, as a necessity, that the good done to the creatures who minister to the needs and pleasures of the superior sex, must be wrought tactfully and gradually.

"I am no more in my husband's sight than his donkey!" said a sad-eyed woman to an American woman who had been an angel of mercy to the miserable household. "Not so much, for he beats the donkey less."

In our homeward walk, I say something of this to my companion. She shakes her head mournfully:

"You see but a little. If you were to live among them year after year, you would be very sad. I do what I can to lighten the load of my small world. But what is that among so many?"

Returned to my cozy room in the Grand Hotel, and sitting down to transfer to my "Familiar Talk" portfolio the notes jotted down this afternoon, the impulse comes strongly upon me to write further again to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers concerning the unobtrusive, sensible work this one Christian woman, unaccredited by any society, is doing among her countrywomen. Three times a week she collects in her neat sitting-room from fourteen to eighteen native girls, and teaches them to do plain sewing, embroidery, knitting and mending, giving her house and her time without charge. The girls take turns in cooking a luncheon served at noon, washing up the dishes and setting things in order when the meal is over. In the spring, she leads them into the country to gather the wild flowers that glorify the hills and fields for a few weeks. These are carefully pressed, and, under her eye, arranged upon cards inscribed, "Flowers from the Holy Land," and sold during the tourists' season as souvenirs of the visit. The sales of these and other articles do not meet the expenses of materials and food, unless the number of visitors be unusually large. In an ordinary season, the class is kept up at a loss. What afflicts the instructress most is that she must refuse many applications from girls who wish to become pupils, would-be recruits from the ranks of the empty-handed and empty-minded, whom the busy philanthropist pities from the depths of her generous heart.

Mrs. Jamal's modesty would shrink from the title of philanthropist. She is simply living her life conscientiously, in the fear of God, and in love for her neighbor in the sphere to which she has been called. Yet I can answer for her gratitude should the proposition made by me in a former "Talk"—that some of the "Circles" in the far land in which women are surely more highly favored by heaven than in any other—would send monthly a few dollars for this quiet, practical work, be taken up in active earnest. Twenty-five dollars per month would enable the teacher to enlarge her class and increase the usefulness of what she has undertaken.

She can labor successfully where foreigners may not enter, and, being one of themselves, can brighten and better her countrywomen's lot as it now is, while gradually raising them to desire and appreciate higher things.

As before, I can, without consultation with the editors of this paper, guarantee that anything sent to their care for this purpose, will be safely forwarded.

Finally, let me thank those who have responded to the former appeal; thank them in my own name, in Mrs. Jamal's, and for the sake of the helpless, almost hopeless women who will reap the benefit of their contributions. MARION HARLAND.

her face and runs down to meet us, when we begin the ascent of the stairway.

"She will have it that we must come to see her," smiles the interpreter, introducing me in dumb show.

My new acquaintance unveils her face when we are within her door, kisses my hand and Mrs. Jamal's cheeks, and begs us to be seated upon the divan. It is covered, I note immediately, first with the conventional Turkey-red, and over this with clean, white muslin, a sort of "scrim," such as is used for window-curtains. An iron bedstead fills up one corner of the room, curtained with the same material as the divan-cover; a neat chest of drawers is in the opposite corner, and a tray set upon this holds cups, saucers, tumblers and plates. A cupboard is let into the wall; a baby is creeping over the floor.

Mrs. Jamal picks it up and kisses a face that is positively clean and almost chubby. "The youngest of our!" she interjects, between caresses and pet-names. "The mother was married at ten. Her first was born at fourteen. She is nearly twenty now. From eight until ten, she was in my school. She reads and is handy with the needle. And we have always been dear friends. Ah!" nodding and smiling to the pleased mother—"I am very proud of my scholar!"

own life to some extent. Knowing herself to be immortal and more accountable to God than to her husband for word and action, she is lifted above the beasts that perish."

It is rare to find a Moslem woman of twenty who can read or write. It is rarer to meet with a Christian woman of any age among the respectable middle classes who cannot. A teacher in a mission school told me yesterday that a wealthy Moslem, yielding to his daughter's importunities to be sent to school—education of some kind being just now a "fashionable fad" in their circle—brought them to the English lady in person, and asked that they might be instructed in needlework and music and even taught to read.

"But not to write!" he stipulated. "Women who can write will bring disgrace upon their families by sending love-letters to men who are not chosen by their parents to be their husbands. It is never safe."

Let me remark, furthermore, while my guide kneels on the floor, the shining shears moving as briskly as her kindly tongue—that jealous dread of the encroachments of the Christian religion is on the increase, not decline, among Mohammedan men. Mrs. Jamal conveyed the secret of this distrust in saying that they fear religion will make wives and daughters independent. Dr.

Persecution and Peril.

Troublous Times for Christian Missionaries in China.

RECENT letters from the scene of missionary operations in South China, convey the intelligence that the Lord's workers there are passing through a season of great peril and privation. Rev. R. H. Graves, a Baptist missionary, writes, that since the outbreak of the plague, which has carried off many thousands, the smouldering feeling of hatred to foreigners has been kindled by the sanitary regulations, and by designing men who circulate absurd stories about foreigners cutting out the hearts of the patients to make medicine, etc. As carbolic acid and other disinfectants have been used, these men have posted placards everywhere in the country, as well as in the city, stating that the foreigners are distributing scent bags with the object of killing off the people, and that all who smell them will die within three days. The wily priests, too, taking advantage of the panic, circulate stories among the people, saying that the wrath of the gods has come upon them because of the preaching of Jesus, and the only way to stop the plague is to drive out the missionaries and extirpate the native Christians. Two ladies of the United Brethren mission, at Honam, near Canton, were attacked. A Baptist chapel at Shiu Hing was stoned. Virulent placards against foreigners are posted up in the streets of the town.

Independently of the plague, the Chinese seem bent upon persecuting the Christians. At Peng Loh, in Kwong Sai the Christians, some twenty in number were trying to build a little meeting house for themselves, when the authorities forbade them. At Peng Nam, an old native Christian brother was beaten and his wife dragged before the magistrate, and two Bible colporteurs were badly beaten and plundered. Miss Hartwell, a missionary, held a rented house against Chinese rioters, who tried to drive her out of the village by stoning the house and breaking in the roof. On appealing to the magistrate he waited two weeks and then sent a most offensive proclamation, intended to inflame rather than quiet the people, saying that although her object was to inveigle the women and girls to Hong Kong and sell them for immoral purposes, etc., yet he must not drive her out as she was sent by her king, who was at peace with China, to carry on this work. Of course she would not post up such a paper at her door, and her firmness secured a better paper. These things show the animus of the ruling classes in China.

In Hainan, a building under erection by the Presbyterian mission was attacked at night, the work was stopped and the property seized by some of the literati under instructions from the Taotai, the highest official on the island.

Rev. Edward S. Little, a Methodist clergyman, writes: "The Government and the majority of the officials, and the literary men, have one ambition, and that is to revert to the former custom, shut up the empire, and rigidly exclude all foreigners. It is needless to say that this cannot be accomplished, and the sooner the Chinese make up their minds to this the better. One official—the infamous Cheo Han—the instigator of the fire and bloodshed of 1891, is still at large and at work. Foreign governments attempted to have him suppressed. The officials replied that he had gone mad, that he had fled from his home, and so on. Western governments believed this, and nothing had been done to punish the ferocious outbreaks of 1891, or to prevent their recurrence. The riots and murders of foreigners that have occurred since then are sufficient proof of this. Cheo Han has remained all the time in his home at Chang Sha, and has recommenced with great vigor his attack on Christianity and foreigners. The blasphemous lampoons, defaming Christ and representing the Church as guilty of the most outrageous barbarities, are being again circulated in vast quantities, and with them many new ones. Some urge the people to rise and murder all foreigners and burn their property, and as an encouragement it is stated that foreigners are utterly powerless to defend themselves or to retaliate, so there is no danger and nothing to be feared. The Government knows all this, and by allowing it to proceed under its protection, in the face of all Western protests, shows that it approves."

1. We bless Thy name, O Lord, While in Thy house we meet,
2. Thro' all our fleet-ing years, Thy word has been our stay,
3. Do Thou our love in-spire; And still our faith in-crease;
4. In all our com-ing days, O still our ref-uge be,

To lift our grate-ful hearts to Thee, And wor-ship at Thy feet.
It brought us safe with-in the fold, When we were far a-way.
Con-firm our hopes and keep us, Lord, In bonds of per-fect peace.
And may we all in sim-ple faith, Cling clos-er un-to Thee.

We bless Thy name, O Lord, For Thy pro-tection care,

That gives to us with joy a-gain, This hallowed hour of prayer.

Through the length and breadth of the land, Christian preachers, native and foreign, have traveled and told of a Saviour from sin and an uplifter of the human race. Millions of books and tracts have been scattered broadcast. All this is working in the minds of the people. It is impossible that a great people like this shall come into a new life, except with great struggles. Armed force for the propagation of the Gospel is never dreamed of, but the firm arm of law ought to guarantee to every creature on the globe this right.

PRAYER QUICKLY ANSWERED.

A servant girl who had been converted, and was striving to serve her heavenly Master in her earthly duties, was greatly distressed because she had no Bible, nor had she money to buy one. Her mistress lent her a Bible whenever she wished it, but she longed to possess one of her very own, over which she could pore in her spare moments and in which she could mark the passages that had been specially blessed to her. So she thought the quickest and surest way to get what she desired was to ask God for it. She prayed to her Father to give her a copy of his blessed Word. It did not come that night, and all the next day passed, and still no Bible came. Could the Lord not have heard the prayer? Or having heard it was he too busy to answer it? About nine in the evening, her mistress called, "Mary!" "Yes ma'am." "Go along to Miss Y—'s, she was cleaning out some old cupboards last night and came upon a large school Bible, for which she has no use, and which she thought would do for you. If you will go along you will get it." Here was the answer to her prayer. God had heard her, and was quick to answer her.

THE TOUCH OF A HAND.

Some rude children in Madagascar were one day calling out, "A leper! A leper!" to a poor woman who had lost all her fingers and toes by the dread disease. A missionary lady who was near by, put her hand on the woman's shoulder and asked her to sit down on the grass by her. The woman fell sobbing, overcome by emotion, and cried out, "A human hand has touched me. For seven years no one has touched me!"

The missionary lady says that at that moment it flashed across her mind why it is repeatedly recorded in the Gospels that Jesus touched the lepers. That is just what others would not do. It was the touch of sympathy as well as healing power. Jesus will touch one as no other power can if he is only permitted to. Has he touched your heart? Christ will enter into full fellowship with you, if you will let him.

THREE JUDGMENT DAYS.

The Judgment of Service, Judgment of Nations and the Final Judgment.

BY REV. MARMADUKE WASHINGTON.

PROPHECY indicates that there will be three judgments in the future. There is first that which I will call the judgment of the believers. In 11 Cor. 5: 10, "For we must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ," etc. The meaning of the Greek word is "the award seat." It is not a seat on which the judge of the assize sits—no penal judgment—but one of reward or loss. It is referring to the chair on which the president of the Olympian games sat to decide the winner in the contest. The loser does not lose his head, does not lose his life, but he loses his crown—his reward. And so this judgment is one of reward or loss. This is for us who are members of Christ's body, not for all mankind, as you will see in the context; Paul is writing to the saints, who are characterized by certain marks which distinguish them as saints of God. The apostle again refers to this judgment of rewards in 1 Cor. 9: 27—"Lest by any means when I have preached unto other I myself might become a castaway." The word in the Greek means dishonored—not that I should be lost in the sense of my soul being lost, but that I should lose my crown, my reward. It is also referred to in 1 Cor. 3: 11, 12, where a believer having got upon the foundation, sets up a faulty building of wood and stubble. That is work carried out in the energy of the flesh and not of the Holy Ghost. If you and I do any work—preach the Gospel, teach in the Sunday School or anything else—in order to please ourselves or to please others, we are building upon the foundation a building of wood and stubble. It may please the world, but if it is done with that motive, it is not acceptable to the Lord, and will be all burnt up when he comes. This, then is the first judgment of the future. We are not told that this decision will take place when he first comes in the air but I cannot conceive that the Lord will defer it. I feel sure that he will give the rewards as soon as he can.

The next great day of the future is called "The day of the Lord." It is referred to in Zechariah 14: 3, 4, where we are told that his feet—the feet of the once rejected Messiah—shall stand upon the Mount of Olives. In Ezekiel 21: 27, we have these remarkable words, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." The first overturn was under Assyria, the second under the Romans, and the third will be the Antichrist—the man of sin—when our Lord will descend upon the Mount of Olives, when, in Joel we are told, he will plead with the nations on account of his ancient people, and his judgment-seat will be set up in the valley of Jehoshaphat. Take this with the 25th of Matthew, where we read, "When the Lord shall come in his glory . . . and shall sit upon the throne of his glory, and shall gather the living nations and shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep. And to those on the right hand he shall say, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Now whatever spiritual application we may make on this passage, the interpretation, I believe, refers to God's heritage, the Jews, and he will judge the people upon their treatment of them. We see then the judgment of the nations which will take place on that day is that of those living on the earth when the Lord descends.

The third great day of the future is the day of final judgment. This is a most solemn day. In Rev. 20: 11, 12 we read, "And I saw a great white throne and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them; and I saw the dead small and great stand before God," etc. It will not be a great assize, but a simple pronouncement of judgment. We are on our trial now. The evidence is being all taken down now, but then the books will be opened and the evidence read and the judgment will be pronounced. God the Father judges no man, but that is committed to his Son, who will sit upon the great white throne as the Son of Man. But to those who would have nothing to do with him in life, he will be the Almighty Son of God. Not one will be passed over. God will bring every wicked one into judgment—all the deeds of darkness done in this great city, every secret thing, good or bad.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning September
2. John 2: 13-17; 17: 11-17.

CHRIST'S conception of his Church in its relations with the world is remarkable for its boldness and sublime confidence. It was to be in the world, but not of the world. It was to be pure in the midst of corruption, to be righteous in the midst of wickedness, a light in a dark place. Not a fortress barricaded and barred for the safety of those within, but a garrison operating on the surrounding country. Monasteries and nunneries are concrete misconceptions of Christ's ideal. Asceticism was far removed from his nature as he wished it to be from that of his followers. He would spend days and nights in solitude, but he came from it to mingle with men and to attend a marriage feast. On the mountain-top a cloud enveloped him and he talked with heavenly visitors, but he came down to heal the demoniac and to go on with his work of teaching and healing. The Christian statesman, the Christian lawyer, the Christian merchant, the Christian clerk or domestic servant may fulfil his ideal, and perhaps more completely than the Christian minister. He would have his followers do the world's work, yet keep themselves from the world's principles. He knew perfectly how difficult it would be to do that, but he assured them that his grace would be sufficient to the task. There was to be no lowering of the standard, no concession to the world, but an inflexible adherence to his principles while associating with the world. History shows the alternations of the character of the struggle. At times the world has hated the Church and persecuted it, and at other times it has petted and caressed it. At times the church has boldly taken its stand for right and truth at the cost of favor and popularity, and at other times it has yielded to the evil surrounding it and has become worldly. The problem has always been to influence without being influenced, to impart life to the sick without suffering from contagion. And as with the Church, so with the individual. The true disciple of Christ is so filled with his spirit that his aims and hopes and purposes are unworldly. He does not need to ask if he may have this or that indulgence, may join in this or that amusement without forfeiting his position in the Church. He is seeking higher things, and his real life is hidden with Christ in God. He is a positive power to influence others, and must never be a negative nature to turn this way or that by the influence of others. He is to show by his life that Christ is sufficient for him, giving him all the joy he desires and supporting him in sorrow and trial. In that way, better than any other, he can show what the religion of Christ is, and what it is able to do for any man who takes it for himself.

A GRATEFUL MESSAGE.

Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, whose illness prevented his attendance at the recent convention at Cleveland, has issued the following message of thanks to sympathizing friends: Dr. Clark wishes to express his profound thanks, through "The Golden Rule," to the many, many friends who have remembered him in his illness. He has received scores of telegraphic messages and letters from all parts of the country, expressing love and sympathy, and he has come to know, as he could not otherwise have learned, the affectionate interest of a multitude of Endeavorers and Christian people of all ages. Even the sad disappointment and loss of the convention, to which he had been looking forward so long, was mitigated by the loving and hopeful words.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BUILDING, HONOLULU, HAWAII.

Dr. Clark is taking complete and absolute rest on the coast of Maine, and is not allowed for the present to write letters, so that his friends will not think it strange if they do not receive immediate answers to their kind messages. But he is already beginning to improve, and we confidently believe that in a few weeks he will be able to take up his work for the Endeavor cause.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN HONOLULU.

It is gratifying to learn that in the new Republic of Hawaii the Young Men's Christian Association is a flourishing institution. On this page is a picture of its building in Honolulu, the capital, which is taken from a photograph kindly sent to us by Mr. Walter Lee, of that city. The building is entirely free of debt, and an effort is being made to add a thoroughly equipped gymnasium to its present advantages. The roll of membership, according to the latest report, was 274. A considerable number of young men who were formerly members have recently removed to the United States and other lands, but many new names have been added to the list since the report was issued, and the Association is constantly growing in popularity among the young men of the city. A well-furnished reading room is an attractive feature of the Association. The visitors' book shows that last year the average number of visitors was more than a hundred and fifty a day. Several educational classes have been organized, which have an aggregate membership of 107. The religious meetings are made the main feature of the Association's work, and these are largely attended. They are not confined to the Association itself, but are of an aggressive character designed for evangelical progress in the city. A service is regularly held by the members in the military barracks, and another service in the city prison, both of which have been instrumental in the conversion of many souls. A service is also conducted every Saturday evening in the Bethel Hall. Beside these, the Association has a regular organized system of visitation of the vessels in the harbor, and no ship of any nationality sails away that does not carry tracts or other religious literature, the gift of the association to sailors. No less than 17,780 such silent messengers of truth were distributed last year by the the association among the toilers of the deep. The list of lectures, temperance concerts and other entertainments also shows how active and enterprising a body the young men of the Association are. A flourishing boys' auxiliary is connected with the Association which among its other good work supports a native boy in the Kamehameha school. A new impulse has been given lately to the Association's activities by the election of Mr. D. W. Corbett as General Secretary. He is extremely dinners and 148 baskets of provisions, besides several barrels of clothing to needy districts. They also furnished a room in the new building of the Young Women's Christian Association. Other methods of work with a more distinctively spiritual bearing have been adopted by several circles in addition to their philanthropic labors. One circle has been sending letters to the women prisoners in the Penitentiary and also contributing funds to aid the discharged prisoners to go to their homes or to obtain work by which they can earn an honest livelihood. Another Circle supports a district nurse; another a Bible reader and another a lady missionary in India. The Order in Pennsylvania is evidently a very busy body of ladies, who are doing Christ's work on earth with devotion and intelligent helpfulness. It now numbers nearly five thousand members.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

There is a flourishing Epworth League of twenty-six members at Maza, N. Dak., where one year ago there was no Methodist organization of any kind.

The Missouri Epworth Leagues held their annual Convention this year at Pertle Springs. The report showed 210 Leagues, 8,400 members, as contrasted with fifty Leagues and 2,000 members a year ago.

The Epworth League in Singapore is doing effective work among the Chinese and Malays.

The Baptist Young People of the Tabernacle Church, Milwaukee, have undertaken charge of the special service on one Sunday evening of every month.

The Kansas City Christian Endeavor Union is earnestly prosecuting its vigorous good-citizenship fight. It is battling bravely against the saloons, the lotteries and bad politics.

One of the Junior district Christian Endeavor superintendents of Florida, has given good proof of her devotion and enthusiasm by starting a society nearly thirty miles from her home and by walking out to lead its meeting until some one else could be secured to take her place as leader.

During the past year the Christian Endeavor movement in England has spread largely among the Welsh, rendering it necessary to publish portions of the Christian Endeavor literature in that language.

The following additions to the Board of Managers of the Baptist Young People's Union were made at the Toronto Convention: Jesse A. Baldwin, Prof. Ira M. Price, Rev. L. A. Crandall, D.D., Rev. P. S. Henson, D.D., Mr. N. G. Lenington, Rev. H. W. Reed, Mr. A. D. Dana, all of Chicago, and Mr. O. P. Coshov for Oregon.

A classification of delegates to the Toronto B.Y.P.U. was made with the following results: From the department of the Gold: Massachusetts, 170; New York, 410; Pennsylvania, 462; Ohio, 248; Michigan, 372; Indiana, 121; Illinois, 378. Total 2,497. From the Blue—Iowa, 43; Nebraska, 34; Minnesota, 30; South Dakota, 24; Kansas, 21; Colorado, 12. Total, 178. From the Green—Maryland, 99; Virginia, 29; Kentucky, 22; Mississippi, 21; Arkansas, 14; Texas, 32; South Carolina, 61; Georgia, 25; District of Columbia, 13. Total, 337. From the Red—Quebec, 25; New Brunswick, 6; Nova Scotia, 54; Manitoba, 2; Prince Edward Island, 6; British Columbia, 1; Ontario, 2,427. Total, 2,521. Specials—India, 1; China, 2; Palestine, 1; England, 2. Grand Total, 5,539.

THE PENNSYLVANIA CIRCLES.

The annual report just issued of the King's Daughters in Pennsylvania shows that the Order is flourishing in that State, and is prosecuting its work on the Christlike plan. During the winter's distress the five hundred circles scattered through the State were busy with relief work, one circle helping another and contributing to the necessities of those whose energies were overtaxed. The circles of one church alone sent out $500 in money, 1500 articles of clothing, eight tons of coal, one hundred

Our Children's Bathing Hour.

Days of Pure Enjoyment for the Young Folks at Mont Lawn.

URING these beautiful August days, our young folks at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack-on-the-Hudson are in the height of their midsummer enjoyment. Over 800 have now spent a ten days' vacation at this pleasant retreat, the largest number in the Home at any one time being 149.

As the applications continue to increase, care has to be exercised not to unduly overcrowd the Home; but the pressure has been so great that additional beds have had to be procured and set up in the dormitories, so that the utmost limit of capacity may now be said to be reached. For every vacancy there are over ten applications, and if there were a thousand beds they could be very speedily filled.

A question that occasioned no little thought for a time was as to bathing facilities; for, as everybody knows, boys and girls, whether raised in city or country, dearly love a frolic in the water. At first it was very difficult to secure a sufficient space on the Hudson river front for bathing purposes, but finally the Nyack Country Club, of which Capt. D. A. Nesbitt, Company B, Seventh Regiment, is the President, kindly placed at our disposal the conveniences of the club on the river front. Now, every week day, the children enjoy their bracing dip, twenty-five boys going down to the river in the forenoon and a like number of girls in the afternoon, always in charge of some responsible adult who is able to keep them out of danger. The bathing-place is entirely safe, however. On a recent occasion all the boys at the Home—some sixty in number—were taken down to bathe at once, and had such a frolic in the water as will not soon be forgotten. Our photograph gives a glimpse of the scene. All the girls took their turn the same afternoon—nearly seventy of them romping and splashing, laughing and racing in the water, to the amusement of the grown-ups who went along as escort and safe-guards.

All the children are remarkably well-behaved, and fully appreciate the advantages they are enjoying while they pass their ten days' vacation at Mont Lawn. They never weary of talking about the kindness they experience there; it seems so much of a change from the routine of their dull and hapless lives at home. And rosy cheeks, sparkling eyes, mirth and activity everywhere testify to the physical benefit they are receiving. One feature that had to be developed more largely than was originally intended was the supply of clothing and shoes. Probably fifty suits for boys and girls have been given to the children during the last month, and about an equal number of pairs of shoes. Then the girls are taught to be tidy, and it is now a cause for reproach if there is a rip in the dress or a button missing.

To the new-comer, the Home is at first a marvel and a thing to be gazed at and looked about with undisguised delight.

assist in keeping the Home in that remarkably clean condition which invariably excites pleasant comment from those who visit it.

Strive to Live at Your Best.

"Don't try to do a great thing," writes Rev. F. B. Meyer. "You may waste all your life waiting for the opportunity that will never come. Do the little things. To fulfil faithfully the duties of your station; to use to the uttermost the gifts of your ministry; to bear chafing annoyances and trivial irritations as martyrs bore the pillory and stake; to find the one noble trait in people that try and molest you; to put the kindest construction on unkind acts and words; to love with the love of God even the unthankful and evil; to be content to be a fountain in the midst of a wild valley of stones, nourishing a few lichens and wild flowers, or now and again a thirsty sheep; and to do this always, and not for the praise of man, but for the sake of God—this makes a great life for man, woman or child."

"Pleasing Mother."

It is a universal truth that mothers are specially pleased with the successes of their children. A mother watches the successive steps and efforts of her children as only a mother can. If they succeed in their callings, she rejoices as no one can. If chil-

OUR YEARS.

Our years are like the shadows
O'er sunny hills that fly,
Or grasses in the meadows,
That blossom but to die:
A sleep, a dream, a story
By strangers quickly told,
An unremaining glory
Of things that soon are old.

O Thou, who canst not slumber,
Whose light grows never pale,
Teach us aright to number
Our years before they fail.
On us thy mercy lighten,
On us thy goodness rest,
And let thy spirit brighten
The hearts thyself hath blest.

THE WOODS IN AUGUST.

THE many flowers heralding the approach of summer, writes Ella Connor Ferris—the violets, buttercups, sweet williams, blue-bells and daisies—are gone long ago, save some tardy arrival that looks up with wondering eye at its own loneliness; but the later flowers, fewer in number, more than compensate in their brilliancy of coloring for the earlier flower treasures. The golden-rod pluming every fence-corner, every roadside, with its gay golden head nodding so cheery a welcome, flaming out its vivid yellow, truly gorgeous in its brightness, seems to have appropriated a stray bit of sunshine, and to have adapted it, by some mysterious process, to the gilding of its own petals. A wild rose, clinging tenaciously, with its gnarled, crooked branches to a steep, shelving hillside, is covered with dainty pink blossoms, which, with their centres like golden eyes, gaze up at the sun most undauntedly, seeming to revel in his every ray, no matter how piercing. The appearance of its fairy foliage and mass of rosy bloom is a never-failing source of pleasant surprise, as the barren, clayey soil always looks so incapable of producing such loveliness.

How many shades of green the mosses show! One little patch at the foot of a giant tree looking like a piece of green velvet; another in all shades of brown, with leaves like tiny umbrellas, under which the fairies might dance; another minute bit, so new that its color is nearly as much gold as green, shows delicate filaments of one flower; while a flat, gray rock jutting a little way above the bed of a small brook has its rough surface nearly covered with the soft bronzy velvet of another variety.

Helpfulness.

If there be some weaker one,
Give me strength to help him on;
If a blinder soul there be,
Let me guide him nearer thee;
Make my mortal dreams come true
With the work I fain would do;
Clothe with life the weak intent,
Let me be the thing I meant;
Let me find in my employ
Peace that dearer is than joy;
Out of self to love be led,
And to heaven acclimated,
Until all things sweet and good
Seem my natural habitude.

THE BOYS' BATHING HOUR AT THE "CHILDREN'S HOME."

(Photographed Specially for "The Christian Herald.")

Each new contingent is given the pleasure of a carriage-ride on the day after arrival. Some odd bits of character peep out in the letters written by the children to their parents at home. "We sca'sely does nothin' but pray and eat," one little lad wrote home to his mother lately. Poor boy! Prayer and plenty of good food had doubtless been strangers to him, until he came to the Home.

Nobody is idle at the Home unless sick, and as there are no sick, it follows that all are busy. The only trouble experienced from the beginning was the accident to a little boy who fractured his arm, but who, after having it fully restored has been returned to his home safe and sound. Every day some of the children are set tasks of helpfulness such as house-cleaning, mending, etc. The result of this policy is that every child is anxious to be useful and to dren appreciate the concern that is felt for them, and the earnest desire for their success that follows them everywhere by their mothers, they would care vastly more about pleasing them than is often the case. Pleasing mother should be a habit with children. Early in life they should begin the cultivation of thought and effort with reference to the gratification of her wishes and of making her happy. If they would do this they would find daily opportunities for speaking kind words, and rendering of such helpful services and of showing noble traits of character in dealings with others, as would gladden the heart and lighten the cares of mother in a way too often little thought of. If boys, if girls, could but realize their indebtedness to their mothers, they certainly would generally be very much more anxious about pleasing them.

CHAPTER IX.
HOME ONCE MORE.

IT was morning in Nazareth.

Nestling among the hills on the south of Lebanon, Esdraelon stretching wide and far, lay the city.

The sun, shining over the waving cedars, brightening the quiet streets through which the shepherds were, at that hour leading their herds and flocks to the pasture-lands beyond, gave the city that peculiar charm which scarcely ever fails after long absence to make one's native place more dear, to call back the pretty scenes of childhood. It did not fail with Zerola: she felt its strange power. She was now walking along a street where years ago some few beside herself had seen Jesus give a cup of cold water to a slave. Perhaps the prince—for so he proved to be—may have seen in after times the cross that now marked the spot where he had lain in chains and shown his wordless gratitude. For to the followers of the Nazarene the cross, being so significant of sacrifice and self-devotion, had become the emblem of their religion.

Zerola saw it as she passed thinking, "The sky was dark then, but now all is bright; and hope, ever cheering, still leads me on. Again in Palestine: what glad, what holy thoughts its hills and lakes suggest. Again in Nazareth, again to help my mother,—again to meet my lover."

She hastened through the olive-groves, past the flat-roofed houses, of which the city mainly consisted, varied here and there by a pyramid roof or less frequently by a dome.

And as the girl, now a woman, walked along the winding streets the people seemed to remember a bearing and a countenance not unknown.

Soon she stood before her home, and in a moment was walking quickly up the path to the house. There were the same flowers, the stars of Bethlehem and the lilies, struggling to lift their white and purple blossoms from out the foliage growing so green and tangled in the shadows of the old date-palm standing just in front of the door.

Four years in prison—now on the very threshold of home!

Should she go in immediately, or wait a moment and see if mother would come out?

She waited, then entered; hurried through each room, glanced anxiously around, and in an instant realized it all—the house was deserted, desolate!

"My father, my mother have gone," she said aloud, half shrinking from the words. "O, God, tell me where are they! O where is Thæon?"

But this was not the utterance of despair—no, rather of decision. Such circumstances as the above only make weak natures still weaker. Zerola was made stronger. She arose quickly and went out through the door of the carpenter shop behind the house, without, however, hearing the front door open at the same moment and a man enter.

Walking through the garden this time she did not fail to observe its particularly untended and deserted appearance; and yet the very wildness of the foliage gave it a certain beauty which is not always rivalled by the most careful culture. Sitting down not far from the date-palm to consider what course had better be pursued, the girl fancied she heard within the house footsteps, but dismissed the idea as one of her own imagination; and Paul, for the man was none other than the great apostle, little thought the was so near Zerola.

He had sought tidings of her wherever he had gone, but hitherto had learned nothing. Of all the Christians whom before his conversion he had been the means of leading to imprisonment and death, none was regretted more deeply than Zerola. Her kinship with the Master he loved and served so faithfully probably originated the feeling. There was a pathos, too, about the act of mercy and love that she was doing when she was seized which appealed to Paul now as it did not at the time. He understood now that what she did was done in his name, and that she was serving him and following in his footsteps as she carried the cup of water to that poor dying man. Paul also feared from what he had learned of the character of Karmes since that time that he had handed the girl over to a fate worse than death. It was a cruel thing—this thing that he had done in his blind zeal. Among the long list of cruelties that his conscience reproached him with this of Zerola seemed the deepest dyed. "I am not worthy to be called an apostle," he wrote in his old age, "because I persecuted the Church of God." Mercy and forgiveness he had but he grieved sorely. A lesson to all persecutors in all times, who may learn from it how easily prejudice blinds the eyes and how wrong one may be at the moment when we are most sure of being right. Paul could not be near Nazareth without going to the house from which he had snatched the brightest jewel, to ask of the family if any tidings of Zerola had been obtained.

The emptiness of the house did not oppress Paul as it had oppressed Zerola. He had seen the family but a year before, while to Zerola no tidings had come for more than four years. He waited awhile, and then went out to ascertain if any one in the village knew where Mary was or when she would return. He learned there of her journey into Egypt, and that even then she was expected. He resolved to wait in Nazareth that night and to visit the house again before nightfall.

Zerola could take no such measures. She dreaded making inquiries. What might she not hear? Mary might be dead. Thæon might be dead. She would know all to-morrow. It would be too much for her to bear it to-day in her weak and wearied condition. She would wait and rest bearing the suspense as best she could, rather than learn a truth that might crush her. In this she showed her weakness as well as her strength. Few can bear suspense without fretting and distress, but Zerola knew that all things were in the hands of God and that nothing could come upon her without his consent. She would gather strength by waiting, her faith would strengthen its hold on him and she would learn to say as her Lord had said in the moment of his greatest agony, "Thy will be done." But her physical weakness was also betrayed by her decision. The shock of evil news was a thing to be dreaded in her frail state for Zerola felt that her long imprisonment had left her very frail. Yes; on all grounds it was wise to wait and to-morrow she would have strength to hear the worst.

It was now nearing noon; scarcely a cloud was in the sky. The heat was becoming very oppressive. Zerola, fairly exhausted by her long wearisome journey, lay down to rest awhile. And very soon she fell asleep.

Fortunately, only the comparatively few who have been dwellers in a Roman prison of the first century, have had that experience which would enable one even to picture indistinctly the dreams which would naturally present themselves to the mind of a girl so recently and strangely liberated. Indeed very few have ever been in such a prison as Zerola. Therefore it will readily appear that sleep in a place like this was what she now most needed.

That very hour a woman riding on a camel might have been seen coming through the olive groves on the slopes of Nazareth towards the city. She was hastening anxiously onward, scarcely pausing to look left or right. As she passed through the streets the respect of the people for her seemed almost to have the depth of reverence. Her very dignity added that charm of repose to her beauty which made them feel her countenance was but the expression of the soul within. She, too, saw the Cross; but with what thoughts we may but faintly know.

For the reader will have seen that the woman was Mary the mother of Zerola.

After dismounting and securing the camel, she soon was walking up the path to her home. The lilies, the stars of Bethlehem and all the flowers seemed more lovely now. Mary felt and heard the golden messages trembling on the golden sunbeams, and whispering from the tender petals of the blossoms. For there are moments when the soul seems to be drifting on a dark though fear-lit sea, and then it will cling to the frailest spar.

She was now about to open the door, but changed to glance around.

"Surely that is a girl," she said, crossing to where the sleeper lay, "perhaps the daughter of some exiled prince, perhaps the lost one of some poor peasant. Some day my own child may lie even as this one,—would God that I might be the one to find her! But, whoever this may be, she is a child of our Father who is in heaven."

Four years in a dungeon produce many changes and Mary's eye's were grown dim more from weeping than from age.

The woman knelt beside her, saying as she brushed the hair from the girl's brow, "I know, my child, thou hast a mother once—if thou hast not now." And Mary took her in her arms, and kissed her—kissed her with a mother's kiss.

Zerola awoke.

Her eyes met Mary's. Those were piercing looks, of amazement, almost fear; then of recognition! looks of love!

And together the mother and daughter looked to that God who sees the tears of the fatherless and hears the widow's cry. And as they prayed each felt the holy calm of God's eternal love—for both were saying: "O, Father, thy will be done."

Thus the long-sought reunion of mother and daughter solemnized when it came the souls of both. Their feelings were too deep to find expression in any way other than in the most solemn of all forms known to the human race, the act of communion with the Deity. All the long pent-up grief of the mother's heart, the mourning of those four long years, the deep yearning of her soul for her precious treasure, strove together for utterance in passionate thankfulness to God for his love and kindness. Zerola, too, as she clung to her mother in the embrace that she had pictured to herself again and again in the gloomy dungeon in Rome and on the deck of the ship as it crossed the Mediterranean could find no words to relieve her heart but words of prayer and praise. Oh, there is no love between mortals so close and so tender as the love which leads both to the feet of Christ. When the hearts of two human beings are one in him, they are drawn closer to each other by their being one in their supreme devotion. It was so with mother and daughter on that day in the Nazareth home. Of the trivialities of ordinary life neither could speak. The moment was too thrilling, the joy of reunion too sacred for aught but the outpouring to God of the emotion of both their hearts. So the two women knelt and prayed, their arms about each other's necks and their faces beautiful in youth and maturity turned heavenward with a radiant light beaming from them as of a reflected glory.

Meanwhile the apostle had returned and was walking through the garden. As he drew near they heard his footsteps, and turning around saw and recognized him. Zerola drew back, but Mary, with the forgiveness of a Nazarene, advancing took his hand and led him to her daughter. Her words were few, but they told enough.

When she had finished speaking, Paul spoke to Zerola. But it was with the voice of a man across whose pathway in life has fallen some dark shadow. He looked upon the ground, saying in his very heart: "God, be merciful to me a sinner." Then he felt a tender hand take his, and raising his eyes they met Zerola's; and there was that in touch and voice and look which said, "The past is all forgotten, forgiveness lights the future."

"You have suffered much, I fear," Paul said. "I, too, have suffered on your account. I did you a wrong but it was in blindness and unbelief. I knew not what I did. Beyond measure I persecuted the people of God and harassed them. You have heard how my eyes were opened and that now I preach Jesus whom then I scorned. On that fatal morning when I caused you to be seized and sold into slavery, I had caused the death of one bright youth who might, had he lived, have been my helper now. He died a martyr's death as I shall die when my work is done. It is a cause worth dying for, but I want to live on that I may carry into the farthest regions of the earth the story of the Cross. I am glad that you forgive me all the misery I caused you. It is sweet to forgive and to be forgiven and you show that you are truly your Lord's as you forgive me. May the grace of Christ be upon you more and more richly and fill you with all joy and peace in him."

Zerola bowed her head humbly as the concluding words of benediction were uttered by the great Apostle. "I thank you," she said. "I heard from Corbulo and Corthene in Rome how great is the service you have rendered to our Lord, and how you have suffered for him, and have braved death to spread the news of his life and teaching through the lands of darkness. It is good to be blessed by one who has proved so faithful and valiant a servant of my Lord." She held out her hand, and Paul took it in his own as she added, "We are made one by the love we bear him."

Looking at Mary, Zerola then asked, "Mother, where is Thæon?"

Paul turned and walked away. In their conversation about the martyr, they had not mentioned his name. The apostle was filled with remorse. What a crime his bigotry had led him to commit! What sorrow he had brought to this home! Mary and Zerola had forgiven him: God had forgiven him. But he could not forgive himself. A small nature might easily have done so; but Paul's was large, noble.

When Mary answered her daughter's question she thought Paul was out of hearing, but as he walked away he caught the words:

"Zerola, when thou didst take the cup of cold water to the martyr on that morning in Jerusalem, it was to Thæon . . . that thou wast carrying it. Daughter thy lover—is—dead."

Suddenly becoming as if lifeless, the girl fell upon the ground, overwhelmed with that sorrow which can be felt only by one who has learned to truly love with all the fervor of a woman's heart. Mary, quickly kneeling beside her, took her in her arms and carried her to the house where in years gone by they had all lived so happily. And pressing her to her bosom she prayed as never before.

Had she found her beloved daughter only to lose her at a stroke? Zerola's face looked like the face of the dead. The mother mourned over her and labored to bring life back to the beautiful form. Zerola thought she had schooled herself to say, "Thy will be done," but as she heard that Thæon was dead, her heart seemed to cease beating, all around had grown dim, and she remembered no more. But the young life, even in so delicate a frame as Zerola's, does not easily yield itself under a mental shock. It was only a swoon, and Mary's efforts were rewarded after some minutes with the returning color in the pale cheeks that showed the blood was once more circulating in her veins. She did not hasten returning consciousness, realizing that the desolation would come on her child with renewed weight, and that this oblivion was merciful.

At last Zerola's lustrous eyes looked up piteously into her face. "Mother," she said, "Is that true? Is that true, that you told me? Is Thæon really lost to me forever? O, mother, I loved him very tenderly. Shall I never see him again?"

"Not on earth, my child," Mary replied sadly. "But we sorrow not as those who have no hope. There can be no parting forever between souls who are trusting in our Lord. You remember his words to Martha? They have comforted us often: we thought of you and of others. 'I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth on me though he were dead, yet shall he live.'"

"Yes, mother, I do not forget, but it is very hard." Zerola was feeling the bitterness that every soul feels in bereavement however firm its faith in the resurrection. Oh, for one hour of her Lord's presence! Oh, for the sound of that voice which spoke by the tomb of Lazarus, by the bedside of the daughter of Jairus, and by the bier outside the gate of Nain. Like Martha, the young heart wailed, "If thou hadst been here he would not have died." Who can wonder that even her mother's presence in which she had pined could not fill the void caused by the loss of Thæon. The day was coming when she would learn that she had not lost him, that he was living and longing for her; but now she must taste the bitterness of death and must drain the cup of sorrow to the dregs.

The Moody Gospel Fund.

still Progressing and the Outlook for the Work Brightening Daily.

MANY letters of encouragement have been received during the past week, enclosing contributions for the Moody Gospel Fund, and invoking the divine blessing upon the work. Much interest has been felt in the letters from former students at the Bible Institute, in which grateful testimony was given showing the value of the training they had received, and how it had been the means of opening up avenues of spiritual usefulness in their evangelistic labors.

Mr. Moody's appeal has moved many of our readers and their friends as no other appeal could have done, and they are vying with each other in the determination to have a share in the good work he is now doing. All, whether rich or poor, old or young, want to "do a little for Jesus." Some of the sacrifices made for this cause are extremely touching, and prove the goodness of heart of the generous senders more than volumes could explain. Surely He who multiplied the loaves and fishes will so abundantly bless their offerings, however small, that the increase will enable the Institute to go forward in its good work of training evangelists and missionaries to carry the Gospel to the churchless millions.

INDIA'S SACRED RIVERS.

A real cause, if not of disquiet, at least of thoughtful interest, says a correspondent, is found in India to-day, which may portend nothing less than a religious revolution. For ages the River Ganges has been accounted a sacred stream. Its waters are regarded as possessing a peculiar power of purification, and its banks, consequently, are almost everywhere lined with temples. Indeed the religion, philosophy, and even sociology of Hindostan have largely centred in "Mother Gunga," far more than those of Rome upon the Tiber, or of Egypt upon the Nile. Yet the Ganges had a rival, if never yet a successful, at least a potential one. That rival is the Nerbudda, the mighty stream, which, rising in Gundwana, flows westward along the northern border of the Deccan, to the Arabian Sea. There is a legend that Indra, the Lord of Light, with his own hand, made the passageway, between walls of snowy marble, through which its waters leap down into the broad estuary at Broach, and for this reason it has ever been reckoned a holy stream. Moreover, about a hundred years ago, there arose and spread abroad through all the land a prophecy that at a certain time the sanctity of the Ganges itself should be transferred to the Nerbudda, and the latter become supreme.

The date, explicitly stated in this prophecy, for which wide credence was obtained, was the year 1804. As that date drew nearer and nearer, belief, or at any rate expectancy, grew steadily stronger. At the present time the tension is almost indescribable. Why the change is to occur, no one can tell; nor yet how it is to be manifested, whether by some stupendous cataclysm of nature, or by a revolution of religious sentiment. Nor are there lacking, especially among the innumerable Gangetic shrines, many who dispute the correctness of the prophecy. Yet there is to-day such a state of general unrest, speculation and anxiety as has not been known in India for generations. Whether any movement of tangible form will grow out of it is an interesting question.

SWEET VOICES.

WHEN low sweet voices call to me From out the great unknown, And I the glittering towers see

Of my beloved home, I'll cast the sandals from my feet. And haste the Fatherland to greet.

When fragrant breezes waft to me

Some song unknown to earth, When time's dim hills no more I see, And as the sounds of mirth Grow fainter to my listening ears, I shall not be oppressed with fears.

And when the everlasting gate

Of heaven shall lift to me, I will not at the portal wait, But hasten in to be A "little one" of God the King, And with the "many voices" sing.

CHRISTIAN ASTRONOMY.*

I DO not know whether you can, in imagination, lean over the battlements of this little solar system, and see what there is beyond it. Do not narrow your minds to a few hundred millions of miles! If you look out for a long way indeed, you will begin to see a star. I should only be uttering meaningless words if I told you its distance from us; yet there are others, of those that we are able to see, that are almost immeasurably farther away. They have taken a deal of trouble to send us a ray of light such a vast distance, to inform us that they are getting on very well, and that, though they are at such a distance from us, they still enjoy themselves as best they can in our absence.

These stars, as the common people look at them, seem to be scattered about in the heavens, as we say, "anyhow." I always admire that charming variety; and I am thankful to God that he has not set the stars in straight lines, like rows of street-lamps. Only think, brethren, how it would be if we looked up at night and saw the stars all arranged in rows, like pins on a paper! Bless the Lord, it is not so! He just took a handful of bright worlds and scattered them about the sky, and they dropped into most most beautiful positions, so that people say, "There is the Great Bear; and, 'That is Charles's Wain,' and every countryman knows the Reaping-hook. Have you not seen it, brethren? Others say, 'That is the Virgin, and that is the Ram, and that is the Bull,' and so on.

I think that naming of the various constellations is very like a good deal of mystical preaching that there is nowadays. The preachers say, "That is so-and-so, and this is so-and-so." Well, perhaps it is so; but I do not see it. You may imagine anything you like in the constellations of the heavens. I have pictured a fortress in the fire, and watched it being built up, and seen little soldiers come and pull it all down. You can see anything in the fire, and in the sky, and in the Bible, if you like to look for it in that way; you do not see it in reality, it is only a freak of your imagination. There are no bulls and bears in the heavens. There may be a virgin, but she is not to be worshipped as the Romanists teach. I hope you all know the pole-star; you ought also to know the pointers; they point to the pole-star, and that is just what we ought to do, to direct the poor slaves of sin and Satan to the true Star of Liberty, our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ!

Then there are the Pleiades; almost anybody can tell you where they are. They are a cluster of apparently little stars, but they are intensely bright. They teach me that, if I am a very little man, I must try to be very bright; if I cannot be like Aldebaran, or some of the brightest gems of the sky, I must be as bright as I can in my own particular sphere, and be as useful there as if I were a star of the first magnitude. Then, on the other side of the globe, they look up to the Southern Cross. It is very beautiful to think of the Cross being the guide of the mariner; it is the best guide anyone can have, either this side of the tropics or the other.

There are many wonderful things to be learned about the stars, to which I hope you will give your earnest attention as you have the opportunity. Among the rest is this fact, that some stars have ceased to be visible to us. Tycho Brahe said that on one occasion he found a number of villagers looking up at the sky, and on asking them why they were gazing at the heavens, they told him that a new star had suddenly appeared. It shone brightly for a few months, and then vanished. Many times a starry world has seemed to turn red, as if it were on fire; it has apparently burned, and blazed away, and then disappeared. Kepler, writing concerning such a phenomenon, says: "What it may portend is hard to determine; and thus much only is certain, that it comes to tell mankind either nothing at all, or high and weighty news, quite beyond human sense and understanding." In allusion to the opinion of some, who explained the novel object by the Epicurean doctrine of a fortuitous combination of atoms, he remarks, with characteristic oddity, yet good sense, "I will tell these disputants—my opponents—not my opinion, but my wife's. Yesterday, when weary with writing, and my mind quite dusty with considering these atoms, I was called to supper, and a salad that I had asked for was set before me. 'It seems, then,' I said aloud, 'that if pewter dishes, leaves of lettuce, grains of salt, drops of water, vinegar, and oil, and slices of egg, had been flying about in the air from all eternity, it might at last happen, by chance, that there would come a salad.' 'Yes,' says my wife, 'but not one so nice or well dressed as this which I have made for you.'

So I should think; and if the fortuitous combination of atoms could not make a salad, it is not very likely that they could make a whole world. I once asked a man who said that the world was a fortuitous concourse of atoms, "Have you ever chanced to have no money, and to be away where you knew nobody who would give you a dinner?" He replied, "Yes, I have." "Well, then," said I, "did it ever happen to you that fortuitous concourse of atoms made a leg of mutton for you, with some nice boiled turnips, and caper sauce, for your dinner?" "No," he said, "it has not." "Well," I answered, "a leg of mutton, at any rate, even with turnips and caper sauce included, is an easier thing to make than one of these worlds, like Jupiter or Venus."

Wonderful combinations of glory and beauty may be seen in the stellar sky; and some of these stars are red, some blue, some yellow; all the colors of the rainbow are represented in them. It would be very wonderful to live in one of them, and to look across the sky, and see all the glories of the heavens that God has made. On the whole, however, for the present, I am quite content to abide upon this little planet, especially as I am not able to change it for another home, until God so wills it.

FIRST CENTURY CHRISTIANS.*

Who were the Aristobulus and the Narcissus to whom or rather, to members of their households, Paul sends salutation at the close of his letter to the Romans? Strangely enough, heathen writers tell us about an Aristobulus and Narcissus who were famous in Rome at this time. Tacitus tells us that Narcissus once a slave of the Emperor Claudius, had been set free and so served his former master in the capacity of private secretary. He is said to have had great influence over the Emperor. He had made use of his position to amass great wealth, and was one of the most important and influential men in Rome. Aristobulus was a grandson of Herod the Great, who lived mostly in Rome. He, too, possessed great influence, because of his friendships and his immense wealth. From the fact that Paul greets his kinsman Herodion in direct connection with the household of Aristobulus, it is not at all improbable that this Herodion was a member of his family. At the time that Paul wrote this letter it is not improbable that both were dead, but their slaves had passed into the hands of the Emperor Nero, and it was customary for such persons still to bear the name of their former master.

These and others mentioned in the letter all belong to the family of the Emperor, but they were only slaves. Did Christianity go no higher in the social scale in the court at Rome? Or were there Christians among the nobility, or perhaps even in the very family of Nero himself? Again we are indebted to Tacitus for a bit of interesting information. The wife of the great Roman general, Plautius, who conquered Britain, was named Pomponia Grechina. About A. D. 57 or 58 she was charged with being a convert to a foreign superstition. According to the Roman custom, her husband was ordered to try her on this charge. We have no account of the trial, but we are told that her husband pronounced her innocent. How much influence his heart exercised on his judgment we cannot tell, but probably it had much to do with her exculpation. For, in spite of the fact that she was declared innocent, the historian further tells us that the lady lived in retirement for about forty years after this, wholly given up to a gloomy religion. He does not call her a Christian, but his language is very like that used in describing Christians, who were compelled to live in retirement, shunning all society, because they did not wish to expose themselves to censure. They could not take any part in public life without either engaging in idolatrous practices, or by refusing to do so, subjecting themselves to criticism and persecution. Certain it is at any rate that some of her slaves were Christians, for their burial places have been discovered in the Christian catacombs in Rome.

But Christianity came still nearer to the throne of the Cæsars. About the year 95 the Emperor Domitian put to death his cousin, the consul Titus Flavius Clemens, on the charges of "a contemptible inactivity" and "atheism." His wife, Flavia Domitilla was at the same time, and for the same reasons, banished to an island in the Mediterranean. This Domitilla was beyond all peradventure a Christian. Her name is inseparably connected with the early history of the church at Rome. One of the many catacombs in the neighborhood of Rome bears her name and contains the graves of many of her slaves and who also became Christians. From the frequent occurrence of the names of Flavia and Flavius in the inscriptions in the catacombs, many members of the Flavian family must have become Christians. Many of these Christian graves are undoubtedly from the first century. It was not common to date the inscriptions on the graves, but we have at least three from the first century bearing dates. Christianity had a strong hold in Rome before the year 100. Everything we know of Clemens and Domitilla goes to show that they were both Christians, for these charges that were made against them are the same that were made against the Christians. One was that they refrained from any share in the affairs of State.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, Influenza and all Chest affections.

For years I have been entreated to make my remedy known in the United States, but my time has been too much absorbed by my European patients to allow this. Now, however, I have been able to extend my organization so as to bring America within the scope of my personal observation, and my desire is to make it clear to all inhabitants of the United States that they may henceforth procure from my American depot a Cure for Consumption which, even in the advanced stages of that terrible disease, may be used with certainty of relief.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

Scenes of Battle and Shipwreck—A Visit to the Royal Palace—"Trade-Gin," and "Kava"—Malietoa's Missionary Flag.

APIA, SAMOA, July 2, 1894.

A HUNDRED and sixty dead men in the angry waters: one ship sunk out of sight so that not so much as a plank or rope has since appeared: of our three great American warships lying in the harbor the Leipsic beached, the Trenton and Vandalia demolished: of the three great German men-of-war the Eber and Olga gone completely under: the Adler rolled over on its side and cracking apart amidships. Out of all the vessels in harbor only one saved, and that because it had steam-up and could sail out into the sea: three days of wreckage and fright and horror which shook the island and by report of next steamer transfixed all nations: all this a brief putting of what an antipodean hurricane did for this harbor in March, 1889. While all up and down the beach of this island are pieces of the wreckage of that unparalleled tempest, only one skeleton of a ship remains, the "Adler," sufficiently distinct to represent that scene of cyclonic infernalization. It is rather unfortunate that Samoa in the popular mind of all nations, stands as a synonym of shipwreck, for the place is as fine a specimen of foliage and fruitage as the world holds. Indeed, its harbor is the sea-captain's anxiety. For though a wide harbor it has only a small entrance, and rocks in all directions toss the white foam. The captain told us that we need not think we were left if we saw him sailing out to sea, for he would do so if a squall came up, but he would return and take us.

After more than seven days of ocean rolling without sight of ship or land the Samoan Islands greet you like A Beatific Vision.

As we came on deck this morning the waters were covered with small boats of natives bringing specimens of coral and all manner of flowers and fruits, ready to sell these and transport to shore all the passengers who chose to go. A boat belonging to the German Legation with four stout oarsmen took us three quarters of a mile to the beach. From thence we went to King Malietoa's residence. But it is a time of war. The king had fled to the forest. A few nights before he was thought to be at a village house and it was surrounded and shot into, and the king would have been slain if he had been there. The whole island is in a turmoil. We were shown the king's rooms and his pictures and bric-a-brac. The walls suggested fondness for German and English Royalty, but I found not the face of any American President or General. We saw the queen, and at the invitation of the warriors went into the guards' tent. About fifteen dusky soldiers each reclining on a pillow of round wood upheld by two small supports. A more uncomfortable pillow, it would seem to me, than that in Bethel from the foot of which Jacob saw the angels.

Each of the warriors had a gun within reach. At their invitation we sat down on a mat beside those who were sitting and in scant vocabulary talked over the Samoan troubles. We saw one soldier who had been shot in the foot, and he was limping along leaning on an assistant. Four men were killed last night in a skirmish and another skirmish is to take place to-night. There are natives who do not want to pay their taxes and their various grievances have been summed up, and a young warrior wants to get the throne and introduce the millennium. A long continued struggle is opening. Meanwhile a German and English man-of-war is in the harbor, and an American man-of-war is expected soon. What will be the result no one can prophesy. But this is certain, this island and all the group of islands are suffering from foreign interference. It is a common saying among the natives that first comes the missionary, then comes the merchant, then comes the consul, then comes the man-of-war, then, Oh my!

Why should three great nations like the English, German and American stoop to such small business as to be watching with anxious and expensive vigilance these islands for fear that this or that foreign government should get a little advantage? Better Call Home your War Ships and leave all to the missionaries. They will do more for the civilization of Samoa than all the guns that ever spoke from the sides of the world's navies. The captain of our steamer in an interesting address a few evenings ago concerning the islands of the Pacific, declared that the only movement towards civilization that amounted to anything in these islands had been made by the church. Gospel, not gunpowder. Life, not death. Bibles, not bullets.

The only movement that at this time has full swing in Samoa is "Trade-Gin." That maddens and embrates, and has given to Samoa the unsavory and unjust title of the "Hell of the Pacific." The foreign gin is helped in its work by a domestic drink called "Kava."

Tell all the Methodists that Malietoa is a Wesleyan and a consistent follower of the three worthies of Epworth, Susannah, Charles and John. Though his every drop of inherited blood is warlike, this king is a man of peace. The flag that floats over his house is a one-starred flag contrived by a missionary. Indeed the good work of the Missionaries is found wherever we go on this island. The Bible is the chief book. There are churches and schools. One of the group of islands has a college of fifty-five students in preparation for the ministry. Nearly all the inhabitants of these islands can read and write. There are no doubt enough bad people. Three ships of war lying for the most time in the harbor keep the natives familiar with the vices of more civilized nations.

At half-past six, on Sabbath morning, the church bells ring, and the people put on their best attire and assemble for worship. Again in mid-afternoon the church bells ring and the people gather. Far on into the Sunday night the Christian songs may be heard, caught up and sounded back from home to home, and from mountain to beach. There is far more than in any town or city in America of the same size. But this was not always so. From what cruelty Christian civilization has lifted it! In olden time when they conquered an enemy they broke his spine. To add to the humiliation of the defeated some of them were roasted and eaten. When a woman was candidate for marriage to some chief she was seated in the market-place for the public to decide whether she were fit for such marriage. If they decided in the negative she was clubbed to death.

They worshipped the dog, or the eel, or the turtle, or the lizard, or the shark. "Back!" cried the Christian religion to such monstrosities of behavior and all things changed.

The Samoans have not much use for clothes. I saw no fashion-plates in the windows. A tailor would starve to death in Samoa. Lack of complete physical investiture comes not from undue economy, not from pauperism, not from immorality, but originally from the fact that on these islands the climate is so mild the year round that necessity does not make inexorable demand for covering upon weavers and clothiers.

But gradually calicoes and nankeens and alpacas are coming into demand. The Samoan somewhat substitutes tattooing, which in some cases appears quite like a suit of clothes. In the boat crossing from wharf to steamer I put my hand on the knee of a Samoan and said, "You are tattooed." He replied, "Yes, that me clothes." I said, "When do you have that tattooing done?" He answered "Twenty years of age." I said, "Does it hurt?" He replied, "Oh, yes! Hurt! Swell up!" I asked, "How long does it take to have that tattooing done?" He answered, "Two months." Indeed all the men I noticed had been tattooed. It is a badge of manhood.

As we passed along the main street of the island we had a crowd after us with something to sell. To buy a flower or a shell was greatly to reinforce the number of the escorting party. The men are muscular and well formed. The children are beautiful. As to the women, every nation has its type of female beauty, and no one of another nation is competent to judge concerning it.

A NATIVE MISSION IN JAPAN.

Peculiarities and Beauties of The Land of the Rising Sun—The Great Sacred Mountain—The Light of Social and Political Progress with Spiritual Darkness—Mr. Kato's Tokyo Mission—A Native Aggressive Christian Effort.

JAPAN has for many years past been the theme of writers and artists, who have studied it with delighted interest. Its name means, in the Chinese dialect from which it is derived, the land that the sun comes from. Stretching with its contiguous islands almost from the Arctic Circle to the Tropic of Cancer, it has an endless variety of climate and weather, and an equally varied vegetation. Its surface is so broken with mountains and by the contour of the country as to leave but a comparatively small portion available for such farming as we have, but the people know how to adapt themselves to their surroundings and have made their land to blossom like a garden. Of all the mountains none possess the fascination for the visitor that there is in Fujiyama, the slumbering volcano, a picture of which appears on this page. It rears its snowy head twelve thousand feet above the sea-level, and its glorious beauty and majesty of form impress every beholder. It is not surprising that the superstitious veneration of the past times have surrounded it with sacred associations and mythical traditions, and have made it a veritable temple where thousands still go every year to worship. Its ascent has to be made on foot, and the pilgrims spend two days in making the journey, halting by the way at resting-places provided specially for their accommodation, and sleeping on the summit, that they may worship the sun at its rising.

But it is with the people, rather than with the country, that the Christian's interest is mainly concerned. The aggregate area of the four islands is only 157,000 square miles—about the size of California, yet the population is nearly forty millions. Within this generation they have suddenly revolutionized their social and political life, and have emerged from feudalism into constitutional liberty with a rapidity unknown in any other nation. It is saddening, however, to learn that while Japan has been eagerly adopting Western ideas in her government, tians in Japan is under forty thousand and, while there are only 377 Protestant churches, there are 108,112 Buddhist temples and 193,242 Shinto Shrines. But among the small number of Christians there are some whose hearts God has touched with his Spirit, and aroused to a sense of the urgent need of their country. It may interest our readers to know some facts about one of the efforts that is now being made in Japan as a result of this concern.

In one of the most densely populated districts of the great city of Tokyo, a district where trade, and manufacture, and business of all kinds create an atmosphere of their own, where life is eager and restless, and men and women of all classes congregate—a modest building is devoted to Christian work. A notice in Japanese characters, hieroglyphics to the Western visitor, but legible enough to the native, is conspicuous at its doors, notifying the passer-by that the Jesus religion is preached and explained within, every evening and many thousands of business and professional men. At night, audiences are gathered numbering from seventy to a hundred persons, and on Sundays every part of the building is occupied and over a hundred and fifty persons hear the Gospel. This building is not a church; there is no church organization and the audience is a changing one. When the same person is seen there night after night and manifests in other ways an interest in religion, he is advised to see one of the Christian missionaries in Tokyo, and if he becomes a Christian he connects himself with an organized Church. This building is an

EVERLASTING LIFE.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Micah 2: 10, "Arise ye and depart, for this is not your rest."

THIS was the drum-beat of a prophet who wanted to arouse his people from their oppressed and sinful condition: but it may just as properly be uttered now as then. Bells, by long exposure and much ringing, lose their clearness of tone; but this rousing bell of the Gospel strikes in as clear a tone as when it first rang on the air.

As far as I can see, your great want and mine is rest. From the time we enter life, a great many vexations and annoyances take after us. We may have our holidays, and our seasons of recreation and quiet, but where is the man come to mid-life who has found entire rest? The fact is that God did not make this world to rest in. A ship might as well go down off Cape Hatteras to find smooth water as a man in this world to find quiet. From the way that God has strewn the thorns, and hung the clouds, and sharpened the tusks; from the colds that distress us, and the heats that smite us, and the pleurisies that stab us, and the fevers that consume us, I know that he did not make this world as a place to loiter in. God does everything successfully; and this world would be a very different world if it were intended for us to lounge in. It does right well for a few hours. Indeed, it is magnificent! Nothing but infinite wisdom and goodness could have mixed this beverage of water, or hung up these brackets of stars, or trained these voices of rill, and bird, and ocean—so that God has but to lift his hand, and the whole world breaks forth into orchestra. But, after all, it is only the splendors of a king's highway, over which we are to march on to eternal conquests.

You and I have seen men who tried to rest here. They builded themselves great stores. They gathered around them the patronage of merchant princes. The voice of their bid shook the money markets. They had stock in the most successful railroads, and in "safety deposits" great rolls of government securities. They had emblazoned carriages, high-mettled steeds, footmen, plate that confounded lords and senators who sat at their table, tapestry on which floated the richest designs of foreign looms, splendor of canvas on the wall, exquisiteness of music rising among pedestals of bronze, and dropping, soft as light, on snow of sculpture. Here let them rest. Put back the embroidered curtain, and shake up the pillow of down. Turn out the lights! It is eleven o'clock at night. Let slumber drop upon the eyelids, and the air float through the half-opened lattice drowsy with midsummer perfume. Stand back, all care, anxiety, and trouble! But no! they will not stand back. They rattle the lattice. They look under the canopy. With rough touch they startle his pulses. They cry out at twelve o'clock at night, "Awake, man! How can you sleep when things are so uncertain? What about those stocks? Hark to the tap of that fire-bell: is it your district! How if you should die soon? Awake, man! Think of it! Who will get your property when you are gone? What will they do with it? Wake up! Riches sometimes take wings. How if you should get poor? Wake up!" Rising on one elbow, the man of fortune looks out into the darkness of the room, and wipes the dampness from his forehead, and says, "Alas! For all this scene of wealth and magnificence—no rest!"

I passed down a street of a city with a merchant. He knew all the finest houses on the street. He said, "There is something the matter in all these houses. In that one it is conjugal infelicity. In that one, a dissipated son. In that, a dissolute father. In that, an idiot child. In that, the prospect of bankruptcy." This world's wealth can give no permanent satisfaction. This is not your rest.

You and I have seen men try in another direction. A man says, "If I could only rise to such and such a place of renown; if I could gain that office; if I could only get the stand and have my sentiments met with one good round of hand-clapping applause; if I could only write a book that would live, or make a speech that would thrill, or do an action that would resound!" The tide turns in his favor. His name is on ten thousand lips. He is bowed to, and sought after, and advanced. Men drink his health at great dinners. At his fiery words the multitudes huzza! From galleries of beauty they throw garlands. From house-tops, as he passes in long procession, they shake out the national standards. Here let him rest. It is eleven o'clock at night. On pillow stuffed with a nation's praise let him lie down. Hush! all disturbing voices. In his dream let there be hoisted a throne, and across it march a coronation. Hush! Hush! "Wake up!" says a rough voice. "Political sentiment is changing. How if you should lose this place of honor? Wake up! The morning papers are to be full of denunciation. Harken to the execrations of those who once caressed you. By to-morrow night there will be multitudes sneering at the words which last night you expected would be universally admired. How can you sleep when everything depends upon the next turn of the great tragedy? Up, man! Off of this pillow!" The man, with head yet hot from his last oration, starts up suddenly, looks out upon the night, but sees nothing except the flowers that lie on his stand, or the scroll from which he read his speech, or the books from which he quoted his authorities, and goes to his desk to finish his neglected correspondence, or to pen an indignant line to some reporter, or sketch the plan for a public defense against the assaults of the people. Happy when he got his first lawyer's brief; exultant when he triumphed over his first political rival; yet, sitting on the very top of all that this world offers of praise, he exclaims, "No rest! no rest!"

The very world that now applauds will soon hiss. That world said of the great Webster, "What a statesman! What wonderful exposition of the Constitution! A man fit for any position." That same world said, after a while, "Down with him! He is an office-seeker. He is a sot. He is a libertine. Away with him!" And there is no peace for the man until he lays down his broken heart in the grave at Marshfield. Jeffrey thought that if he could only be judge, that would be the making of him; got to be judge, and cursed the day in which he was born. Alexander wanted to submerge the world with his greatness; submerged it, and then drank himself to death because he could not stand the trouble. Burns thought he would give everything if he could win the favor of courts and princes; won it, and amid the shouts of a great entertainment, when poets, and orators, and duchesses were adoring his genius, wished that he could creep back into the obscurity in which he dwelt when he wrote of the Daisy, wee modest, crimson-tipped flower.

This world for rest? "Aha!" cry the waters, "no rest here—we plunge to the sea." "Aha!" cry the mountains, "no rest here—we crumble to the plain." "Aha!" cry the towers, "no rest here—we follow Babylon, and Thebes, and Nineveh into the dust." No rest for the flowers; they fade. No rest for the stars; they die. No rest for man; he must work, toil, suffer, and slave.

Now, for what have I said all this? Just to prepare you for the text: "Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest." I am going to make you a grand offer. Some of you remember that when gold was discovered in California, large companies were made up and started off to get their fortune. To-day I want to make up a party for the Land of Gold. I hold in my hand a deed from the Proprietor of the estate, in which he offers to all who will join the company ten thousand shares of infinite value, in a city whose streets are gold, whose harps are gold, whose crowns are gold. You have read of the Crusaders—how that many thousands of them went off to conquer the Holy Sepulchre. I ask you to join a grander crusade—not for the purpose of conquering the sepulchre of a dead Christ, but for the purpose of reaching the throne of a living Jesus. When an army is to be made up, the recruiting officer examines the volunteers; he tests their eyesight; he sounds their lungs; he measures their stature; they must be just right, or they are rejected. But there shall be no partiality in making up this army of Christ. Whatever your moral or physical stature, whatever your dissipation, whatever your crimes, whatever your weaknesses, I have a commission from the Lord Almighty to make up this regiment of redeemed souls, and I cry, "Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest." Some of you have been pierced through and through. You carry the scars of a thousand conflicts, in which you have bled at every pore; and you sigh, "Oh, that I had the wings of a dove, that I might fly away and be at rest!" You have taken the cup of this world's pleasures and drunk it to the dregs, and still the thirst claws at your tongue, and the fever strikes to your brain. You have chased Pleasure through every valley, by every stream, amid every brightness, and under every shadow; but just at the moment when you were all ready to put your hand upon the rosy, laughing sylph of the wood, she turned upon you with the glare of a fiend and the eye of a satyr, her locks adders, and her breath the chill damp of a grave. Out of Jesus Christ no rest. No voice to silence the storm. No light to kindle the darkness. No dry dock to repair the split bulwark.

Thank God, I can tell you something better. If there is no rest on earth, there is rest in heaven. Oh, ye who are worn out with work, your hands calloused, your backs bent, your eyes half put out, your fingers worn with the needle that in this world you may never lay down; ye discouraged ones, who have been waging a hand-to-hand fight for bread; ye to whom the night brings little rest and the morning more drudgery—oh, ye of the weary hand, and of the weary side, and the weary foot, hear me talk about rest!

Look at that company of enthroned ones. Look at their hands; look at their feet; look at their eyes. It cannot be that those bright ones ever toiled? Yes! yes! These packed the Chinese tea-boxes, and through missionary instruction escaped into glory. These sweltered on Southern plantations, and one night, after the cotton-picking went up as white as if they had never been black. Those died of overtoil in the Lowell carpet factories, and these in Manchester mills; those helped build the Pyramids, and these broke away from work on the day Christ was hounded out of Jerusalem. No more towers to build; heaven is done. No more garments to weave; the robes are finished. No more harvests to raise; the garner is full. Oh sons and daughters of toil! arise ye and depart, for that is your rest.

Scovill M'Callum, a boy of my Sunday School, while dying, said to his mother, "Don't cry, but sing, sing,

There is rest for the weary,
There is rest for the weary.

Then, putting his wasted hands over his heart, said, "There is rest for me."

But there are some of you who want to hear about the land where they never have any heartbreaks, and no graves are dug. Where are your father and mother? The most of you are orphans. One lamb gone out of this fold; one flower plucked from that garland; one golden link broken from that chain; here a bright light put out, and there another, and yonder another. With such griefs, how are you to rest? Will there ever be a power that can attune that silent voice, or kindle the lustre of that closed eye, or put spring and dance into that little foot? When we bank up the dust over the dead, is the sod never to be broken? Is the cemetery to hear no sound but the tire of the hearse-wheel, or the tap of the bell at the gate as the long processions come in with their awful burdens of grief? Is the bottom of the grave gravel, and the top dust? No! no! no! The tomb is only a place where we wrap our robes about us for a pleasant nap on our way home. The swellings of Jordan will only wash off the dust of the way. From the top of the grave we catch a glimpse of the towers glistened with the sun that never sets.

Oh ye whose locks are wet with the dew of the night of grief; ye whose hearts are heavy, because those well-known footsteps sound no more at the doorway, yonder is your rest! There is David triumphant; but once he bemoaned Absalom. There is Abraham enthroned; but once he wept for Sarah. There is Paul exultant; but he once sat with his feet in the stocks. There is Payson radiant with immortal health; but on earth he was always sick. No toil, no tears, no partings, no strife, no agonizing cough, to-night. No storm to ruffle the crystal sea. No alarm to strike from the cathedral towers. No dirge throbbing from seraphic harps. No tremor in the everlasting song; but rest—perfect rest—unending rest.

Into that rest how many of our loved ones have gone! The little children have been gathered up into the bosom of Christ. One of them went out of the arms of a widowed mother, following its father who died a few weeks before. In its last moment it seemed to see the departed father, for it said, looking upward with brightened countenance, "Papa, take me up!"

Others put down the work of mid life, feeling they could hardly be spared from the office, or store, or shop, for a day, but are to be spared from it forever. Your mother went. Having lived a life of Christian consistency here, ever busy with kindness for her children, her heart full of that meek and quiet spirit that is in the sight of God of great price, suddenly her countenance was transfigured, and the gate was opened, and she took her place amid that great cloud of witnesses that hover about the throne!

Glorious consolation! They are not dead. You cannot make me believe they are dead. They have only moved on. With more love than that with which they greeted us on earth, they watch us from their high place, and their voices cheer us in our struggle for the sky. Hail, spirits blessed, now that ye have passed the flood and won the crown! With weary feet we press up the shining way, until in everlasting reunion we shall meet again. Oh! won't it be grand when, our conflicts done and our partings over, we shall clasp hands, and cry out, "This is Heaven!"

en THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some interesting information about his mission and the work he is trying to do there. On a former visit to the United States, he was deeply impressed with the value of the work done in the mission halls of our great cities in reaching the non-church goers and the great masses of the people, who need to have the Gospel carried to them as they do not seek it for themselves. The conviction was forced upon him that there was urgent need for such work in his own land. Here the people are nominally Christian and in theory recognize the value of the Christian religion and their own need of it, though in practice they neglect it. But in Japan, it is regarded as a religion of aliens, an imported article, which the patriot is inclined to consider inferior to the ancient faiths of his people. There is, therefore, the greater need for aggressive work that the people, who are little likely to go to the missionaries of their own accord, may hear what Christianity really is and realize the truth that Peter proclaimed long ago in Jerusalem, when, having preached Jesus, he declared, "Neither is there salvation in any other."

Especially in his own city of Tokyo, Mr. Kato felt that such an effort was needed. It is a city nearly as large as New York with a population of a million and a half, covering an area of fifty-eight square miles. How long would it take with all the missionaries of all denominations to evangelize such a city? Nor is size the only difficulty. The language, the customs, the ways of thought and life are all in startling contrast to those of America and other western lands, and the missionary is and must always be a stranger. To really reach the people he must live among them as they live and must be one with them. Mr. Kato had seen the difficulties the missionaries were struggling with and longed to supplement their efforts by some outside agency which would be nearer to the people and form a link or point of contact between them and the missionaries. It was with this view that he rented the building a picture of which appears on this page. With a few friends who had been converted like himself he commenced a regular service and organized a system of aggressive operations, such as visiting the people in their houses, talking with them in the markets and preparing tracts and other literary productions of an evangelistic character. The mission succeeded from the outset and now it is his custom when in Japan to spend the whole day there, from early morning until ten or eleven at night. They are very busy days; for inquirers come from the surrounding districts to argue and discuss the claims of Christianity, invitations come from families who have heard of the work and wish to know more of the new teaching and they must be visited. Then there is the evening preaching service to be prepared for and conducted. This is not the easy matter that it is in many of the lands to which the missionary goes. The Japanese are an ancient and an educated people. In Tokyo alone there are twenty-four daily papers and there are very few people who cannot read them. Three and a half million children are in the schools of Japan and there is a rigid compulsory education law which deals severely with parents who neglect to send their children to the schools. It is therefore an intelligent and educated audience that gathers in the mission, to whom the Gospel must be presented in forcible, logical and attractive form. In this work the native Japanese has an advantage over the foreign missionary in his thorough knowledge of the language as well as with the thought of his hearers. In his audience Mr. Kato may have Buddhists, Shintoists and Confucianists and it is a singular fact that sometimes the three beliefs are found in the same person. The Buddhist does not find it difficult to give the reverence to his ancestors which the Shinto faith requires of him as his chief duty and he is willing to accept the code of morals which Confucius prescribed. It is not unnatural that such men should feel themselves well supplied with three faiths and turn a deaf ear to a man who urges them to listen to an exposition of a fourth. But it is not from these that the chief difficulty comes. The Buddhist, the Shintoist or the Confucianist if he is sincere is already prepared to receive and appreciate the sublime religion of the Cross and to see in it a power superior to all other faiths. The most difficult class to reach is the agnostic and the infidel. Unhappily, those classes are largely on the increase in Japan. Mr. Kato says, that is not at all uncommon in the debates which arise after his preaching services, to find men advancing the objections raised by Strauss, Renan and Ingersoll and to be apparently well read in anti-Christian literature. Even the religious classes have been affected by the drift. The Buddhist lapses into pantheism and from pantheism to infidelity. But the most common of all objections is the one with which we are familiar here—that which is based on the inconsistencies of Christians. The Japanese asks how it is that drunkenness, immorality, evasion of the laws, fraud and business trickery are to be seen in men professing the faith that is being preached to them and decline to accept a faith the professors of which are guilty of such things. Unhappily he has no difficulty in pointing out among the men who have gone to Japan from Christian lands for business purposes numerous examples of such lives and he makes the most of the argument.

Mr. Kato, who has undertaken the arduous work of conducting the mission, ap-

But before completing his studies, and while living in Tokyo, he came under the influence of the Gospel, was converted, and resolved from that time to devote all his energies to the preaching of the Gospel. He was publicly baptized in 1880 by Rev. T. C. Winn, of the American Presbyterian Mission, and proceeded to the Union Theological Seminary in Tokyo to obtain a theological training. After his graduation, he labored in Osaka, Hiroshima and Kokura with success. At Kokura, where he was stationed for one year, sixteen were baptized, three of whom became students of the Theological Seminary, and are now preaching the Gospel. In 1886 he became pastor of the Shinagawa Church in Tokyo and succeeded in getting a new church building erected, the cost of which was to the extent of seven-tenths defrayed by the native Christians. After a period of earnest labor there, he passed through a painful experience. The wave of rationalism which was passing through the Christian churches of America, England and other lands, swept him from his anchorage. He had always wick, N. J. Thence he went to Europe for further study, returning to Japan in the spring of 1893. One of his first steps, prompted by what he had observed in his travels, was the founding of the Tokyo Mission, to which he has since given all his thought and energy.

It had been Mr. Kato's hope that as the usefulness of the mission came to be demonstrated and the need of such work should be realized, the Presbyterian Mission would take charge of it and continue it under his superintendence. In this, however, he was disappointed. The missionaries found that special work of this character was not authorized by the Mission Board of the Church. Also, in continuing it under Mr. Kato's superintendence, they would be assuming a responsibility without power, which, in view of his recent lapse into rationalism, might become embarrassing. The missionaries, therefore, declined Mr. Kato's offer and he has since carried on the work alone, assisted by the contributions of native Christians and of such of the foreign residents as sympathize with his enterprise. Although, Mr. Kato is now a member of the Chinzei Presbytery, whose district is the Island of Kyushu and professes himself a staunch Presbyterian, the Presbyterian Mission in Japan deems it prudent to refrain from endorsing his work and its mission board in this country has made the fact known here. The missionaries, doubtless, took this step reluctantly, but with a conviction of its duty in guarding the Christian work in Japan from the danger that is always involved in independent effort outside the regular church organization. Mr. Kato may be able to work all the more successfully without interference or control, and if he continues to look to God for guidance and support, he is not likely to lack either of them or to bring reproach on the Church of Christ.

The Presbyterian Mission in Japan, according to the report issued in July of this year, has seventy-two churches, seventy-five regularly ordained ministers and one hundred and thirteen evangelists. Its total membership is 11,116, an increase of 111 over its last report, issued two years ago. These latter figures are an indication of the vicissitudes of missionary work, for as there were 1,266 baptisms during the two years and the net increase is only 111, it follows that the church must have lost 1,185 members by death and other causes during that period. This fact shows how difficult a field Japan must be and how urgent is the need of aggressive effort, such as Mr. Kato has outlined as the programme of the Tokyo Mission.

A PERSECUTED COLPORTEUR.

Despite the denunciations and warnings of a village priest, Colporteur Steger, of the Bible Society, sold twenty copies of the Bible in a village near Ratisbon, Bavaria. Called a swindler and a blackguard, Steger calmly replied that he had the Word of God to sell, and was no swindler. "Are you the man against whom this warning is issued?" he was asked, and the newspaper with the warning in was shown to him. "I am the man," he replied; "here is the Word of Truth; if there is a falsehood, examine and judge for yourselves." Several New Testaments were bought. Meanwhile the excitement in the village increased and a storm seemed to be brewing. Steger was charged with selling Protestant and Socialistic books, and personal violence was threatened. To all this opposition he replied, "I sell only the Word of God; let anyone read it, and he will be convinced that I speak the truth."

Steger adds: "Despite all this hostility and uproar, I was able to sow the good seed abundantly in this village." In the neighborhood of Furth, Steger found traces of work done there ten years before. Many of the New Testaments then sold had become precious to their possessors, who had had vigorously to oppose the priest when he ordered their destruction. A woman who had bought a Bible gave evidence of having received much spiritual blessing. A man had given up his Bible to be destroyed and was now glad of the opportunity to provide himself with another copy. Steger reports that in Bavaria even the Protestants are not provided with the Scriptures as they should be. "Of twelve Protestant families in a village, only six had Bibles. Two others had New Testaments, the rest no part of God's Word, and they did not feel they had any need of it. I was able to place Bibles in three families, and I did not omit to speak very seriously with them about their spiritual well-being."

appears to be well qualified by training and education for the task. He is thirty-three years old and is a native of Kanazawa, a town on the West coast of Japan. His family is a distinguished one and prides itself on its famous ancestor, Admiral Kato, who won renown in his expedition against Korea, which Japan sent out exactly three hundred years ago. His father belonged to the "Samurai" class and served as a member of the staff of Count Mibu, Governor of Echigo. Mr. Kato's education began with the study of Chinese classics at the age of six years under the direction of a literateur. Thence he was sent to the public school of Kanazawa, which had at that time just adopted the Western methods of education. He subsequently studied at the high school of Nagoya and passed the requisite examination for employment in the public service. After holding office for some months he determined to adopt the profession of the law, and took a special course of study with that end in view.

been an omnivorous reader, and he eagerly seized the works of the eminent scholars whose names he had learned to respect alike for their learning and their piety. But the insidious poison contained there worked dire mischief in his soul. Doubts of the inspiration of the Bible, doubts of the divinity of Christ and all the evangelical doctrines distracted him. He was in no condition to teach or preach, and he resigned his pastorate that he might devote himself entirely to a settlement of the momentous questions which were agitating him. He supported himself for a time by literary work and made a church connection with the Unitarians. This period of doubt and darkness, however, was brief. Mr. Kato soon realized the unsatisfactory nature of mere negation, and emerged into the light, holding more firmly than ever "the faith once delivered to the saints." He came to America to get further strength, and took the advanced course of systematic theology in the Theological Seminary of New Brun-

JESUS AND NICODEMUS.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 29. John 3: 1-16. Golden Text, John 3: 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHILE the Lord Jesus was in Jerusalem, a man of the Pharisees, named Nicodemus, came unto him by night, and said unto him, "Rabbi, we know that thou art a Teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles which thou doest except God be with him." Oh, how many there are who can go so far as to believe that Jesus is a Teacher come from God, and yet find as much difficulty as Nicodemus did to come themselves into contact with that God, or to live out, in their own lives, that teaching which they allow to be from him. They will come so far, but no farther; they dread, as he does who is learning to swim, anything which will take them off their feet, or put them under the power or control of him whom they call their God! O, with what difficulty man learns to yield himself really up to God out of his own hands! Nicodemus came as a teacher to the great Teacher, and the first thing he had to learn was his own ignorance: "Except a man be [margin, born from above], he cannot see the kingdom of God." Nicodemus was at sea. To adopt the teaching of a new and striking teacher was one thing; to adapt a measure of his ideas and thoughts, and graft them on to his own, so as to enlarge his theology was one thing; but to be born again, to become the subject of a change which involved the life itself, was out of his range entirely. To Nicodemus, birth and life conveyed no other idea than physical birth and physical life. Up to the present time he knew only physical and mental; and the life which he knew could nowhere answer to the expression used by the Lord Jesus. "How can a man be born when he is old?" Such were his questions; he wanted to learn, but the truth was as yet "far above out of his sight." Jesus answered him, "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, this is a thing which is personal, which touches thee: Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee ye must be born again. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit."

None of the erudition of this learned man had brought him so much as a hint of the truths which were being opened to him now. He was out of his depth, in a region where he could not find his bearings. "Born of water and of the Spirit," the washing of water by the Word, quickened by the Spirit of God; generated by the Word and the Spirit; this was altogether unknown to Nicodemus. Of a kingdom thus entered he had no conception; all his life up to this time had been lived on a human plane, and all his religion had consisted in what he said, and did, and knew intellectually, but far from above, real contact with God was quite unknown to him. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; that he knew; but, "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit," he did not know experimentally.

And how many there are even of God's children who know little of this great truth! There are many who attempt, by fleshly energy and zeal, and fleshly excitement, to stir up spiritual works. By striking expressions, by thrilling anecdotes, by touching hymns, by tragical tones of voice, by that which appeals to the emotions, they attempt to create a spiritual movement, but the flesh cannot generate the spirit; man cannot beget God the Holy Ghost out of anything which proceeds from himself. The fruit tree brings forth fruit after its kind; and the flesh brings forth fruit after its kind. The flesh can no more generate that which is spiritual than can the Holy Ghost generate that which is of the flesh. It is blasphemy when men get up an excitement which comes from their own emotions, and call it the working of the Holy Ghost. Let us be reverent when we speak of him who is God, as God the Father is, and God the Son.

Nicodemus was honest enough to reveal his ignorance: he said, "How can these things be?" Something had laid hold of him, he was willing to be taught. Although too timid to be seen coming to Jesus in broad daylight, yet something in the words and deeds of Jesus had awakened a longing in him for a reality he had not as yet. Perhaps he had seen and admired the courage of the young Galilean artisan who had dared to take the high hand with the buyers and sellers in the temple. Jesus answered him, "Art thou the teacher of Israel and knowest not these things?" The essential to all teaching is to know what we teach. "Verily, verily, I say unto thee, We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen," and thou knowest not even the very entrance into the kingdom of heaven, thou hast not seen even the very first step! How canst thou teach that which thou hast not experienced? Thou art ignorant of the Spirit: how teach that which can be learned only by the Spirit? "The wind [or spirit] bloweth where it listeth" [or willeth]. Men cannot control the Holy Ghost, he wills, he leads, it is ours to follow his leading. But "thou hearest the sound thereof," than the sound of the flesh: not the whirlwind, the earthquake, and the fire (1 Kings 19: 11, 12), but the "still small voice." It is a terrible mistake to suppose that, by any human power, we can bring forth that which is spiritual. "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven." The things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned. This Nicodemus did not know, and had yet to learn. But the "teacher of Israel" howled before the Teacher sent from God, and was willing to learn of Jesus. Thus the Lord continued, "If I have told you earthly things, and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things." To be born again, to be spiritually quickened is but the first step into the heavenly things, the kingdom of God, which "is not meat and drink but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." This compared to the deeper teachings of the Lord is an "earthly thing." When his disciples came to him to know the meaning of his parable of the sower and the seed, he said, "Know ye not this parable? and how then will ye know all parables?" (Mark 4: 13). It was just this which Nicodemus did not know, and which no man can know, until he has experienced it.

And now the Lord declares to Nicodemus one of the principles of the "heavenly things." "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven." In God's economy there is no getting higher up without first coming lower down. Down to the Cross is the first step upward to the throne. And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have eternal life. Moses lifted up the serpent of brass to be God's way of life out of death for the bitten Israelites in the desert who would believe in their own ruin, and obey

God by looking away from themselves to the serpent. None perhaps, but such as look truly in the desperate nature of their case would have been willing to seek healing in a way so contrary to all which could flatter man's pride or exalt his reason. None could look on the serpent of brass without seeing God's undeserved love for the rebellious. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life." Only when the day of salvation shall have ended and the day of glory shall have begun will it be known how many precious immortal souls have found their way into the kingdom through these blessed words! They are a protest against the erroneous idea conceived by some that God's anger against the sinner was appeased by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ.

"As Moses lifted up the Serpent."

HOW long Jesus remained in Jerusalem after the cleansing of the Temple we are not informed. John, who alone mentions this visit, does not attempt to write a biography of Christ, but selects only such incidents as will best serve his purpose. As he said, (20: 30, 31.) "These are written that ye might believe." In reporting the conversation with Nicodemus he had the same object in view, and the subsequent history of the Church has proved how wise he was. This passage has probably been the means of more conversions than have resulted from any other passage in the New Testament. The conversation may have taken place in John's own house; for he appears to have had a house in Jerusalem and we may be sure that his Lord would be a welcome guest there. However that may have been, John seems to have been present at the interview. The passage reads like the rough notes of a listener and there are gaps in it which doubtless were filled up. The verses from the sixteenth to the twenty-fifth were apparently no part of the talk, but are John's own commentary, written long afterward. Perhaps we do Nicodemus an injustice in supposing that his going to Jesus at night was a proof of his timidity. It was more likely that he chose that time as one when Jesus would be unoccupied and could give him undivided attention. If he had been as timid as we have been apt to think him, he would not have gone to Christ at all; and later on, when after the Crucifixion, at a time when the cause seemed lost, and association with it must involve obloquy, he would not have brought that hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes and assisted at the burial of Christ. He was probably much older than Jesus, and as one of the distinguished men of the nation, it he was attracted to him by his courageous cleansing of the Temple, may have gone to him with the intention of encouraging him and giving him advice. His surprise must have been great when the young Teacher met him with the radical statement contained in his first words. This illustrious Pharisee who had all his life been trying to attain external perfection, is told that he had made a wrong beginning and had worked on wrong lines. He would be perfectly familiar with the phrase "The Kingdom of God," and doubtless regarded his Jewish birth and his blameless life as qualifications for it; but Jesus answers him that a new birth is necessary. How deeply externalism and literalism must have eaten into the religious life of the time we may judge when Nicodemus supposed Christ meant a literal birth. Christ's reply contains the two philosophic principles at the basis of his religion. They are, that a changed life is possible and must start from within outward, and that the power comes from God through faith. Spiritual results must be produced by spiritual means, and the spirit of man can be quickened into life and power only by contact with the Holy Spirit of God. So much Nicodemus learned in that night's interview.

Ye must be born again. Mere reformation of conduct is not sufficient to fit anyone for Christ's kingdom. There must be a change of heart. Mr. Moody uses this home-illustration of the fact: A man buys a farm and he finds on that farm a pump. He goes to the pump and begins to pump. A person comes along and says, "Look here, my friend, you don't want to use that water. The man who lived here before, he used that water and it poisoned him and his wife and children—the water did." "Is that so?" says the man. "Well, I will soon make that right. I will find a remedy." And he goes and gets some paint and paints the pump, putties up all the holes, and fills up the cracks in it, and now he has a fine looking pump. And he says, "Now I am sure it is all right." You would say, "What a fool to go and paint the pump when the water is bad." But that is what sinners are trying to do. They are trying to paint up the old pump that has always given bad water. It was a new well the man wanted, and the sinner wants a new heart.

Can a man be born when he is old? Thorwaldsen, the great sculptor, was told that there was a dispute about the place and time of his birth, some saying he was born in Copenhagen in 1770, others in Brussels, and so on. He was asked to settle the question. "What matters it?" he asked. "I don't know. But I arrived in Rome on March 8, 1797." His meaning was that not until he came to Rome and began his studies there did he really begin to live. Many a Christian has felt so about his life. It was not real life that he spent before he was born again. His true life began at his conversion. Lord Lyndhurst, who was converted late in life, used to say in a voice broken by emotion, "My soul is saved, but my life is lost."

Gave his only begotten Son. There was a fire in the sailors' home at Liverpool. Some persons were in the upper stories and their escape was cut off. The fire ladders were too short to reach. A longer ladder was at last found, but that also was too short. The fire was getting nearer, and it seemed as it they must perish. In the emergency a sailor, who was looking on, ran up the ladder and braced himself firmly against the burning building. With his feet on topmost round of the ladder, and the window sill firmly clutched with his hands, he stood strong and immovable. "Quick," he cried to the despairing men, "scramble down my body to the ladder and you are safe." The sailors needed no urging. One by one they passed down the living way to the ladder and so to the ground and all were saved. Then the man came down himself. His hands and face were blistered, and he was bruised from head to foot, but he had saved the men. That ladder went a long way, but before the imperilled men could be saved it needed the length of a man. Philosophy, temperance and other helps may do much for the uplifting of the human race, but they would all have failed if Christ had not given himself to be the living way.

God so loved the world. A monument on the borders of a Russian forest is the memorial of a pathetic story. A Russian nobleman was traveling homeward at night when the dreaded yell of a pack of wolves was heard. He had good horses and he put them to their highest speed, but soon the wolves were following the sleigh at but a short distance. Realizing that they would soon be upon him and he would die a frightful death, he bade his servant cut the traces of one of the horses. The servant obeyed and the horse rushed away, but in a few moments the wolves had caught it and were tearing it to pieces. The wolves were delayed over their meal and the nobleman and his servant made good use of the interval. Soon, however, the yells of the pack were again heard. A second horse was sacrificed, but still they were many miles from safety. It was a race for life, and with the two remaining horses they sped onward. The lights of the castle could be seen in the far distance when the wolves were again upon them. It would be suicidal to give up another horse. Yet before they could reach the castle the wolves would kill them. Then the heroic servant flung himself out of the sleigh. The nobleman heard him tire his pistol twice, and then heard no more. The wolves were feasting on the body of the man who had loved him so much as to give his life for him. He reached home safely and afterward reared on the spot where his servant had fallen the monument to his memory.

THE DESTITUTION IN KOREA.

Minister Ye Sung Soo Repeats the Story of Famine and Death—An Interview with an American Missionary, Lately from Korea—The Proposed Relief Movement.

THE publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week of the interview with the Korean Minister in Washington, in which that official described, in eloquent terms, the helpless condition of the poor peasants in his country, has excited wide-spread sympathy in their behalf. Minister Ye Sung Soo's unofficial appeal has been telegraphed throughout the United States, together with his request that contributions for the Korean famine sufferers should be sent to them through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Meanwhile, the telegraphic blockade between Korea and the rest of the world continues unbroken, and no news can be received from that country, which has become the battleground of the two great Asiatic nations, China and Japan. With invading armies occupying her cities and devouring her substance; with her harbors filled with foreign war-ships, and with all her industries paralyzed by the war now in progress, Korea is indeed in a pitiful plight.

In supplement to his recent interview, and in answer to a request for further information, Minister Ye Sung Soo (whose portrait appears on this page), has forwarded the following letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 17.

DEAR SIRS:—I received a personal letter from Korea, which is dated July 11. It states that the condition of the people is a very painful one. Since the uprising of the rebellion in Chun La To, one of the leading agricultural provinces in Korea, it has been depopulated by the rebels, and also two other surrounding provinces which are regarded as among the most productive land in Korea. The people of these three provinces who constitute nearly half of the whole population of the country, are starving. These wander from place to place seeking relief, but there is no means to help their need. Men and women, and young and old, are going about the country. Many are exiled by the rebellion, or the Government troops, and they have no means to live. Day after day their trouble weighs upon them. Death would be better to them than living in this world. Many are found dead on the roadside. Parents often think they had better give their daughters to the rich class, and thus have the poor innocent creatures saved from death by starvation.

I write with a very painful heart and in the sincere hope of saving my poor countrymen.

In addition to this, the Chinese and Japanese troops have fought several battles nearby these three agricultural provinces, causing the people to scatter, leaving their homes and everything they possessed.

I remain yours truly,

YE SUNG SOO.

Late dispatches from Shanghai, giving news from the seat of war in Korea, contain no mention of the famine in that country. They state, however, that the commissariat of the Chinese army is complaining of an insufficiency of supplies for the land troops now in Korea. Thus far the principal events of the war have occurred by sea, between the contending navies of China and Japan, the advantage resting with the Mikado's ships. At Seoul, the Korean capital, letters written on July 27, represent the king as disposed to acquiesce in the Japanese demands for reforms, and as having promised to cast off Chinese influence and declare Korea a free and independent nation.

The Queen, who is said to have been the real head of the Korean government, and largely responsible for the condition of affairs had fled to the north. The king, at the time the letter was written, was still practically a prisoner in the hands of the Japanese. The great foreign powers, including the United States, are all represented in Seoul as well as in Chemulpo, the port of the capital, by armed forces and war ships. Both China and Japan seem determined to prosecute the war to the end, but there is still a prospect of intervention by the civilized powers to avert serious loss to international commerce. Japan proposes to raise a popular loan of fifty million dollars to continue the war.

A representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few days ago interviewed Dr. J. B. Busted, an American medical missionary in Seoul, who had come home on a brief vacation.

He said his visit to the United States at this time, was for the purpose of raising funds for the Dispensary of the Methodist Episcopal Church Hospital in Seoul. Medical work in Seoul is advancing grandly, and the medical missionaries are doing practically the greatest Gospel work in Korea. At the Methodist Hospital, Dr. Busted and his associates have an average of fifteen patients a day, the number sometimes reaching as high as thirty or thirty-five. It is a free dispensary, but some of the patients pay a small voluntary fee, thirty, forty, or a hundred "cash," according to their ability. Dr. Busted sailed on August 17 on his return to Korea. Shortly before sailing, he talked freely with the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning affairs in the country of his destination.

"I left Korea on June 16, 1894," he said. "Owing to the war, there had been for some time an embargo on rice, the Korean product not being allowed to be sent out of the country. China, however, sent large quantities to Chemulpo for shipment elsewhere. I remember seeing stacks of it many feet high awaiting shipment at the wharves in Chemulpo."

"Do you know of a famine now existing in Korea?"

"A famine has been caused, as you already know, by two crop failures, followed by the war. The time of sowing in Korea is about the latter part of March or the first of April. Rice is sown at that time in one bed, and a month later transplanted to another. The harvest time for the rice falls

"It has also been stated that the suffering there at present from want and sickness is so intense that hundreds are dying daily in Seoul and elsewhere."

Dr. Busted looked at the questioner in mild surprise.

"Hundreds dying of starvation!" he repeated. "No, not quite that many. If such numbers were dying of starvation, I certainly would hear of it. We, who conduct the medical mission in Seoul, would also know if such were the fact. But no doubt there will be a good deal of suffering on account of the war. I recall a distribution of rice by one of the rich officials outside of Seoul and on the river. He gave away hundreds of bags of it to the poor. It is quite likely that any stores belonging to the government may be exhausted. But he wealthy class, no doubt, have quantities of rice in their own private store-houses, so there is no danger of suffering among people of means."

"No information of any description can be had from Korea direct," said the interviewer. "There were no dispatches at the Korean Legation at Washington, which we visited last week, and THE CHRISTIAN

"Yes, to Hon. John M. B. Sill, our American Minister at Seoul, who is in full sympathy with all Christian work, or to Dr. H. M. Allen, our Secretary of Legation there."

"What of distribution—as to facilities?"

"We use ponies, which are loaded with bags, and these can travel anywhere," replied Dr. Busted. "On the Han River, on which Seoul is situated (although the capital is really several miles from the river, there are boats, but no steamers. Of course the effect of such a generous philanthropy by Americans would have a good moral result, and would be of the greatest possible benefit to the missions. At the present time our missionaries are simply tolerated; but the work is in a very promising condition."

"There are already signs of coming progress in Korea," he added, "progress that will bring railroads and steamers. It is amusing enough to observe the first intimations of these changes. I remember seeing a bicycle there, and some enterprising people actually started an omnibus from the river to Seoul. It was drawn by eight donkeys! Unfortunately the venture failed."

Speaking further, Dr. Busted said:

"The outcome of this war must be beneficial. Korea has long resisted the spirit of modern progress; but now a great change is bound to come. I believe that the demand formulated by Japan upon the Korean government may have reference to the adoption of modern improvements and methods, as well as to governmental reforms. Chinese influence is potent in Korea, and the latter is heavily indebted to the Mongol Empire. For years, Korea's expenditures have been greater than her income. Her best resources remain undeveloped, although she has rich mines of gold, silver and coal. She has practically no commerce, and her exports, with the exception of rice and ginseng, amount to nothing. The higher classes in Korea do not believe in working, and consequently, as they must live, they do so at the expense of the industrious poor. A very large proportion of the population is agricultural and on their industry the whole country depends."

Owing to interruption, caused by the war between China and Japan, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has not been able to secure information by cable direct from Korea, concerning the status of affairs in that country. Consequently we are not in a position to say to what extent Korea suffers at the time of this writing, from famine. We expect almost hourly to receive exhaustive information per cable, and as soon as it comes to hand, we will place it before our readers. In the meantime, all contributions received will be held at this office, to be later forwarded to the American Minister at Seoul, to be applied to relief purposes.

CHEMULPO, THE PORT OF SEOUL, CAPITAL OF KOREA.

about October. There has undoubtedly been a great deal of suffering among the poor people of the country, but the most acute distress will not be felt until after the next crop is harvested, two months hence. Then, should it be a failure, the peasants will suffer greatly."

"But it has been stated that they cannot expect any crop this year; that the peasants have been driven to the mountains off their little farms; that they have neither food nor seed, and therefore that there is no prospect of a crop."

"Oh," responded Dr. Busted with a smile, "I hope it is not quite so bad. I think that there will be a crop, but it may be a poor one. The probability is that the war will not last very long, and that the people, after a bit, will come out all right. Many of the Korean peasant-farmers have doubtless been frightened off by the war and have left their crops to seek safety in the interior."

HERALD'S cablegram to Mr. Moore, of the American Trading Company at Seoul, asking for information was stopped at Shanghai."

"Yes," interposed Dr. Busted, "and there must be considerable delay on all the steamship lines, too, I imagine. I would not be surprised if Mrs. Busted and I experienced a good deal of hindrance before we reached Chemulpo, owing to the war."

"Can they use flour in Korea?"

"No," said Dr. Busted, "that is, the poorer class cannot. Their staple is rice. They have a flour made from rice, and with it they make cakes, and they have also bean cakes. The best thing would be to send rice and beans."

"Do you think such a cargo would really reach the hands of the peasants themselves, without serious diminution? And might not this be guarded against, by consigning it to some responsible person?"

OUT-OF-DOORS PLEASURES.

THE human race want more physical strength as well as more brain, and the fresh air and the blue sky, and the hand on rope or rudder or ball or mallet or racket does well whether it pulls or turns or reaches or strikes for success. There is no harm in the mere fact that it is a race. The whole human family so far as it amounts to anything is engaged in an effort for precedence. Merchant in race with merchant, mechanic in race with mechanic, professional man in race with professional man, and, if there were no ambition to excel, life would come down to a flat monotone and all enterprise would die out and the world halt on its swift march toward elevation and betterment. There is no virtue in driving slowly or sailing slowly or walking slowly. The most of the things that God manages are characterized by speed. Rapid currents, swift lightnings and worlds turned hundreds of miles a minute. And I do not know where men get the idea that there is a sanctity in tardiness. A canalboat is certainly no better than an express train. By out-of-door exercises the emaciated forms of college students are being filled out, and instead of young men starting life bent over and ghostly and timid, as sick people are apt to be, they come on the stage of life with the stride of an athlete and the gleaming eye of a victor. I ascribe it to romping amusements that there has been such a marked bettering of the physical condition of American women. Blessed be croquet and lawn tennis and calisthenics and gymnastics. The journeying of many girls in foreign lands where they have opportunity of admiring the superior physical qualities of the English and German ladies has also had a good effect. Perhaps the fact that so many of those females who pride themselves on their bewitching languors and fashionable invalidism have been passed by when our young men came to make selections of lifetime associates, may have helped to cure that tolly. It has been found out that doll babies are of but little worth in the journey of life, and capacity on the part of a woman to sweep out a drawing-room without fainting and make a loaf of bread not sour or soggy is of more importance than the satin in a cheek which the fingers of diphtheria may unravel, or the color of the hair, which one strong grip of a fever may pull out.

We had cause for congratulation in the fact that woman's physical condition is improving, but there is room yet for higher stages of advancement, for the largest room in the world, we are told, is the room for improvement. Turn the girls out-of-doors every chance you have. Let them, properly accompanied, bathe in the fields and generalize among the rocks. Deny them not oar or skate or saddle. A race of weak women will make a race of puny men. We are not ambitious for amazons nor for women in the political hustings, but out and out Christian women who could enjoy what rights they have and support great souls in bodies fitted to contain them. But while we applaud all those physical exercises which administer to masculine and feminine vitality, let us set ourselves against everything that would bedraggle and debase innocent amusement. Who would have thought that ball playing could be made, as it is in many places, a dissipation and carousal, and that many who engage in it have nothing to show as a result but battered knuckles and faces telling of strong drink inside as much as could a tavern sign outside? And they hang around doing nothing, waiting for the next match, while their wives or mothers or sisters take in washing to support them in loafdom. Let boatman's oar and cricketer's wicket and the white sail of the yachtsman be handed over where they belong, among those whose sports are means of health consecrated to useful purposes.

RAIN-MAKERS.

IN time of great aridity you have noticed for days and weeks that it will look like rain, and it would almost rain, and the clouds only wanted a little help such as science is now ready to give in order to shower the fields into fruitfulness. Vast tracts of land where it never rains, or rains so seldom that their present chief characteristic is barrenness, will become luxuriant harvest fields. Rainmaking invention coupled with irrigation will make the great American desert, which the Union Pacific rail train crosses day after day amid dust and heat, become like Westchester farms in New York or Lancaster farms in Pennsylvania or Somerset county farms in New Jersey. It is not an impertinent interference with Providence any more than a lightning rod which with iron finger points the lightning to its hiding-place in the earth, is an impertinent interference with electricity. In future time, when the earth is in distressing need of rain, while as in olden times fast days may be proclaimed and the people assemble in churches to supplicate the downpour, the rain-makers will at the same time be busy, for God loves faith and works to go together, as when a ship is in peril, while the passengers are praying to God for rescue, the sailors are doing their best to save the ship.

Now that we have found out how to make it rain, the next thing will be to find out how to make it stop raining, for droughts are no more devastating than floods and freshets. The bidding of a storm to stop may, after a while, be as easy as the bidding of a storm to start. I rejoice that the field of invention seems to be lifted from the earth's surface. We want no more labor-saving machines, for the time has come when men and women need the wages that come from human toil, and if you are going to do everything by machinery how are the industrious population of the earth to make a living? Labor-saving machinery has left hundreds of thousands of honest and industrious people with absolutely nothing to do. I know both sides of this subject. The theory is abroad that while machinery does much work that was done by human hands, new modes of livelihood are open for the toiling classes, but the simple fact is that the surplus of machinery leaves multitudes of people who would like to earn their living in enforced idleness. It was necessary, in order to feed and clothe the world's population, that new wheels and scythes and threshers should be invented, but it seems we have progressed enough in that direction. Now let human fingers and human shoulders at good wages do the rest. I am glad that the inventors have taken to the clouds. May the skies be filled with inventions which shall start rain and stop it, invoke snow storms and halt them, cool the intense heat and warm the blizzards, until the world, now so beautiful and attractive and glorious for human residence, shall be made more beautiful and attractive and glorious. For the development of the human race God lets it struggle out and up and on. There was the ocean and the human race all these years has been bridging it. There is electricity, supposed for ages to have only a deadly mission, now called to propel machinery and illumine cities. The impossibles have become the possibles. The difficulties have become the easies. The deadly has become the helpful. The clouds that in dry weather floated in tantalization just beyond the world's reach and seeming to say: "Don't you wish I would fill your casks and your wells and your cisterns, but I will not," and the homes and the fields and the forests get ready for the blessing, only to see it float away—such clouds will quit their tantalization and science will cry out to the clouds, "Let there be rain!" and all the gardens and fields will clap their hands in the refreshment. So I say, all hail to the rain-makers who have been gaining atmospheric victory.

Subscriber, Afton, Va. 1. Were the doctors with whom Christ was found conversing in the Temple doctors of medicine also or doctors of law? 2. Is Josephus accepted as good authority upon disputed questions of which he may have written?

1. The doctors were men learned in law, moral philosophy, theology and science; men distinguished as teachers and leaders of thought. 2. Josephus is an acknowledged authority on questions of Jewish history.

John A. King, Lake Butler, Fla. I have just read Dr. Talmage's editorial "Religious Brotherhood," in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 8, and it is so grand that I wish to give my mile of approval and say that I trust it is the rallying cry of the friends of Jesus, that will result in the binding together in Christian brotherhood of all who love the Lord. Thousands are longing and praying for the day when wars shall cease among God's people, and when all may go forth to labor in the Master's vineyard without fear of being knifed by some one fighting under the same flag. Oh! that every shot and shell sent out by Christians were aimed directly at the enemy.

T., Greenwood, Miss. A short time since I was drawn to serve on the jury in our court. A case was given us late Saturday evening. After deliberating until midnight we failed to agree, and by order of the judge were locked up. Sunday morning a verdict was reached by all except myself, I refusing to act on the matter at all on Sunday. Did I do right? or should I have agreed with the others and been discharged and gone to church?

The answer would depend upon the character of the case under consideration. It would seem, however, that the lesser evil might have been chosen had you been able to agree conscientiously with the others, settled the matter and gone to church. On the other hand, if your objections were well founded and it was clearly a matter that would not suffer by going over, you were justified in doing as you did.

In a letter to a friend in the United States, Silas Bender, Head Master A. M. Boys' Boarding School, Madanapelle, South India, has these kind words of this journal:

I earnestly request that you will kindly see your way to accede to my request for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as by so doing you will not only be cheering and gladdening my heart, but also placing in my hands for instruction and enlightenment one of the best Christian periodicals in the world.

We are glad to have the good wishes and prayers of our friends abroad as well as at home, and such letters afford us encouragement in our labors.

P. C. Chaney, New Salem, Ill. 1. It is stated in "The Mail-Bag" of August 8 that what was believed to be the oldest mummy yet discovered is that of Seker-em-saf, son of King Pepi, who lived 3200 B.C., which was then 800 years before the Flood. Is there a record extant that was made before the Flood? and if so, was it carved in letters or hieroglyphics, and in what language? 2. Of what nation or people are the Aztec Indians, or aborigines, of Mexico the descendants? 3. I see by a history of ancient Mexico that eight leagues north-east of the City of Mexico were two pyramids: the first, dedicated to the sun, was 181 feet in perpendicular height, and 693 feet in length; the other one was dedicated to the moon, and was 144 feet in perpendicular height. Are these pyramids still in existence?

1. In hieroglyphics, we believe. All the information we have on this subject, we have already published. 2. The origin or descent of the Aztecs is undecided. According to native traditions, they came about the eleventh or twelfth century, from a country called Aztlan, lying to the Northwest, but history has never been able to locate it. 3. We cannot tell.

L. B., Frankfort Springs, Pa. I am told that Moses felt safe in crossing the Red Sea because of his knowledge of the tides and the effect of the winds and there was no miracle at all. Do you think it possible that the safety of the Israelites and the destruction of the Egyptians were merely coincidences?

We are told (Ex. 14: 21) that God caused an East wind to blow. He used natural means to accomplish his purpose, as he generally does. We cannot imagine Moses taking the fearful responsibility of leading that great host with the women and children into the bed of the sea with no other ground for the action than his knowledge of the tides. The Bible by mentioning God's command and his action distinctly places the matter in the category of miracles and there is no other record of it known.

N. S. B., Brooklyn, N. Y. I noticed stated in "The Mail-Bag" by a reader that "Christians themselves should be the badge of Jesus Christ," and that they should "reflect the likeness of Jesus Christ, so that the world at a glance may see that they are the children of God." It is true that we ought to identify a Christian by something more than a mere badge, but can we always "see at a glance that a person is a Christian?" I have known some of the kindest of Christians, who to outward appearance seemed otherwise, and none are responsible for physical appearance. Then, if we were obliged to accost a stranger for direction or assistance, we would at once know in whom to place our trust. I sincerely hope a badge will be agreed upon for I know it would unite Christians in one common bond. I suggest a silver star, as symbolic of the Star of Bethlehem and of our hope.

Elie Marc, Natick, R. I. As I am going in foreign field is next month to do missionary work, I would like to ask you concerning the best method of erecting a house for myself. I am to have a school for children. I go to Hayti (West Indies). I have heard about portable houses of iron.

E. B., Clarence, Ia. Is the baptism of the Holy Ghost given after being born again?

The baptism of the Holy Spirit is usually understood as meaning the power and energy for service and of necessity this must come after the new birth. You cannot conceive of the service of an unregenerate person being acceptable to God. Of course the new birth is the work of the Holy Spirit, but the baptism in its general acceptance is a later blessing.

Subscriber, Elkton, Md. What is the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost mentioned in Luke 12: 10?

Many volumes have been written on the subject without any sure result being reached. The opinion generally accepted now is that it consisted in attributing to Satanic influence, the works and wonders worked by Jesus through the power of the Holy Spirit. Whether it may be committed in these times is doubtful. The nearest approach to it is perhaps in scoffing at conversion and in saying that the converted person is under the influence of Satan.

P. B. C., Bandy Lake, Pa. If, as you say, Pastor Spurgeon was never ordained, what right had he to baptize and administer the Lord's Supper? Might not others do the same?

Mr. Spurgeon's call to the ministry was fully attested by the wonderful success attending his preaching. He naturally accepted the invitation of a church to become its pastor and perform the functions of the pastorate. He apparently did not think that the confirmation of the call by other ministers was necessary. When God had used his words to the conversion of any person he felt himself fitted to baptize that person and receive him at the Lord's table. No one supposes that any special grace is conferred by ordination. It is possible that others may do the same, and whenever any one who is as well fitted as Mr. Spurgeon was, does so, there will not be many persons blame him or seek to prevent him.

IS THE KING OF SIAM DEAD?

A REPORT of the death of the King of Siam is brought by the steamer "Tacoma" which has just arrived from China. It appears that the news reached Hong Kong shortly before the "Tacoma" left that port. That it was credited there is evident from the fact that an English war ship was at once despatched to the Siamese capital in anticipation of there being disturbances which might imperil the safety of foreign residents. There is, however, some reason to doubt the truth of the report, as so important an event would surely have been reported by cable. The rumor may have had its origin in the probability of the King's death. It is known that a strong feeling of hostility against him was aroused among the nobles owing to his abject surrender to France last year. The nobles would have had him resist French aggression and regarded his refusal as an act of cowardice. They did not know, as the King knew, the power of the adversary and they foolishly believed that a successful resistance might have been made. Since that time they have assumed a sullen demeanor which in the land of the far Orient is often the prelude to the sudden death of monarchs by poison or the dagger. King Chulalongkorn, whose portrait with that of his Queen, Sewang Wattana, appears on this page, is forty-one years old and has been twenty-six years on the throne. He has been regarded as an enlightened sovereign who has exerted himself for the development of his country and has introduced Western ideas and customs with an energy which has made him unpopular with some of his conservative subjects. He has also been a friend of the missionaries who will sincerely deplore his death if it has really occurred. There is no doubt that the King acted wisely in making the best terms he could with France and his course was really better for the nobles than would have been the case had he done as they wished. That fact, however, they do not know and therefore they have ceased to pay him the respect due to his wisdom. Men often act so when the providential dealings of God are painful to them and that is inexcusable because his love and wisdom are both infinite. (Prov. 3: 11, 12.)

Leaving the Cherokee Strip.

A dispatch from Arkansas City, Kans., to the New York "Times" gives a sad account of a number of settlers in the Cherokee strip who had arrived there on their way to their former homes. These travelers say that there is a great deal of distress in the Strip. Large numbers of the settlers find that the land which they succeeded in getting is absolutely worthless for agricultural purposes. Others whose claims were disputed after the wild rush of September 16, 1893, did nothing to improve the land until the courts adjudicated on the claim and consequently having sown nothing had no harvest to reap. Some of them had waited on the line of Southern Kansas so long for the opening of the Strip that their little capital was exhausted, and all the money they could beg or borrow was needed to buy the food which had to be brought in from Kansas. In many instances severe sickness has fallen on the families. Women and children accustomed to the comforts of a home, spent the winter in temporary shacks, old tents or in a wagon-box set on the ground and covered with a canvas sheet. Even the people who counted themselves happy in securing town lots have, in some case become disgusted and have left. The correspondent says that one town which ten months ago had a population of fifteen thousand, now contains barely three hundred persons. How bitter the disappointment of these people must be we can imagine when we recall the eagerness of that rush for claims a year ago, and the scenes of violence and excitement which were witnessed. How many there are engaged in the struggle for wealth and devoting to it their every energy and even imperiling their souls in the pursuit, who must at the close of life feel as these settlers do, that although they succeeded in getting what they wanted, they have made a mistake, and the prize was not worth the struggle. (Luke 12: 20.)

A Pension Suspended.

There is a very disappointed man in a Veteran's Home in Wisconsin. Besides the privileges of the Home, he has been drawing a pension from the Government regularly every month. A few days ago the pension agent received a notice from Commissioner Lochren, directing him to pay the man no more money. No reason was given for the order, and when the pensioner was notified that his pension was stopped, he vigorously protested. He was referred to the Pension Department, to which he immediately sent his complaint.

CHULALONKORN AND SEWANG WATTANA, THE KING AND QUEEN OF SIAM.

In reply, he received from the Commissioner the brief explanation that the Department on looking up his record, had discovered that he was a deserter. If the fact is as the Department alleges, it is surprising that the man ever secured a pension, but not at all surprising that the pension should be withdrawn when the discovery was made. The pensioner, however, appears to have been deeply chagrined, although his conscience must have told him that he was not entitled to a pension. There is reason to fear that at the day of final account many will be similarly disappointed and with infinitely greater reason. Christ said that there were some whose claims would be urged, but would be rejected with the reply, "I never knew you." (Luke 13: 25-27.)

The Sinking Continent.

A startling statement was made on Aug. 15 by a learned professor at the meeting of the Scientific Societies held in Brooklyn, N. Y. It was nothing less than that the whole American continent is gradually sinking into the ocean. Prof. J. W. Spencer was the speaker, and his address was made before the Geological Section. He said that he had made experiments at the mouth of the Mississippi and in the Gulf of Mexico, and these experiments have convinced him that Louisiana and other parts of the surrounding country are 8,000 feet lower than they were originally. In referring to the West India Islands, Prof. Spencer said that several of them had had two or three periods of re-elevation of from 200 to 300 feet, and had since settled. The professor had also discovered that there were many evidences that the land in Florida had been much higher with respect to the sea level than at the present time, and there were also indications that some of the land had sunk within comparatively recent times. It is not likely that the Professor's statement will cause general alarm. People are not apt to be concerned about a catastrophe which is not likely to occur for many centuries. Unhappily, but very few are concerned about a catastrophe in which they may be personally involved, and do not trouble themselves to be among the number who would be unmoved if the earth were removed, having the promise of a new earth in which dwelleth righteousness. (II Peter 3: 10-13.)

A Living Chimney.

A large chestnut tree in the neighborhood of Asherville, N. C., has long been regarded as a natural curiosity. About dawn on had a human and not a diabolical origin. There is good reason to believe that an injustice is often done to the enemy of souls in attributing to him things for which men are themselves responsible. While some temptations come from him it is more frequently true, as James says, that men are tempted when they are drawn away of their own lusts and enticed. (James 1: 14.)

A Steer in a Church.

The services at the Protestant Episcopal Church of Newark, N. J., were interrupted on Sunday, August 5, by the sudden entrance of a steer. A herd was being driven through the town on its way to South Orange, when a steer broke loose and turned into Broadway. The driver gave chase and was assisted by several boys, whose shouts seemed to scare the animal. It increased its pace as its pursuers ran, until it reached the church. As it was a warm morning, all the doors stood open and the steer rushed headlong into the building. The rector was in the middle of his sermon as the steer ran up the centre aisle. The people started to their feet and several of the women and children screamed. For a minute it seemed as if there would be a panic, but happily one member of the congregation who had had some experience with cattle, went to the steer and drove it out of the church. The excitement then subsided and the sermon was resumed. Probably the steer was as much scared by its novel surroundings as the people were, and the man who extricated it from its strange refuge did a service to both the people and the steer. Troubles have often arisen in churches from the presence of people who are as much out of place there as the steer was; but in those cases a better method than expulsion is to beseech God for them that their nature may be changed. (II Cor. 2: 7.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, addressed the intermediate department of the Sunday School at Ocean Grove on Aug. 10. The gathering was the largest of the season. He also addressed the Young People's gathering in the morning.

It is Reported that the Sultan of Turkey has ordered the repair, at a cost of $400,000, of the old aqueducts of Solomon at Jerusalem, which were in working order in the time of Christ.

Dr. George F. Pentecost is taking a brief vacation from the duties of his London Church. He has arranged to preach for Dr. John Hall in New York on the first three Sundays in September.

One of Great Britain's most devoted and hard-working evangelists is dead. The English journals say that Mr. John M. Scroggie, who was laboring at Haddington, near Edinburgh, died on August 1.

Rev. Alexander Maclaren, the Distinguished Baptist preacher of Manchester, England, intends visiting this country the coming autumn. Efforts will be made to have him give one or more lectures at the Chicago University.

Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, the London Methodist minister, is suffering from severe illness, the result of overstrain of the nervous system. He has been compelled to cancel all his engagements and retire to the Continent for rest.

Father Chiniquy has been Celebrating his eighty-fifth birthday. A large number of Canadian Protestants subscribed to present him with a handsome testimonial in recognition of his labors and sufferings in the Protestant cause.

Mr. T. V. Powderly, ex-chief of the Knights of Labor, was asked recently what was the shortest distance that the law should interpose between a saloon and the nearest school-house. He replied, "Not less than five hundred miles would be my law if I had the making of it."

A Missionary at Chefoo, China, reports that he had been holding a service for the baptism of converts just before writing. One of the candidates was a man seventy-five years old. He had been brought to the service in a wheelbarrow from his home five miles away, by his son who was already a member of the Christian church.

The Christian Church of all Denominations has suffered a loss in the death of the eminent Biblical scholar, Dr. James Strong of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. Strong was Professor of Exegetical Theology at Drew Theological Seminary. He was a member of the Anglo-American Commission for the Revision of the Bible. He was also one of the editors of McClintock & Strong's Bible Cyclopedia.

Mrs. George Wilcox, of Brooklyn, a daughter of the late Rev. W. I. Budington, formerly pastor of the Clinton Avenue Congregational Church, of Brooklyn, has offered to erect a chapel in memory of her father in connection with Mr. Moody's boys' school at Mt. Hermon. Mr. Moody had named the site Temptation Hill, and when he took visitors to see it, he told them he had given it that name in the hope that some one might be tempted to build a chapel upon it.

Mr. John Wanamaker has made a study of the plans of practical helpfulness carried on in several London churches during his stay in that city, and proposes to introduce several of them at his Bethany Church in Philadelphia. He says that he hopes to make the church a helpful place to the people who are attached directly or indirectly to the church and Sunday School, not only in the line of religious privileges, but in lines of practical and industrial education, including whatever will help young people, with limited opportunities, to make the most of their lives.

In a Palankeen to Jericho.

A Grotesque Vehicle, but Comfortable Enough—Historical Places Noted in Passing—Syrian Shepherds—The Khan of the Good Samaritan.

THE romantic reader of Oriental fable and travel conjures up at the word "Palankeen," a vision of luxury which will be dashed by a description of the conveyance as it is brought up to the hotel-door on this fine and frosty December morning. It is not a curtained litter, piled with silken cushions, borne upon mens' shoulders; neither is it a sedan chair swung between gilded poles. A stout wooden box, open in front, and half-way to the back on the sides, is fitted upon two pairs of shafts, one behind, one in front. A glass window, working upon hinges, is let into each side, and over these hang red curtains. A bench fastened into the rear end of the interior is cushioned with red stuff; a mat lies on the foot.

At first sight the vehicle strikes one as clumsy, unwieldy and grotesquely ugly. A mule is harnessed within each pair of shafts; rugs, a railway pillow and my satchel are bestowed within, and I mount to my carriage by means of a step-ladder, held firm by David himself. I was inclined to laugh when this feature of Oriental magnificence was first submitted for my approval, but in previous journeys to that upon which we are now bound, I have learned to appreciate the shelter and comfort it affords, and respite from the saddle when one is weary, or not well, is grateful in the extreme. Packed in among downy cushions, swathed in furs and soft woollens, with abundance of room for limbs that tire of one position in the long marches, I do not grudge Mrs. Lott's her carriage and high prancing pair, as the muleteer gives the word and the little caravan sets forward through the Jaffa gate. Some women have complained to me that the swing of a palankeen made them slightly sea-sick for a few hours. Although a wretched sailor upon the water, I have never known the slightest nausea in this ungainly equipage. The motion is precisely what one feels in the saddle on the back of a fairly well-gaited horse. It is not as smooth as that of a carriage built over elastic springs, but the comparative roughness has ample compensation in the roominess of the interior and opportunity for change of position when one is cramped by sitting.

We were once jocosely critical over the quantity of timber in the body and shafts of my "coach." Experience has proved the need of stanchness and solidity; nevertheless, as we jog along the first familiar stages of our route, I fall to musing upon what manner of conveyance I would have constructed in America, and presented to my faithful dragoman, had I the means to compass this end. It should be light and strong, weather-tight, and upheld by such springs as only American carriage-builders know how to make, and be gratefully dedicated to the use of American women-tourists—

A halt is called, and I arouse myself to inquire why. David, gorgeous in profession-

salem for some days. We pass Gethsemane, dispensing a few coins to still the husky shrillness of the lepers' cry; skirt the Mount of Olives, and, diverging to the right, fall into line upon the Bethany road, an excellent thoroughfare for seven miles—almost half-way to Jericho. After we have left the mean hamlet of Bethany behind us, we begin the descent between hills that grew more and more barren, as we go on. The olive is the only tree to be seen, and the groves of this become rarer and smaller. At the juncture of the Bethany highway with a comparatively disused track leading to Bethpage, waits a mounted and dignified figure—the shiek who is to be our safe conduct as we go "down from Jerusalem to Jericho." He and David ride together; Alcides falls back to the side of my palankeen; Serkeese trots on ahead with his queer-looking load. It is a taciturn company when we are bound upon an all-day expedition. The road winds down into a tortuous valley, at the head of which David reins up his horse and waits our approach. A small, half-ruined khan planted upon the edge of the way has a reason for being in a well opposite to it, and lower by twenty feet or thereabouts. Both are very old, the situation of a khan usually remaining the same for countless generations, particularly when it is in the vicinity of a spring of living water. Some one at the hotel spoke of this well last night as probably En-shemesh, one of the division-lines between Judah and Benjamin.

Be this as it may, this was the route by which he came up from the Jericho where he had dined with Zaccheus, and in departing from which he had made the blind Bartimeus to see.

All signs of human habitation fail us as we proceed. High hills line the highway, ridged by natural terraces, treeless, and at this time of year, sere to the summits. The heights, with their naked ledges, remind us of nothing more forcibly than of gigantic skeletons from which the flesh has wasted and dropped away. The silence is profound and awful. The clink of the horses' iron hoofs upon the rock-bedded road and the harsh call of the muleteers to the patient beasts are all that we hear for miles together. Another—and a credible—tradition is committed to us in a defile, an hour's journey beyond the Apostles' Fountain. Hereabouts, it is believed, Shimei came out from Bahurim, "and as David and his men went by the way, Shimei went along on the hill's side over against him, and cursed as he went, and threw stones at him and cast dust."

As we read the tale, imagination is quick with the picture of the royal father's flight between the hills, and there is cordial, although may be, unholly sympathy expressed with rude Abishai's outbreak: "Why should this dead dog curse my lord the king? Let me go over, I pray thee, and take off his head!" We can almost see the foul-tongued son of Gera—whose behavior, after the king's restoration was a convincing proof that the bully is always the coward,—leaping from one to another projection of the hill-side, to hurl down missiles upon the fugitives who "came weary and refreshed themselves there."

On, on we ride, between sad and silent heights, over waterless ravines, whose pebbly beds will be washed and tossed by turbulent floods after the spring rains. The glare of the white rocks is now and then relieved by curious pink strata, sometimes deepening al gear, rides to my side to prefer the petition of a native photographer to "take" the palankeen and the escort. The picture here-with presented gives so correct an impression of the procession and the place—a stone-strewn olive-orchard on the lowest slope of Olivet—that I commend a study of the novel scene to the curious and interested. The camp and camp-appointments have gone forward, leaving to me as attendants, Serkeese, grinning from the top of the swathed luncheon-tent and hamper; the two muleteers; Alcides, upon Massoud, and disguised in hunting shirt, fez and kafevah, and David Jamal upon Dervish. The foremost posts of the palankeen are wreathed with leaves and flowers in honor of our "fresh start."

"Now," calls out Alcides from the van, as we are released from the glaring eye of the camera, "We can all go to Jericho!"

"Quite so, sir!" replies the only hearer besides myself who comprehends an English sentence, a grave response that may or may not signify familiarity with American slang.

For our destination is Jericho, and we are to be absent from our headquarters in Jeru-

"The waters of En-shemesh, and the goings out thereof, were as Eurogel." ("The Fuller's Fountain," reads the margin.) "And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite; the same is Jerusalem."

Our guide has a more interesting story of the waters:

"Called 'The Apostles' Fountain,' because of the tradition that Christ our Lord, on his last journey to Jerusalem, rested here while telling his disciples that he was going up to be betrayed and crucified. He was on his way from Jericho, you see, and not yet come to Bethpage, near the Mount of Olives. It is only a tradition—but it might have been."

"It might have been," for the ruined wall and part of a roof of the ancient caravan-serai are distinctly Roman, and the spring is perennial. What more natural than that the "taking of the twelve disciples apart in the way" may have been at the foot of the ascent upon the summit of which he was to meet the "great multitudes" and their shouts of "Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is he that coming in the name of the Lord!"

into rose-color. At long intervals, we see high up on the breast of the mountain mingled flocks of sheep and goats, feeding together, while the shepherd, wrapped in his brown-and-white mantle, stands or sits near. Here, we observe for the first time, an illustration of the division of the mixed herd prophesied by our Lord, and to which our attention was once called by Dr. Webster, the devoted missionary of Haiti. A shepherd, walking before the flocks, a sickly lamb tucked away close to his warm body inside of his thick garment, called them, as he went, in a peculiar note, plaintive, yet penetrating which we could hear plainly half-a-mile away. The sheep followed him in a long steady line,—the black goats straggled hither and yon, cropping the herbage, running races, scampering up rocks at the left and right, until we wondered how he could ever collect and finally get them safely to the fold.

"And when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him; for they know his voice."

Alcides spurs up a hillside to have audience with a shepherd, whose garment of goat's hair is wrapped about him as gracefully as ever Roman senator wore toga and gallops back in proud possession of a veritable pastoral pipe. The sounds evoke from it by the new owner are weak and shrill, yet "carry" well in the still air.

"Do you suppose that the boy-shepherd of Bethlehem played psalm-tunes upon a machine like this?" winds up the performance, "One could get better music out of a penny whistle."

The classic instrument is about eight inches in length and consists of two reeds, each pierced on one side with six breathing holes. They are fastened longitudinally together with rosin, and into the upper end are fitted two movable mouth-pieces, attached to the pipe by a twine string. It is a primitive affair, but looks as if it might have capabilities—in the right hands.

Noon is near when we espy the Hathrur Khan, or the Khan of the Good Samaritan. Having always supposed the story of the man who fell among thieves upon this road to be merely a parable related with a specific purpose, we are surprised to learn that it is here considered that our Lord made use of a real incident, as historic as the fall of the Tower of Siloam, in answering the lawyer's question—"Who is my neighbor?" The Jericho road has been for twenty centuries the haunt of banditti. Even yet, peaceable husbandmen conveying crops to the Jerusalem market, or returning with the proceeds of their merchandise, are often set upon by watchful predatory tribes, and robbed. It is certain that the site of this wayside khan is very old, and that it has borne for hundreds of years the name of "him who showed mercy" to a feudal foe. It is almost certain that our Lord, journeying, as usual, on foot with his disciples, stayed his progress to the City where he was to offer the last and Greatest Sacrifice for sinning humanity, and rested here, perhaps for the mid-day meal, as we are now doing.

The khan is a big shed, with a courtyard in the back, as new as it is uncomely, but the foundations are ancient. Upon an overlooking hill are the ruins of a Roman watch-tower from which is an extensive view of the defiles of approach in all directions.

Palankeen and mules are left without; human beings lunch in the vast, bare chamber, open at the back toward the courtyard in which the horses are tethered. David hovers about us to be sure that we are comfortable; the sheik mounts guard without, perched in a niche of the archway, cigarette between his fingers, his eyes closed in meditation or slumber. The hum of conversation from another party of tourists and the chatter of the muleteers in the road, disperse thinly into the vast silences that encompass us in what is, for all we can see or hear, desolation without an inhabitant.

The Moody Gospel Fund.

Offerings Still Pouring in for the Cause From Many Quarters.

THE past week shows no diminution in the interest our readers have shown in the success of the Moody Gospel Fund, and the contributions have been liberal. Among the many letters received, we cannot refrain from quoting from two that are especially touching in the earnest desire they reveal for the success of this great spiritual movement.

Mrs. H—, writing from Mount Vernon, N. Y., says: "I have been much interested in Mr. Moody's efforts in the Bible Institute, Chicago. It is a grand work and much needed. I should like greatly to help it along. I have some diamond studs belonging to a dear and only son, who has recently died and I should like to give them to the work."

A lady in Pekin, Ill., writes: "There is no cause I am more anxious to assist than this. I have a handsome silk quilt—many pieces are painted and embroidered, and it is by all pronounced very pretty. I should be willing to give it to the Moody cause."

We cannot accept such sacrifices or permit friends to part with treasures which they have doubtless prized very highly, and we have written them accordingly.

The contributions to the Fund during the week have been as follows:

THE TRIBULATIONS.

Three Distinct Times of Trouble Predicted in the New Testament.

BY REV. W. MAUDE.

IT will be quite apparent to the careful reader of the New Testament that our Lord and his Apostles speak of several perfectly distinct "tribulations;" the confounding of which has been the occasion of not a little perplexity and confusion in many minds. We can clearly distinguish three tribulations as referred to in the New Testament, and to point out wherein these differ either in time or character, is our object in the following paper.

1. In the first place, then, we find both the Lord Jesus Christ and the apostles Paul and John referring to what we shall take leave to call the Tribulation of the Church. Of this our Lord himself speaks when he says, "These things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." (John 16: 33.) And again, when in answer to the statement of Peter, as the spokesman of the apostolic band, "Lo, we have left all, and have followed thee," He replied in these remarkable words: "Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake and the Gospel's, but he shall receive a hundredfold now in this time houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands, with persecutions." (Mark 10: 28, 30.) To which words of the Lord Jesus it is probable that Paul referred when he exhorted the disciples at Lystra, Iconium and Antioch to continue in the faith, reminding them that "we must, through much tribulation, enter into the Kingdom of God." (Acts 14: 22.) While John subscribes himself to the seven churches in Asia as their "brother and companion (or fellow-partaker) in the tribulation and kingdom and endurance in Jesus Christ." (Rev. 1: 9.)

This, "the tribulation in Jesus," or in other words, the Church's tribulation, is commensurate with her earthly existence. Its sources are obvious and constant. Consciousness of her own failure, the latent when not overt hostility of the world, the malignity of Satan and his hosts, and the gracious educative discipline of her divine Husband and Lord; these are ever more or less in operation, and serve to make the pathway of the Church one of suffering and tribulation from her Pentecostal birth-day to the time of her gathering together in the presence of her returning Lord, at the sounding of the last trumpet. Nevertheless there have, doubtless, been special seasons in the history of the Church when she has been called upon to endure tribulation of unwonted severity, when the furnace has been heated seven times more than it is wont to be heated, as when it is said to the Church in Smyrna, "Ye shall have tribulation ten days" (Rev. 2: 10); supposed by some to have reference to the ten great Pagan persecutions through which, as we learn from secular historians, the early Church had to pass.

2. Of this tribulation of the Church it is not our intention to speak particularly at present; and therefore, having thus briefly indicated its separate and special character, we may at once proceed to notice in the second place, the tribulation of Israel. This was most distinctly and emphatically predicted by the Lord Jesus in what is called "the Prophecy on the Mount," recorded in the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of the Gospel according to Matthew, and also, more succinctly, in the thirteenth chapter of the Gospel according to Mark, and the twenty-first chapter of the Gospel according to Luke. In the first of the narratives, having referred to the "abomination of desolation of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the Holy place;" a prediction which certainly received, at least, an inchoate fulfilment in the planting of the standards of the Roman legions—the eagles upon which were objects of idolatrous worship to the Roman soldiers—in the lines of the besieging army under Vespasian, and their subsequent setting upon the site of the Temple after the taking of Jerusalem by Titus; our Lord gives a warning to "them that are in Jerusalem to flee to the mountains;" a warning which we know the Jewish Christians actually obeyed by fleeing to Pella, a town on the northern boundary of Peræa.

THE ALTERNATIVES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning September 9. John 3: 16-21, 31, 36.

VARIOUS images are used in the passage selected for the topic to indicate the difference in the two types of character referred to. There are those who believe and those who believe not; those who do truth and those who do evil; he that comes from above and he that is of the earth; he who will not be condemned and he who is condemned already; he who hath everlasting life and he who will not see life. The difference, it will be seen is no mere difference of surface but a radical difference in nature. There is one who comes from above, who believes, who does truth and has everlasting life; and there is another who is of the earth. He believes not, does evil, is already condemned and will not see life. This is a revelation, but it is also a matter of experience. We see it around us and we see it within us. The two natures exist side by side, the one tending ever upward and the other ever downward. The end of each is the end which our own consciousness foresees and approves. To the one comes destruction and to the other everlasting life. It must be so; otherwise we should be unable to understand the moral character of God and the principles of his government. The evil in the individual must perish and if the evil permeates and controls the individual he perishes with it, because when the evil is eliminated there is nothing left of him to live.

The important fact, which Jesus revealed is that it is possible to pass from one category to the other. The man conscious of belonging to the earthly and the evil need not bemoan his fate in despair. He may be delivered from his doom by a change of nature, may as Jesus said, be born again. Only by such a change can he hope to really live in this world and have everlasting life in the next. This change comes, as is intimated, by believing or as it is termed in theology, by faith. Faith is the bond which connects us with Christ and from him power and life enter into the nature. The earthly or animal part of the personality is no longer supreme, the thoughts are no longer occupied with material concerns, the appetites and passions are restrained and put under subjection and the higher nature gains strength, develops and rules. How this change is worked we know not. It is mystery but it is a fact. Contact with Jesus—the contact that is established by faith transforms the whole being and the man has a new life. We know in a lower degree how companionship with a noble nature, a friendship with a pure and elevated person affects us and the same effect in infinitely greater degree comes by union with Christ. He imparts life the pure life of the heavens and the man is no longer earthly but becomes a child of God.

THE OAKLAND Y. M. C. A.

The building, a picture of which appears on this page, is the home of the Young Men's Christian Association of Oakland, Cal. It is situated on a suitable site at the corner of Clay and Twelfth Streets, where it is accessible to the young men of all parts of the city. The Association was organized in Oakland in 1879 and was received with enthusiasm. The population at that time was small but the list of membership soon contained nearly two hundred names. It has increased with the growth of the city until now with a population of about 58,000 it has over five hundred members. The idea of owning its own building was a cherished hope from the early days of the Association's history, but it was not until 1891 that the project took definite shape. The series of revival meetings held by Messrs. Moody and Sankey and other evangelists on the Pacific Coast about that time gave an impetus to the movement and eventually sufficient funds were in hand to justify the beginning of building operations. The handsome structure which is now the property of the Association cost $43,000 of which all but $15,000 has been paid and of this pledges to the amount of $5,000 are in hand.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE HOUSE.

The continued success of the Epworth settlement in Boston, Mass., is reported. A correspondent of the "Epworth Herald" who is one of the workers in the institution says: A comfortable house has been hired, and there a company of earnest young people are living, doing pioneer work "for Jesus' sake." The North End was once the finest residential part of the city. Now it is the district of the slums. Immigration has come in tidal waves. First the Irish came, and the Americans went. Then the Italians invaded, and the sons of Erin fled. Then the Jews arrived, and the Portuguese and Italians are there in small colonies. Our people abandoned the field some years since. Last December, however, Dr. Chadbourne, presiding-elder at that time, organized a new Methodist Church once more at the North End. It started with seventy members, and was "pentecostal" in that nearly all "kindreds and tribes" were represented. Nine Portuguese, one Jew, one Swede, and ten Americans were received as probationers, and seven Americans by letter. Jewish, Italian, and Portuguese classes were formed.

This settlement now established is officially under the care of the City Missionary and Church Extension Society, Rev. E. J. Helms is the faithful superintendent. The Epworth Leagues, however, do much in paying the rent of the house, $650 a year, which is given now by the chapters all over New England. Some assume the rent for a week, some for a month, while some send any amount they can secure. The Epworth Leagues are helping also in the flower Mission connected with the settlement, in providing Sunday-morning breakfasts, and in holding meetings in an empty stable belonging to the Electric Car Company.

THE PERSONAL TOUCH.

At the recent Convention of Baptist Young People's Unions at Toronto, one of the most important questions considered was that of winning the associate members into the ranks of the active members. An excellent paper on the subject was read by Rev. W. H. Geistweit, of Minneapolis. From the report of it in the "Baptist Union," we take the two following incidents, which may be valuable to members of other young people's societies:

Two illustrations, one from personal experience, will give you the heart of my subject as I see it: In a great meeting a young man was leaning forward on the back of a seat, with his face covered by his hands. There were many like him, and the workers were all too few. "Go speak to that young man," was the loving command of the leader to another young man who happened to be in the forefront of Young People's work in that church. Fear took possession of him, he trembled as a leaf, and said, "O, I cannot go, I never did such a thing before; I am not able to do it." The leader was firm in his loving demand. "You must go," he said. Going down the aisle, he dropped into the seat of the young man, put his arm over his shoulder, and in a half ingly to the sidewalk; I at once said to her, 'Let me help you, Aunt,' and took her by the arm and helped her to the sidewalk; as I turned away, she looked up into my face and said, 'O, sir, I wish you was as kind to my Master as you are to me.' That brought me, sir; your sermon had no effect—but I couldn't get rid of that simple soul's desire for me."

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A Baptist Young People's Union has been organized at Perry, Oklahoma. This is the first Union organized in the strip.

The Young Women's Christian Association of Brisbane, Queensland, has commenced a work among sailors which has been greatly blessed. The sailors have proved very appreciative of the interest taken in them and the temperance and religious influences have both been used with good effect.

Two Christian Endeavor churches have been built in the West by the Societies of the Reformed Church. One of them is located at Edgerton, Minn., and the other at Wakonda, S. D. The Societies are now engaged in raising funds to build a church at Johnstown, N. Y.

One of the most pleasing features of the marked advance of Christian Endeavor in England, last year, was the fact that 3,878 members of Christian Endeavor Societies joined the Church.

Montana has followed other States in adopting the idea of having a special State Christian Endeavor Day. The day chosen was July 1, and it was observed by sunrise prayer meetings and by rallies in the evening.

Meetings on the Hamlin Race Track are being held by a St. Paul, (Minn.), Epworth League. Five hundred men are employed in connection with the races, including the jockeys and stable-men. The meetings are held for their benefit and are largely attended. The racing men have expressed their appreciation of this interest in their welfare.

The danger of admitting to the Y. M. C. A. base-ball team young men who are not members of the Y. M. C. A., has been proved in a Western Association. The non-members aided by a few members, who should have known better, and led by a professional base-ball player, who was captain of the team voted for Sunday playing and carried it. Now the Y. M. C. A. is considering how to save itself from the disgrace of having its name borne by a team which plays on Sundays.

The Christian Endeavor Union of Canton, O., issues an annual directory of its nine societies which has been found very useful to members and visitors. Each Society has a page to itself, and there is one page for general announcements. The page devoted to each Society contains the name of the church, its location, the name of the pastor and his residence, the meeting-time of the Society, its enrolment, its officers and their addresses, chairmen of the various committees and their addresses, and the date of organization.

The Committees of an Australian Christian Endeavor Society have chosen for themselves mottoes, and these mottoes are hung up about the room in which the society meets. The motto of the Look-out committee is, "Trim your lamps and be ready;" of the Prayer-meeting committee, "Watch and pray;" of the Visiting committee, "Jesus invites you"; of the Music committee, "Our song shall be for Jesus."

The five volumes of the Epworth League reading course are: "The New Generation," by Edwin A. Schell, D.D.; "Christianity and the Christ," by Bradford Paul Raymond, President of Wesleyan University; "Abraham Lincoln, the First American," by David D. Thompson; "Between Two Flags," by Maud B. Booth; and "Imago Christi," by Rev. James Stalker, D.D. They have been issued by Cranston & Curtis of Chicago, in uniform binding at $2.50 the set.

Nearing the Harvest.

The Season of Greatest Activity among Agriculturists at Hand—Life on the Great Farms of the West.

A FEW more weeks will usher in the harvest over a very large portion of the farming states. Formerly, the East held the agricultural palm in America, but this supremacy has long since passed over to the great grain-raising sections of the West, which now raise enough food, as some statisticians have claimed, to supply the world. A farmer's life is no longer what it used to be. Tillage by old-fashioned plough, ox team and mule have been rendered unprofitable by many labor-saving inventions that have been devised for the farmer, and if he would compete on equal terms with his neighbors, the agriculturist must now do the heavier and more laborious portion of his work by steam.

In our illustration on this page, some idea is furnished of the methods employed in progressive farming. The scene presented is the harvesting of a wheat-field on one of the great farms in South Dakota. A long line of harvesters is seen busily reaping the grain in a field which probably embraces many hundreds of acres. Some fields are even thousands of acres in extent. On the great Dalrymple farm situated in what is known as "The Wheat Belt," there are over 50,000 acres in wheat alone. The belt runs through North and South Dakota and Minnesota, and within its boundaries are the largest farms in the world—vast tracts, whose dimensions would have astonished our immediate ancestors, who were contented with from 20 to 100 acres, and viewed the quarter-section farms of the new West as needlessly large. But improved machinery and the application of steam have now made it possible for an energetic farmer to undertake the cultivation of miles of grain land, where acres would have taxed his facilities before. He now uses steam for threshing, ploughing, hauling and reaping, and it is not an infrequent sight to witness on these huge Western farms as many as twenty tireless, puffing machines in line, all busily at work, performing the labor of many hundreds of men.

Farmers generally do not view the vast farms, such as we have described, with much favor. They hold that, while they have greatly increased the product of the soil, they have been the cause of reducing prices to a point that has made moderate-sized farms unprofitable. The farmer with 200 or 250 acres and simple appliances cannot compete with his 10,000 or 20,000 acre neighbor, whose wealth enables him to equip his farm with steam machinery and who is served by an army of laborers lacking the skill and knowledge required of the other's employees, who must know how to swing a scythe, handle a cradle, hold the plough, sow the seed and a thousand other things that went to make up the practical farmer. The result is that in some sections the small farmer is disappearing and the land is coming into the hands of those who conduct agricultural operations on a wholesale basis. Besides, many large tracts are now tenured in for pasturage and held for speculation, being rented for just enough to pay the taxes and keep the fences in repair.

Social life on the great Western farms of the wheat belt has its advantages as well as its drawbacks. It is not as lonely as on free surroundings and few recreations cannot compensate for the absence of many comforts and privileges enjoyed elsewhere.

Victoria's Early Piety.
Even as a child Victoria was piously inclined. Until she was twelve years old she did not know that she was heir to the throne: at that age she found it out by a genealogical tree being left in her way. On asking if it was really true that she was the next to reign, and being informed that it was, she said, "Now many a child would boast, but they don't know the difficulty: there is much splendor but more responsibility." Then raising her right hand, she added, "I will be good." Years after, when the archbishop of Canterbury and the lord chamberlain came to tell her majesty of her accession, she was roused from sleep at five o'clock in the morning. As soon as she was told that she was queen of Great Britain, with a strong sense of her need of God's help in her new responsibility, she turned to the archbishop, and kneeling down said, "Let us pray."

The Industrious Lady Spider.
In a recent lecture in Boston, Professor Wood dealt with the phenomena of spider life. In one tribe the female is one thousand three hundred times as large as the male. Three kinds of thread are spun. One of great strength for the radiating or spoke

HARVEST SCENE ON A SOUTH DAKOTA FARM.

A HARVEST HYMN
THANK God that on a thousand hills
His summer gift the landscape fills;
And reapers in the joyous morn
Are busy with the ripened corn.
Thank God for coverlets of snow
That kept the corn-seed warm below;
And for the patient Mother Earth
That nursed and fed it from its birth.

Thank God for all the generous rains,
And the hot sunshine on the plains;
And that the season's gray and gold
Brought increase of a hundred-fold.

Thank God for all the corn that stands
In other fields of other lands;
And that where'er his children roam,
Some grateful hearts sing, "Harvest Home."

Thank God with life as well as lip,
With holy prayer and fellowship;
With holier hope and nobler aim,
Sing praises to the Father's name.

Thank him who for our joy and rest
Has made the Father manifest;
And for his kingdom that shall come,
With righteousness for Harvest Home.

SHADOWTOWN.
SWAY to and fro in the twilight gray,
This is the ferry from Shadowtown,
It always sails at the end of day,
Just as the darkness closes down.
Rest, little head, on my shoulder, so:
A sleepy kiss is the only fare,
Drifting away from the world we go,
Baby and I in the rocking-chair.
See where the fire-logs glow and spark
Glitter the lights of the shadowland,
The raining drops on the window, hark!
Are ripples lapping upon its strand.
There, where the mirror is glancing dim,
A lake lies shimmering, cool and still,
Blossoms are waving above its brim,
Those over there on the window-sill.
Rock slow, more slow in the dusky light,
Silently lower the anchor down,
Dear little passenger, say "Good night!"
We've reached the harbor of Shadowtown.

MORE "CHILD-FANCIES."
I HAVE a little child in my kindergarten who has all the instincts and thoughts of a poet, writes Miriam McKenzie. She sees the dandelion and she exclaims, "Look, the stars have dropped down, Miss Katy." We went into the country one day, and I found her listening attentively to the humming of the bees. She looked up at me with a sweet stillness in her pretty eyes. "I'm listening to the bees murmuring in the grass," she whispered. She saw the cobwebs strung from twig to twig, and in her fanciful way she declared that the fairies had "put their clothes lines up," for their gossamer dresses to dry. When we came out of the woods to call the cab for our homeward journey, she alone stood at the edge of this song-thrilled retreat, and looking back into its depths said in farewell, "Back in there, Miss Katy, is the blooming May." Her mother brought me once a little verse she had heard her singing over some flowers:

O, my little roses dear,
I will pluck and put you here,
In the vase I put you, too,
And it wets your toes all through.

Of course, this merely shows a natural turn for making words rhyme, but if this same poetical child should grow to maturity and talk about the dandelions as "stars from the sky," in a "poem," she would be laughed at as a plagiarist, though the idea originated in that fresh little mind as surely as it did in the mind of one who wrote of the yellow flower:

Continuous as the stars that shine,
And twinkle in the milky way.

Look on the Bright Side.
Cultivate sunny-heartedness, writes Rev. Philip Graer, and you will have a priceless charm for brightening existence and hushing troubled waters into happy peace. Form the habit of giving cheer and encouragement to others, never uttering needlessly a disheartening word. Don't quench hope, or throw cold water on reasonable enthusiasm, or chill ardor, or create an atmosphere of censure and fault-finding, but make folks tingle to the finger-tips with the heartiness and spontaneity of your presence and greeting. Make others happy and you cannot help but be benefited. Don't let the black-pinioned raven's croak drown the skylark's note. Always look on the bright side.

the smaller farms, since there are usually several hundreds of employees—in fact a little community. The workers live in tenant houses that are comfortable enough, but nothing more. They are poorly paid, as a rule, and the life is a hard one with few relaxations. Winter is occupied in taking care of stock, and the spring, summer and autumn are all seasons of labor in the field, the latter the busiest. There is usually a little chapel or meeting-room in the settlement, where divine worship is held, though not always regularly: still the opportunities for both social and religious gatherings is better at such places than among the widely-scattered small farms, where neighbors often live miles apart from each other, and where attending church means a long, arduous journey, sometimes an impossibility in winter or during the rains. Dwellers in cities and towns know little of the hardships and disadvantages of such a life, whose lines of the web: the cross lines, or what a sailor might call the ratlines, are finer and are tenacious: that is, they have upon them little specks or globules of a very sticky gum. These specks are put on with even interspaces. They are set quite thickly along the line, and are what in the first instance, catch and hold the wings of the fly. Once caught in this fashion the prey is held securely by threads flung over it somewhat in the manner of a lasso. The third kind of silk is that which the spider throws out in a mass of flood, by which it suddenly envelops any prey of which it is somewhat afraid, as for example a wasp. A scientific experiment once drew out from the body of a single spider three thousand four hundred and eighty yards of thread or spider silk—a length little short of two miles. Silk may be woven of spider's thread, and it is more glossy and brilliant than that of the silkworm.

PRECEPTS AND PROMISES.

Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York City, by Rev. R. S.

MacArthur, D.D. Text: II Chronicles 7: 14: "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land."

THESE words were spoken by God in connection with the consecration of the Temple. David had it in his heart to build a house unto his God; but, being a man of war, he was not permitted to perform this sacred service. This high honor came to his son Solomon, who was a man of peace, his very name signifying "Peaceful," or "Pacific." He was "chosen to sit on the throne of the Kingdom of the Lord over Israel." David cheerfully resigned the work to Solomon, commanding him "to be strong and to do it." Silently and majestically did the glorious building rise in the sight of men and God. Never was a king more royally engaged than was Solomon when he stood before the altar of the Lord in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands and kneeled down upon his knees, and poured out his heart in prayer unto God. Sacrifices were then offered unto God, and many important relations in life, and the duties attaching to them, were named before the Lord. But without the presence of the ever-living God, Solomon realized that all else was vain, hence the grand Climax of the Prayer:

"Now, therefore, arise, O Lord God, into thy resting-place, thou, and the ark of thy strength."

In connection with these great promises and holy festivities, the Lord of heaven and earth uttered the words chosen as the text. Our attention is directed at once in this verse to the fact that God has a people which are called by his name. God has never left himself without witnesses; in every clime and in every century there have been those who were ready to testify to God and to his truth. God's people are his by purchase on his part and by profession on their part. They are sent into the world as apostles of his truth, and as witnesses of his character. They are peculiarly dear to God, as purchased by his grace and protected by his power. He loves them above all beside in this world. They are dear to him as the apple of his eye; their names are engraven on the palms of his hands; he controls all things for their good and for his own glory. They are the salt of the earth; and that salt has not lost its savor. They are the light of the world; and

That Light has not Gone Out.

In studying this text we are to observe the conditions on which God's people may receive blessings from their heavenly Father. The reference here, though to Israel primarily, is applicable to the church of God to-day. The Church of Christ is now the Israel of God. The church needs all the blessings asked in and promised to the prayer that Solomon made. The church cannot live without spiritual blessing from its divine Head. The church may have great numbers, and yet be spiritually weak; it may have attentive audiences, and but few active members. It may have treasuries filled with money and many other forms of outward prosperity, and yet may be poor, hungry, weak and dying. If we have God's blessing in the conversion of souls and in the spiritual growth of his church, we shall be rich whatever else we lack. But if the spiritual gift be lacking, whatever else we possess, we shall be poor indeed. Christ must reign in our hearts, and rule over our lives, else we shall be powerless for good among men and be joyless in our own souls.

The first condition of blessing here named is that God's people "shall humble themselves." Humility is always a condition of spiritual blessing. The more we grow in grace, the more humble do we become in our own estimation. Attention has often been called to the fact that comparatively soon after his conversion, the Apostle Paul declared himself "unworthy to be called an apostle." But as the years passed, and he grew in grace and knowledge, he said, "I am less than the least of all saints." And as the years still passed and he grew into the stature of the more perfect man in Christ Jesus, and his martyrdom was at hand, he exclaimed, "I am the chief of sinners." It is possible for us to be proud of our supposed absence of pride. Unconsciousness is always a sign of power, and humility is always a sign of growth in divine life. If we had a proper sense of our sinfulness, we never could indulge in spiritual pride. That we are not humble is itself a sufficient cause for humility. Since first we professed Christ's name, we have wandered far from his path and have often brought coldness into our own hearts and dishonor upon his great name. We have been unmindful of the ten thousand blessings which we have received from his hand. His goodness ought to lead us to repentance of heart, and to consecration of life. Humility is evermore the cause of true exaltation. No true eminence is possible except it be preceded by true humility. This was the great and distinguishing quality of the ideal man, the Lord Christ Jesus. He could say with the utmost truthfulness, "I am meek and lowly in heart." He could well therefore urge us to take a lesson from his own spirit and life. The Psalmist could say, "I was brought low, and he helped me." The Lord dwells only with the humble and contrite in heart; the proud he regards afar off. No man is strong until he learns his own weakness; and no man is wise until he realizes his own ignorance. When we are poor and needy, God opens to us the rich treasures of his grace. When in our own esteem we are rich and increased with goods, we are on the verge of spiritual bankruptcy. The first step towards spiritual wealth is a realization of our spiritual poverty. The sacrifices of God are evermore a broken and contrite heart; these he will never despise. O, that we may sit to-day in lowliness of heart at the feet of the Lord's Christ!

The Divine Fulcrum.

Another ground of blessing here specified by God is the spirit and act of prayer. Prayer stands closely related to the condition of humility. Archimedes, after his discovery of the lever, affirmed that if he could but have a fulcrum he could raise the foundation of the whole earth. Prayer is the divine fulcrum; if it be fixed upon God and heaven it will raise the earth to heaven; it will change all our earthly conditions, and transfer us into the likeness of Christ, and earth into the image of heaven. A man who lives in the enjoyment of God's blessing and presence prays as naturally as he breathes. All Christians spend too little time in communion with God. There should be secret prayer. Our Lord gives us wise instruction at this point. Those who pray to God secretly are honored of God publicly; in secret communion strength is gained for public conflict. After the sun had set and before it was up, we find Christ engaged in prayer. The great crises of Christ's life were passed alone with God. The truest, grandest and sublimest lives can never be attained simply in the excitement of public duties. No tree can send a vigorous trunk into the air, except it send down a vigorous tap-root into the soil; there must ever be a close relation between the spreading roots and the spreading branches. Men may live a life of noisy activity for God, but it will be largely a barren life, if there be not times of secret communion with God. In the shades of the garden, Christ won the victory over the sorrows of the cross. When he came forth victorious from Gethsemane, he was crowned victor over the agony of Calvary. There will always be a time and place for secret prayer for the truly devout heart. Isaac may find his in the fields; David his on his bed; Daniel his with his windows open toward Jerusalem; Christ his on the lonely mountains; Peter his on the house-tops; General Havelock his by rising at four o'clock in the morning if the marching hour was six; Luther his somewhere praying for hours, when the duties of the day were especially numerous and heavy; and Knox and Baxter theirs, however perplexing were their public duties. And so praying these heroic saints stirred nations and blessed the world.

Family Prayer.

There also ought to be family prayer. A prayerless home is a roofless house. Such a house is built upon the sand and one day it will fall. Let the family altar be erected in your home; let the flame of daily devotion brightly burn thereon. Perhaps, once it was erected, but now it has fallen down; perhaps once faith was strong and love was tender; but now both are weak and the voice of prayer is hushed. Business now intrudes; family cares have multiplied; the father hurries away and God is not, at least formally, recognized. O, men and women let not these things be. Wife and mother, you can open the holy book, re-erect the altar and beside it kneel with your little ones. Do not neglect to rekindle the sacred fire. Dare not trifle with God. You and those you love are at his mercy. Beware, how you treat the God of heaven and earth in whose hand your breath is, and whose are all your ways.

The text teaches us, also, that if we are ready to receive blessings from God, we are to seek his face. Have we wandered from God? Has his service become tiresome and his presence irksome? Then we must go back to God.

All who are to receive blessings from God must "turn from their wicked ways." This is an eminently practical requirement. There may be outward humility without inward reality; there may be prayers long and loud, public and private; there may be much prayer-meeting talk for Christ and of religion.

What is the Daily Life?

What are our actions? That is a fine remark made by Emerson, "What care I for what you say, when what you do sits above my head and thunders so loud that I cannot hear what you say." Evermore, actions speak louder than words. Do men see in us the honesty, the manliness, the saintliness of the true Christian? A man may be a very saint in the sanctuary, and a very Satan on the street. The world is quick to detect the ring of spurious coin; but the counterfeit is a witness to the existence of pure gold, for men do not counterfeit lead. Even a true Christian may, for a time, walk in wickedness. David did, Peter did, and so many since have done. If you are a true Christian you will be penitently brought back. God will lay on the rod because you are a child; do not refuse to listen to your Father's voice. The path of return may be rough, but you will have to travel it.

We now come to God's conditional promise—"Then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land." This is a most gracious promise. Evermore God's precepts and promises are found side by side. This is not an arbitrary arrangement on the part of God; for only as we obey the commands are we prepared to enjoy the blessing which God gives us. Were God to give us blessings while we refused to give him obedience, there would be an illustration of Christ's words, "casting pearls before swine."

The first part of the promise is, "then will I hear from heaven." The thought of a God who sees and hears what is done and said on earth is overwhelming to evil men. God does not sit in selfish indifference to the needs of men, while receiving the praises of saints and seraphs. There is a philosophical conception of God which is utterly unphilosophical; a conception which represents him as being too great to notice the needs and to listen to the cries of the children of men. That conception degrades God; his greatness is best seen when he is noting the fall of a sparrow and hearing the cry of his feeble children. In the first verse of the 40th Psalm we have the words, "He inclined unto me, and heard my cry." The word translated "inclined" really means that God bowed, that God bent forward to hearken, as if he would place his ear near the mouth of the supplicant. That is a marvellous representation of the greatness as truly as it is of the goodness of God. We are told that at Crete there was a statue of Jupiter which was devoid of ears; such a statement is a true representation of the god of certain agnostic philosophers in all the ages. But such is not the description of God as given in the Bible. Our God has an ear to hear, a heart to pity, and a hand to help. His ear is not heavy that it cannot hear, nor his arm shortened that it cannot save. Our King, the King of kings, is at any moment of the day or night, and in any place in which the cry goes up to his ear. We have read of the British soldier in India who was lying near death. He had long neglected the calls of God, but was now anxious to find mercy. He remembered a Christian friend living 160 miles away, and to him he sent this telegraphic message, "I am dying; what shall I do to be saved." Immediately flashing along the wires came back the answer, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shall be saved." The soldier believed; and soon after died with words of hope and triumph on his lips. God be thanked, there is a better telegraphic communication than this; from every sin-sick soul there is immediate communication with the heart of God, and from God's lips there comes the reply, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ; look unto him and be saved. The response between the soul of the supplicant and the heart of God is immediate.

The next element in this prayer is the forgiveness of sin—"and will forgive their sin." All of us need divine forgiveness. No angel could write out all the pardons which God bestows upon penitent sinners. We dishonor God by not trusting him for complete forgiveness. Let us now confess to him our sins, that he may cleanse us from our unbelief, disobedience and hostility.

The last promise is that healing will come to the land—"and will heal their land." It was a land flowing with milk and honey; and the people were to recognize God's hand. Solomon is conscious of the immediate presence of God throughout this entire dedicatory service for himself and for the nation. It is still true that God is the God of nations as of individuals. He was the God of our fathers; he is our God, and he will be the God of our children. Our great republic is a monument of God's mercy to us in all the crises of our wonderful history; and this mighty nation must not forget God.

Our Land Needs Healing.

The history of the Jewish church was long one of depression, of wickedness and evil; but they were delivered when they cried unto God. While the Hollanders in 1672 were awaiting an attack they offered most earnest prayers to God; the tide changed, foes could not land and soon their ships were driven from the coasts. The man who refuses to see the hand of God in the history of nations, proves himself to be as inaccurate a student of history as he is irreverent and unphilosophical.

God intends to teach us practical lessons by the depressed times through which we are passing. Have we to some degree forgotten God? Have we rejoiced in our inventive genius, our heroic endeavors, and our national achievements? God is humbling us to-day in our own sight, and in the sight of all the nations of the earth. Our land needs healing; the tide of intemperance flows as a terrible curse among the people; because of this fearful evil many hearts are torn and bleeding. The saloon is the incarnation of Satan; it lifts its crimson hand in defiance before men and before God. O, God of our fathers, heal our land from this terrible curse. Gambling is a related evil; it also is a terrible curse. Sabbath breaking is on the increase. Mammon is the god of many thousands of Americans; and the love of money is the ruin of many souls. God will not hold us guiltless if we trample on his commands issued so solemnly from Mount Sinai. We cannot expect to walk upon the highway of the nations except we obey God's law regarding his holy day.

O, people of the living God, listen to God's promises and obey its solemn conditions. Then indeed may we expect that our souls shall be established; our peace be as a river, and the blessing of the triune God come upon our great Republic and upon all the obedient people of the earth. God hasten the day for his Son's sake.

Under the Southern Cross.

Rev. Dr. Talmage Eloquently Describes the Celestial Crucifix—What Christianity has done for the South Sea Islands—Early Missionaries and their Influence—A Native Boy Hero.

STEAMSHIP "ALAMEDA," IN MID-OCEAN, July 10, 1894.

HERE are some things in the mind year after year remaining undefined. The time for explanation does not seem to come. We had for years seen allusions to the Southern Cross. We knew not what it meant. We supposed it to be an appearance in the heavens at certain latitude and longitude, yet we knew not exactly what that appearance was. But seated a few nights ago on the deck of this ship in our voyage around the world a gentleman bent over me and said, "The Southern Cross is visible. Let us go and see it." Going to the opposite side of the ship, I looked up and beheld it in all its suggestiveness looking down upon us, and looking down upon the sea. The Southern Cross! It is made up of four bright stars. One star standing at the top of the perpendicular piece of the Cross, and another star standing for the foot of it. One star standing for the right hand end of the horizontal piece of the Cross, and another star for the left hand end of it. So clear, so resplendent, so charged with significance, so sublimely marking off the heavens that neither man nor woman nor child nor angel nor devil can doubt it. The Southern Cross! To make it God put those four worlds in their places. The tender and tremendous emblem of our religion nailed against the heavens with silver nails of star. Four are enough.

God Wastes no Worlds. He will not encourage stupidity. If you cannot see the Southern Cross in the four stars, forty stars will not make you see it. Up yonder they stand, the four stellar evangelists upholding the cross. What a Gospel of the firmament! The Cross that Constantine saw in the sky with the words, "By this conquer," was an evanescent cross and for one night, but this Southern Cross is for all nights, and to last while creation lasts. So every night of this voyage among the islands of the Pacific I am reminded by this celestial crucifix of the only influence that has turned the islands from their cruelty, and shamelessness, and horror—the influence of the Cross.

Excepting the throne of the Deity, I think there will be no higher thrones in heaven than those occupied by the missionaries. Others have lived and died for their own country. These lived and died for the natives of other countries. Many of the missionaries were the graduates of Yale or Princeton, or New Brunswick, or Oxford, or Cambridge, or Edinburgh, and were qualified for pulpits, for editorial chairs, for medical achievement, for great words and deeds in Court rooms, for commercial successes that would have brought all honors and all luxuries to their feet. Many of the women of this Foreign Mission cause were brought up in refined associations, could play well on musical instruments, were the charm of best society, had attractiveness that fitted them for any circle of ease or opulence. Such men and women took whale-ships for foreign lands, lived on fare that only coarsest digestive organs could manage, were tossed for months on rough seas, landed amid naked savages, abode in grass huts, spent their life amid the squalor and the stench, and the vermin, and the epidemics and the low vices of those whom they had come to rescue. Of a roll of a hundred and eighty names of such men and women not more than four or five of them were ever heard of outside of their own kindred or the circles of barbarians among whom they lived.

The story of the Christian Heroes and Heroines who came to these islands of the Pacific in the Brig Thaddeus, the Leland, the Benjamin Bush, the Averich, and the Mary Frazier under Captain Charles Sumner, can never be fully told. All the talents, all the scholarship, all the nerve and muscle and brain, all the spiritual energies of these Christly men and women put forth on behalf of people whom they had never seen, and whose names they had never heard pronounced until the day of the arrival on these islands. Some of these messengers of light were cut to pieces and devoured by cannibals. Some of them toiled to save the besotted savage, while profligates of Christian countries landed from merchantman or war vessel or whaling ship were trying to destroy them. The daughter of one of the missionary families describes her mother as toiling until the skin was blistered off her arms, and says that while her father was about to preach a group of drunken sailors broke the windows and brandished a knife about his face, saying, "Here he is: I have got him! Come on! These missionaries sent their little children to America and Europe because they could not be properly brought up amid heathenism, and what heart-rending partings took place as fathers and mothers surrendered their children for the voyage across the seas in many cases those parents never seeing their children again. No regular postal arrangements, letters were often not received until eighteen months or two years old. The ship Captain Charles Sumner for the first part of the voyage to the Pacific with his group of missionaries scoffed at Christianity, but he was converted under the influence of their example and became their champion. He said about one of these Pacific Islands, "I have been here before and I see the difference. Formerly as soon as my anchor was down my ship was surrounded by Dissolute Men and Women, skimming out from shore and trying to come aboard. How different now! Christianity has made the change." And when some one traduced the missionaries he said, "Oh, you need not tell me these stories. I have lived four months with these dreadful people and know them well. I knew the natives, too, as they were many years ago, and I am fully convinced that the change I see is from the influence of the religion of the Bible."

One boy was the means of the civilization and evangelization of the Sandwich Islands. His father and mother were killed and he ran away with his baby brother on his back. The infant was slain by a spear. The heroic boy got on a ship for New England. He was found weeping on the steps of Yale College, Connecticut. He told the story of his native island. That story aroused the Christian world. "A little child shall lead them." The Tahitian Islands have felt the same supernal power. All these islands have been illumined, and the most of the abominations have sped away, not because of the threat of foreign guns, or as a result of national or international politics, but by the influence of that which vander mighty crucifix in the night sky typifies. Let no ship captain ever see it from a deck on the Pacific, or passenger whether for pleasure or profit sailing amid these islands behold it, without remembering what the Southern Cross has done for the besotted savages bounded on all sides by these vast wildernesses of water.

Oh, that Southern Cross! Were ever four worlds better placed than those which compose it? Though they were uninhabited, and built only for this significance, they were worthily built. Shine on until all the people of this hemisphere who see thee shall bethink themselves of the sacrifice thou dost depict! A cross not made out of darkness, but out of light. A cross strong enough for all nations who see it to hang their hopes upon. One night while I watched

This Celestial Crucifix, the clouds gathered and the top of the cross was gone, and the foot of it was gone, and the outspread arms were gone. No more of it to be seen than if it had never been hoisted. Had the cloud conquered the stars? No. After awhile the clouds parted and rolled back and off, and there it stood with the same old emblazonment—the Southern Cross. So the hostilities of earth and hell may roll up and seem to destroy the hope of communities and of nations, but in God's good time the antagonism will fall back, and all obscurations will be dispelled and all the earth shall see it, the Southern Cross for the South, the Northern Cross for the North, the Eastern Cross for the East, the Western Cross for the West, but all four of the crosses found at last in the new astronomy of the Gospel to be one and the same Cross, that which was set up nineteen hundred years ago, and of which I have found either a prophecy or a reminiscence in that uplifted splendor seen night by night while pacing the deck of a steamer on the Pacific.

Gospel Work in Africa.

Missionary Snyder Tells of the "Dark Side" of the Congo Field—A Godless, Wicked People Learning of Christ.

A MISSIONARY'S life is not all a holiday. Sometimes bright days come. Sometimes one's heart seems to beat a joyous, glad-some beat: but these days are rare. There comes to the true missionary a sense of nearness to God; as though one could feel the "everlasting arms" and hear the "wings," and this brings a joy, and a pleasure, and a comfort, not to be mentioned in the same breath with the world's definition of them.

A person coming here from a northern climate must necessarily undergo that change known by the name of acclimatization, and that means for some a very trying time, and often death. The sickness of Africa is hæmaturic fever—it lurks in the air as the snake lurks in the desert: you may tread on it to-day, be bitten and die; you may live in Africa twenty years and never have the fever. You may be well this evening and buried inside of five days, yes, four days—may be buried to-morrow night. Not much is known about hæmaturic fever. No symptoms warn one of its approach. Have you a fever this afternoon? It may be hæmaturic, it may not. The hæmorrhage is the first indication and tells you what it is. The hæmorrhages last, as a rule, two days—sometimes less, sometimes more, according to the treatment. My experience is limited: but as near as I can tell, more die after the hæmorrhages cease than at the time they occur. Those who survive the attack, quickly regain their strength, seemingly having suffered loss of strength only, due to the loss of blood. Those who die seem to have had not only a loss of blood but the blood remaining in the system is poisoned, due in some way to the diseased kidneys. Some die of exhaustion. A very satisfactory treatment consists in freely purging, and administering quinine in large doses, hypodermically.

Next to this, in point of trouble, though not so deadly, comes the "jigger" (sarcophylla penetrans). One has not to live very long in Africa before becoming acquainted with this pest, in appearance very much like the common flea, only much smaller. The female insect burrows under the skin producing an intense itching not at all relieved, save by removal. If not removed at once, the female begins to lay an innumerable amount of eggs in a sac and in a day or two a black spot is noticed where the itching is, and if you are at all skilful, the sac and insect may easily be removed, leaving a hole, however, in the foot, the size of a pea. No one is exempt from this pest. Shoes will not keep them out, nor are you free of them from one end of the year to the other.

Mosquitoes rarely trouble us. Wild honey-bees are exceedingly troublesome at some times of the year. Scorpions and centipedes abound: I can personally testify to the stinging properties of the scorpion. One stung me and for twenty-four hours I was in pain. Snakes do not seem to be very plentiful. I have seen but three kinds: one a small brown snake, said to be very poisonous, a green snake the bite of which, the natives say, produces death, and the boa-constrictor, a specimen of which came on our station early one morning and killed four goats and was in the act of swallowing one of them when he was discovered and shot. I measured him and found his length to be twelve feet four inches, and eighteen inches around. The natives told us it was a "child snake" and proceeded to tell us of others measuring twenty feet. We are satisfied with seeing the "children." So far we have failed to see any wild animals of any consequence.

Word has just reached us of the death of C. E. Ingham, of the American Baptist Missionary Union, on the lower Congo. It seems he went out to shoot an elephant and having accomplished this, he sat himself down on the carcass while the natives proceeded to cut off the tail. The elephant was not dead, as it quickly proved by rising and grasping Mr. Ingham and crushing his life out against its tusks. Having done this, the hunter and the hunted lay together—dead.

Word came to us a little while ago of a war on the lower Congo, between the state and the carriers. The result was two white men killed, three wounded, and numbers of native soldiers killed; mails thrown into water and caravans, of course, stopped. When you know that a loss of a mail may mean six months of news blotted out, and the caravans stopped means perhaps six months of food and clothing supply delayed and very likely lost for ever, you can readily see that this can be classed with the other "Congo Crosses." One fact in connection with this war needs special mention, and that is this: seventy-five villages united in common cause against the enemy. This is surprising because of the fact that hitherto in Central Africa, the combining of forces among the natives has not occurred, and this new step shows the influence of civilization and should be a warning to the State that should not go unheeded.

Another report from the Congo is that a white man, who was thought to have been thrown from his canoe by a wounded "hippo," was killed by the native with him in the canoe in order to secure the money he always carried with him fastened by a belt to his waist.

Our Gospel message is treated by the natives with indifference. We have told them of God and how he made all things: how he loves them: and of Jesus who gave his life for them; but it is as an idle tale to them. They have in themselves no idea of a God. The Zapo-Zaps believe that, when they die, that is the end. The Ba-kete hold that the spirit of the dead goes to some place unknown to them, and remains a short or long time as it wills and then returns and enters into a woman and is born again. The spirit has the power of choosing the town and woman to which he wishes to return. This, in a nut-shell, is the natives' explanation of death and birth. Naturally they are fatalists and since our arrival everything is "Bwala bi Nzambi" —Palaver for God!

I have closely questioned the natives but they tell me that before the coming of the white people they were ignorant of Nzambi. (The word "Nzambi" has been introduced here from the lower Congo and perhaps has been handed down to them from the times of the early priests). The people steal and lie without a sign of a blush. So far we have failed to see any repentance. Several of the natives know enough of "God's palaver" to make them responsible and we are praying for an outpouring of God's Spirit in their hearts.

Eight natives have just come in from a village a few miles away. I have been telling them of God and his dear Son. They say to me, "Why don't you come and live with us? Why is it that Mr. Sheppard, Mr. Adamson, Mr. Rowbotham and you have sat here with the people of Ka Senga and not one of you come to us?" What can I tell them? Mr. Sheppard is away; Mr. R— and wife have gone home; Mrs. Adamson is dead, and we are only three at this station. I have told them, however, that just as soon as I can, I will go to them.

Pray the Lord of the harvest to send more laborers. These eight natives to whom I have not spoken heretofore, evinced much interest in what I had to say. Here, then, is an open door; here is a strong call to the folks at home. There is not another mission for hundreds of miles around. Three missionaries to a million of people!

Good Blood

Was given me by Hood's Sarsaparilla. I had suffered terribly with rheumatism. I tried all kinds of remedies and they did me no good. I was beginning to despair when I was advised to take Hood's Sarsaparilla. When I began to take Hood's it gave me the nose bleed, and the blood which was discharged was thick and black. Hood's Sarsaparilla drove out this bad blood and gave me a good appetite, which made good blood. My friends were surprised, and everybody was asking me how I got cured. They said I never could be cured because I had the trouble when I was so young, but I tell them that Hood's Sarsaparilla did it." AUGUSTUS JOYCE, 46 Decatur street, Charlestown, Mass.

ZEROLA of NAZARETH

A TALE OF THE DAYS OF PAUL THE APOSTLE.
By W. J. THOROLD.

CHAPTER X.

WHIRLING AND WILD CAROUSAL.

ROOM there, make room for the chariot of Corbulo!

So shouted the people as his black Arabians, driven by the General himself, galloped along the ringing pavement of the Applan Way, whose large hexagonal blocks of basaltic lava formed a road hard and smooth as skill and stone could make it.

Half the city, both citizens and strangers, were now enjoying the pleasures of the promenade. For it was evening.

"A costly four!" exclaimed a certain Egyptian as Corbulo flashed by.

"Magnificent chariot!" responded his companion, a man whom you would at once have seen was also from the country of the Nile.

"But cursed charioteer," muttered the other.

They now quickened their steps.

"That," remarked the taller of the two, pointing at the Roman's brilliant equipage and following it with his black eyes, "that to tickle his pride—but this," replacing something shining and sharp beneath his robe, "this to tickle his—"

"Hush, Karmes," interrupted the second, "we will be discovered."

"It is well if we are not now," the Egyptian replied sullenly. "But, Arni, who is that?"

"Whom do you mean?"

"That man there, passing the statue."

They both looked eagerly.

"By the stars!" exclaimed Arni, "it is Thæon!"

They now walked still faster.

"Perpol, it is he! Where, then, are the girls—think you the pretty nymphs have played us false?"

"Judge not so hastily. Your Pyramids were not built in an hour."

"But they should have got him to the house by this time."

Then there was silence for a time. In a few minutes it was broken by the smaller of the two. "Aha, Karmes," he laughed, "the girls are cunning as their master. Look! There they are!"

"True, Arni, true."

"Let us approach then, and listen."

"But we have not time."

"Why not?"

"Remember the message: 'By the statue at day-break!' And the wine and the dance come before that."

"Yes," repeated Arni, "the banquet comes first. And then—'By the statue at day-break!' It will go hard with Corbulo to die so."

"Yes; but it went hard with my sister when he killed her beside that same statue," replied the first Egyptian, coloring with anger.

"Well, for the General if he knew our plot, Karmes," laughed his companion, half pityingly.

"Ay, well!" was the answer.

"And he will know when—"

"When this dagger tells him," interrupted the Egyptian, muttering and patting his breast.

And the two men hurried off to their meeting-place.

Well might it have been for them if they had only known how much Corbulo did know of their conspiracy! For he knew all. But they trusted to their cunning.

By this time the two women referred to had caught up to Thæon, and were now talking with him. Misled by their speaking his own language he seemed to have forgotten his usual caution.

"Pardon me," said the elder of the two, "but do you not come from Nazareth?"

He looked at them a moment, and answered that he did.

"Then your name is Thæon," she added scanning the man over, and smiling winningly.

He was perplexed. How did they know who he was. It seemed to be explained, however, when she continued: "Several years ago we lived there ourselves, but now our home is here in Rome."

Although neither of them had ever seen Palestine they had been furnished with all necessary facts by Arni and Karmes. They knew thoroughly the history of the man before them. In addition to this both had the tact of their sex and the cunning of their race.

"And have you not found Zerola yet?" inquired the younger after a slight pause in the conversation.

Thæon looked astonished. They might know his nationality and his name, but how could they have found out his errand.

"Oh, he not surprised," they said together, looking archly at him, "we know her well."

"You know her," he repeated, trying in vain to conceal his feelings. But they knew only too well the workings of a manly heart when its owner is passionately in love.

"Can you tell me where Zerola is?" he asked.

"Yes, we can. Come with us, and we will take you to her," was the answer.

What possibilities belong to every woman! How noble she may be, if she only will. But yet how false sometimes—and treacherous.

The three turned and walked in the opposite direction to that in which they had been going. Past the spraying fountains, past the marble columns, the sloping gardens and triumphal arches, they hastened onward. The girls laughed to themselves at his trust and credulity.

At length they reached their destination. It was a house situated behind the statue!

No sooner had Thæon entered this place than he began to doubt. "What," he thought, "would Zerola be doing in such company as this?"

Seated around the spacious room were a dozen men and as many women, all drinking.

In a moment he realized the truth: he had been deceived!

But how could he make his escape? It would not do to let them see that he even wished to go. That was evident.

As he sat trying to devise some way, the doors at the farther end of the room swung softly open, and the strains of music came floating through the long torch-lit corridor. Then he heard the march of sandalled feet stepping to the touch of lute and tabret, and in a few minutes a score of dancing girls entered dressed in all the attire of processional display and oriental attractiveness. And the revel commenced. And the revel whirled!

An hour or more passed when Karmes leaning over whispered to Arni: "Remember, 'by the statue at day-break!' The hour draws near."

"And our men are ready for their work," answered Arni. "Nine are hiding by the roadside, waiting to drag the Roman from his chariot as he passes. And then—"

"Then, ay, then Corbulo! O revenge, how sweet thou art!"

Meanwhile the feast was going on. "But Karmes," asked the other, "how comes it that Corbulo is driving along the Applan Way so late to-night?"

"He has gone to meet Paul, who but yesterday arrived from Palestine," was the answer.

"The General will be turning Nazarene next," suggested two or three of the women sitting near, and listening.

They all laughed.

People take medicine because they are sick and want to be cured. Hence they should get a medicine that cures. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the standard blood purifier and nerve and strength builder.

Good News for Asthmatics.

We observe that the Kola plant, found on the Congo river, West Africa, is now in reach of sufferers from Asthma. As before announced, this new discovery is a positive cure for Asthma. You can make trial of the Kola Compound free, by addressing a postal card to the Kola Importing Co., 1164 Broadway, New York, who are sending out large trial cases free by mail, to sufferers.

"Well, this to the Apostle," sneered Arni, as he emptied his goblet.

"And this to the General," responded the tall Egyptian.

Another now joined them.

"The girls," he said, "who saw Corbulo kill your sister, say they have something to tell you, Karmes. They wish to speak with you."

"Bid them come to me, then."

In a few minutes they were before him.

"Thæon will have nothing to do with us," they said appealingly, "and we cannot overcome his determination."

"Why, I thought you could overcome anything masculine," was the half-joking reply. "But I'll overcome him; not by means of any feminine wiles, but by means of—"

"Of what?" they asked.

"Of this!" he replied. And with his finger-tips he made his dagger ring.

"But what did you come to tell me?"

"To tell you?"

"Yes."

"It is this: Let not pleasure be forgotten in your anger, Karmes," was their answer. They looked at him. And their look said: "Come."

The men arose.

"Once more then let us drink the health of the gods," said Arni, jestingly.

Again the goblets were filled.

"These," said they all as they quaffed the glowing liquid, "these to the merry gods of Wealth, Wine—and Woman!"

And through the hall the shouts went ringing.

Song and jest and laughter, what a jolly company, eating and drinking in loud revel. The charm of the music, the sparkle of the wine, the excitement of the dance—eastern, enticing, voluptuous—who could resist such fascinating pleasure? None now: none then. So all—save one—Egyptians and Romans, women, men and girls, all went whirling in one carousal.

Knock—knock.

A trumpet blast.

Wrenching of doors and clanking of chains.

Spears, armor, swords shining weirdly in the torches' flickering light.

Was it a dream? No.

A hundred soldiers stood within the room! Every man armed and resolute.

The revellers were silent, almost sobered.

"A thousand more are waiting for you outside," said the centurion, glancing from one to the other. And his iron will was in his voice.

In a few minutes the men were prisoners. The women were permitted to go to their homes. How wearily they tramped along the Applan Way.

In a few hours the prisoners were in the presence of Corbulo. There stood the great Roman, calm, cold and immovable as the marble walls around him.

"Karmes," he said, "your plot was discovered. I know all: yes—All!"

Then turning to the guard he said, with a wave of the head:

"These to the galleys—except one."

A murmur ran through the crowd.

In a moment he continued, "Thæon is free!"

How sullen looked the conspirators.

To be chained to an oar, to be treated like a dog—it seemed their future life would be but a slow death. And worse than that, into its darkness would never shine a ray of hope.

The voice of Karmes first broke the silence of the chamber. "Than be a galley-slave," he shouted, "I had rather be a corpse!"

Corbulo waited a moment, deliberating. Then, looking into the Egyptian's black eyes, said slowly:

"I grant thy wish."

Then to the centurion: "Karmes dies to-morrow—by the statue at day-break!"

All the conspirators glanced hurriedly at each other, and dropped their eyes.

Looking again at the old intriguer, Corbulo continued: "I permitted you to make a voyage on one of my ships. But how was my confidence rewarded? By fickleness, falseness, and treachery. You betrayed my trust; you tried to betray Zerola, but failed. Then for some crime you were immured in the same sepulchre. In its wreck by the lightning you escaped—then formed a plot to take my own life, and Thæon's. But you have failed—failed in all! And now, now Karmes, prepare to follow the hag!"

Then the doors of the room swung open. And through the long corridor were seen a hundred soldiers ranged and standing by the walls. Forth came the sound of the sheathing of a hundred swords as, at the signal of the centurions, they shouted:

"By the statue at day-break!"

And the walls echoed the words:

"By the statue at day-break!"

Hints or Kicks? Which?

You can have a happy experience, coming from hints—or a sad experience, coming from kicks. Now in the matter of cleanliness, if you want the happy experience, take the hints that Pearlina gives. Use Pearlina for washing (all kinds of washing) and you have ease, there economy and safety. Is a hint in the fact that hundreds of millions of packages of Pearlina have been used, and the sale increases? But if you want sad experience, take the old-fashioned way with soap, and rubbing and scrubbing. That's hard for you, and for the things that you wash. It's all rub, rub rub—in other words, it's the experience based on kicks.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back.

A CHINESE VILLAGE SCENE.*

None of the villages opposite Canton we went into a number of Chinese flower gardens, and laughed again and again at the odd shapes into which they had dwarfed and twisted every sort of plant and tree. Some were like dragons, others like men, women and gods. Some were comic, others religious; others, again, beautiful imitations of mountains, valleys and landscapes, with grottos, pagodas and houses here and there on the mountain side. But all were in miniature. Here were orange trees with fruit and flowers, and the trees were less than a foot high; forest trees, many years old, as big as rose bushes; boxwood plants cut to look like a great fat Buddha, or Brother Jonathan, tall and lank, with an umbrella in his hand and his hat on one side of his head.

In another village was a great Buddhist temple full of lazy priests and sacred pigs and hens. Here is a regular pig-pen, with gigantic swine, so fat that they can scarcely move, which some one has rescued from the butcher's hands and dedicated to the gods, and here they are fed by all the pious worshippers who come, until their troughs are running over with rice and onions, and they are ready to die of corpulence. Here they live in peace till they die of old age—worthy types of the bestial degradation of blind and Christless heathenism, or Matthew Arnold's "Light of Asia."

But the saddest sight we saw that day, and the one that will live longest in our memory as a sort of monograph of heathenism in its cruel horrors, was a little dead baby girl, floating with downward face on the water of the canal. All around were hundreds of boats, little family boats, full of men and women and children rowing and paddling about in the canal, but no one seemed to notice or care for her. Not a yard away was the boat from which, perhaps, she had fallen, but her little helpless hands had been stretched out to them in vain, and her little cries had been stifled by the waters of death ere they responded. She was only a girl! It was "her fate" to fall over, and why should they interfere? So our friends told us the Chinese really believed and acted. They assured us that if we were to fall into that canal, probably not a single hand would be moved to save us. It was our business, and why should they interfere? If we chose to drown, they were not going to hinder us; and if we chose to swim, why—all right.

Indeed, the captain of our river steamer told us that only a few nights ago he heard a splashing in the water near his ship as she lay at the wharf. There were men around, but nobody moved, and he could not possibly have got near without going ashore, and taking ten minutes to get round the pier to the spot. Next morning he asked one of the men, who had been standing by, and he said it was a Chinaman who had fallen in, and they let him die. It was his business,—why should they interfere? And there, sure enough, when the tide went down, lay his dead body in the low water, and the people came down all day to wash their rice and fill their water vessels—right beside him—and no one noticed or seemed to care for that poor, lifeless form that died because there was none to help.

And so our little baby girl lay floating in the river, and no one lifted her or sought for her a burial robe or "lucky grave." There she would lie till she floated out with the tide to the deep sea, or the river shore, to be devoured by the fishes or dogs. If she had been a little boy, perhaps more would have been done for her, for we noticed that all the little boys on the river-boats had life preservers, made of gourds, tied on their backs, but they never tie them on little girls, and so she had to die because she was only a little girl, and to lie unburied, unpitied and unremembered, because she had the sad lot to be born with the face and form of a little daughter of Eve in cruel, heathen China. Poor, little, dead, Chinese baby girl, —speak—speak to the women and girls of Christian lands, as thou hast spoken to our heart, until there shall be enough of pity, love and power to reach and save the other poor, sad women and girls of China, whose sorrows we never see!

RICHES AND PRIDE.

Bishop Huntingdon, one of the most candid students of sociology, declares truly that rarely indeed, even at the present day, do we find a rich man who looks upon his servants, or the employees who co-operate in the production of his riches, as his equals, or as ends in themselves. Rarely do we find one striving to encourage in those dependent upon him the spirit of independence and self-respect, by affording them every opportunity for culture, providing for their health, associating with them on equal terms. To him they are merely so many "hands," which he would gladly, if he could, replace by machines, feeding on water, coal, and grease. They have no claim upon him for anything but wages; and he thinks he has done his whole duty by them when he has paid them the lowest market rate of these.

In this way riches foster the aristocratic spirit, which draws a cruel, unbrotherly line between two conditions of men, perverting the one with cold pride and the other with obsequious envy. Indeed, of all the sources of vice none is more fertile than the pride which makes a man think and feel that to certain of his fellow-beings he does not owe the ordinary regards, courtesies, and considerations of gentle life. Pride—"by that sin fell the angels;" it is the first, the fundamental sin, the spring of well-nigh all the others. It is almost impossible for one man to be just or considerate to another man whom he regards as his inferior, or to maintain a man's dignity toward one whose claim to superiority he allows. As Lowell has said, the true spirit of democracy, which is also the true spirit of humanity, bids us say to every man, "You are as good as I;" and until we say this in spirit and in truth we are neither humane nor democratic.

Here is a man who is dependent upon manual labor for a living; he is unemployed and unknown and his pocket is empty. He has a wife and children. With that sole equipment, "a pair of stout hands," which so many well-fed and well-clad students of the social problem consider an abundant outfit for happiness, he seeks employment. The first effect of the competitive system is that he finds about him men eager and anxious in the same pursuit, and before he gets a place he sees the scanty clothes of a hungry family wearing out. He has walked the streets of a city or of a factory town, facing the humiliation of beggary; has persuaded some tradesmen to trust him in small sums for bread, and has made vague promises to the owner of the tenement where he is lodged. When he finally finds a job, with this load of debt upon him, he discovers that between stern necessity and a keen employer, who believes that "business is business," his independence has gone into the bargain with his time and strength. Not only must he spend ten hours every day at his task, but all the terms of that task are subject to arbitrary dictation. In every particular demand he must yield silently, bearing rudeness, exaction, bad temper, or he must lose his situation.

The Golden Rule will not let us sleep well nights until we are doing our utmost to hasten a revolution in this matter of the laborer's self-respect. He who gave us the Golden Rule was brotherhood itself. He denounced the fashionable shams of his time with the nonchalance of an emperor and the intelligence of an artisan. His social theories held the relentlessness of love. His spirit and example must yet glorify human society.

From Affluence to Poverty.

Once a Belle and Noted Hostess, Now in Danger of Eviction from her Lodgings.
(FROM THE "NEW YORK SUN.")

In a dark little room on the second floor of the tenement house at 58 Leroy street, New York, is living a middle-aged woman, the daughter of a wealthy Southern planter, and the widow of a man who at one time was one of the largest merchants in South Carolina. She is now in great want owing to the illness of her son. She has not money enough to pay her rent, and unless help comes to her promptly, she will be dispossessed. "The Sun" has her name, and her story is vouched for by a reliable business man in this city who remembers her as a belle in South Carolina. Her father was rated as a millionaire before the war. He was the owner of four large plantations, and his hospitality was famous even in a State of plantations. His daughter was educated in the best schools and was brought up in luxury. She learned a little music, a little painting and fine needlework, and for the past ten years she has turned these accomplishments to account and managed to support herself by them. Her marriage, which occurred twenty-eight years ago, was a social event of importance. Her husband died, leaving her two young boys and a comfortable income. The son, who is now in Bellevue, was sent to a Southern college. Then some of the mother's investments began to turn out badly, and in the attempt to retrieve her losses her fortune was swept away. The war had wiped out her father's wealth and she was left penniless.

With her son she came to New York, where she might work unknown to the people who had known her in her more prosperous days. She devoted herself to painting, and took a studio in Fourteenth street. Her son learned the printer's trade and worked as a compositor. For a time they got along very comfortably. Besides her painting, the mother gave music lessons and did all sorts of decorative work. A few of her old friends found her and gave her commissions. But her son never has been strong, and his frequent sicknesses have been expensive. Less than a year ago he was sick again, and the expense incurred caused them to move from more comfortable rooms to the house in Leroy street. Three weeks ago the son again became ill, and he has since been in Bellevue very dangerously sick.

When "The Sun" reporter called on this lady last night she said: "I have been unable to sell my work. People say it is a luxury now. If I could only find some way to pay my rent and get a room a little nearer Bellevue, where I could see my son more frequently, I think I should be happy. Tomorrow is my wedding anniversary, and notwithstanding my reverses it would be a cheerful one if my son were only well."

The room was neat and the furniture was the cheapest. A few paintings in oils and water colors were hung on the walls. "I can't afford car fare to Bellevue," she said, "and I find it a long walk. I hardly know what I am going to do. Last night I walked the floor all night, but I could think of nothing. I have no relatives now who can assist me. You see I can paint and do fancy work, but no one wants to buy such things now. I only need a chance to work, but I can't get it. And then I have had to swallow much pride; but pride and poverty don't go well together."

A friend of this lady's, who knew her family in the South, said to "The Sun" reporter: "I can vouch for the truth of her story in all its details, for I knew her when she was the hostess of one of the finest houses in the South. As the result of a train of misfortunes she is now without means and threatened with eviction."

This case, being brought to the attention of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was at once made a subject of investigation, and the facts as stated by "The Sun," were fully verified. The lady was in sore need and absolutely penniless. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has found her a comfortable lodging on Twenty-seventh street, paying a month's rent in advance, providing for the transportation of her few belongings and leaving with her a sum sufficient for immediate needs. She is a woman of excellent education and Christian character and it is hoped that some opening may soon be found which will bring permanent relief.

ENDURING FOR CHRIST'S SAKE.

A colporteur of the British Bible Society in traveling through Albania, called at a town where the bishop endeavored, but happily in vain, to induce the governor to drive the colporteur away, but attained his object more effectually by sending out everywhere an encyclical, warning the people against speaking to him or buying the Scriptures. In another village he was barbarously treated, mocked, spit upon, and could not even get bread. He endured this for two days, and proceeded to Topovon, where he found the teacher friendly, and sold eight copies. In the next village he was treated worse than ever, and was struck and thrice refused bread, till a stranger kindly relieved his wants. In the next village he met with cold indifference and neglect, while in the sixth and last he met still greater difficulties, the people meeting together one day to beat him and drive him away in disgrace. He quieted them, however, a good deal by reading Matt. 5 in Albanian, in consequence of which the priest bought a New Testament.

"FEAR NOT; I WILL HELP THEE."

"For I, the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee." Isa. 41: 13.

I WILL help thee, hear the promise Of the One who reigns above. Though I'm weak and heavy laden, He will fill my heart with love. Led by him and trusting ever In his grace from day to day, I shall be secure from danger; From him shall I never stray. Keep me ever near thee, Jesus, With my hand enclosed in thine; Then, when duty calls or danger, I'll not murmur nor repine. With thy constant, loving presence Ever near to help bestow, I can labor in thy vineyard And need never fear the foe. Carlisle, Pa. LYDIA M. ARNOLD.

'TWIXT EBAL AND GERIZIM.

Ancient Shechem and its Beautiful Surroundings and Sacred Memories—The Mountains of Blessing and Cursing—The Descendants of the Ancient Samaritans and their Bible—"Jacob's Well" Where Jesus Talked with the Woman of Samaria.

IN the land of Ephraim, blessed with "the good things of the ancient mountains," are found some of the most picturesque and romantic scenes in all Palestine. Selected from among many localities, that which probably pleases the eye and the sense of the traveler most, is to be viewed from the crest of a ridge, which looks down upon a plain, bounded on the further side by a broken mountain chain, Nablous has about 13,000 inhabitants, nearly all Moslem. There are probably less than three hundred Samaritans in the city to-day, twice as many Christians belonging to the Greek Church, and a small colony of Hebrews. It is quite an active, bustling city, with bazaars as large and pretentious as those of Jaffa and Jerusalem. Wool and cotton are sent from Nablous to the country east of the Jordan, and some ity of the city, that strict laws are enacted for the protection of the trees and their fruit, and no picking is permitted until the date has first been set by the authorities. On that day a public crier announces the opening of the olive harvest, and the people flock to the orchards and gather the fruit, by beating or shaking the trees. The best of the fruit is selected for eating, and the remainder is pressed for oil. A single tree in Nablous has been known to yield twelve gallons of olive oil. In this ancient city, the olive industry with its cumbrous, old-fashioned presses of various designs—some of them doubtless but little changed in many centuries—can be seen to greater perfection, perhaps, than in any other city in Palestine.

brought his coat to Jacob, on their return from Mesopotamia. The city shelters also the only sect of Samaritans now in existence. The origin of the people from whom they are directly descended is related in II. Kings 17: 24-41. Even at the present time, they still preserve their ancient faith and form of worship. On the upper slope of Mount Gerizim—which overlooks the city on one side, as Mount Ebal does on the other—they have a temple in which they annually celebrate the Passover Feast and partake of the Paschal lamb. Their priests possess a copy of the Pentateuch, believed to be the oldest in existence, and which they declare to have been written by a grandson of Aaron; but learned Western and with a city lying in the valley between; it is Shechem, one of the six ancient cities of refuge, which lies thus nestling at the foot of the slopes of Ebal and Gerizim, in the little valley hardly more than five hundred feet wide. The fertile hills around are orchard-clad and terraced, and the plain, too, is dotted with groves of olive.

products of the same character find their way to Western Europe. There are a full score of factories where soap is made from olive oil. So large is the olive-growing industry and so inseparable from the prosper-

Nablous possesses many points of interest associated with Bible study. In one part of the city is shown the "Jama el Nadra," a mosque said to be erected on the site of the spot where the brethren of Joseph scholars and Orientalists assert that the scroll is certainly not more than a thousand years old. It is fifteen inches wide and between twenty and thirty yards long, and contains the whole of the first five books of the Bible.

THE RESCUE.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Acts 16: 31, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

JAILS are dark, dull, damp, loathsome places even now; but they were worse in the apostolic times. I imagine, to-day, we are standing in the Philippian dungeon. Do you not feel the chill? Do you not hear the groan of those incarcerated ones who for ten years have not seen the sunlight, and the deep sigh of women who remember their father's house, and mourn over their wasted estates? Listen again. It is the cough of a consumptive, or the struggle of one in the nightmare of a great horror. You listen again, and hear a culprit, his chains rattling as he rolls over in his dreams, and you say: "God pity the prisoner." But there is another sound in that prison. It is the song of joy and gladness. What a place to sing in! The music comes winding through the corridors of the prison, and in all the dark wards the whisper is heard: "What's that? What's that?"

It is the song of Paul and Silas. They cannot sleep. They have been whipped, very badly whipped. The long gashes on their backs are bleeding yet. They lie flat on the cold ground, their feet fast in wooden sockets, and of course they cannot sleep. But they can sing. Jailer, what are you doing with these people? Why have they been put in here? Oh, they have been trying to make the world better. Is that all? That is all. A pit for Joseph. A lion's cave for Daniel. A blazing furnace for Shadrach. Clubs for John Wesley. An anathema for Philip Melancthon. A dungeon for Paul and Silas.

But while we are standing in the gloom of the Philippian dungeon, and we hear the mingling voices of sob and groan and blasphemy and hallelujah, suddenly an earthquake! The iron bars of the prison twist, the pillars crack off, the solid masonry begins to heave, and all the doors swing open. The jailer, feeling himself responsible for these prisoners, and believing, in his pagan ignorance, suicide to be honorable—since Brutus killed himself, and Cato killed himself and Cassius killed himself—puts his sword to his own heart, proposing with one strong keen thrust to put an end to his excitement and agitation. But Paul cries out, "Stop! stop! Do thyself no harm. We are all here."

Then I see the jailer running through the dust and amid the ruin of that prison, and I see him throwing himself down at the feet of these prisoners, crying out, "What shall I do? What shall I do?" Did Paul answer, "Get out of this place before there is another earthquake; put handcuffs and hamples on these other prisoners, lest they get away?" No word of that kind. His compact, thrilling, tremendous answer, answer memorable all through earth and heaven, was, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

Well, we have all read of the earthquake in Lisbon, in Lima, in Aleppo, and in Caraccas; but we live in a latitude where in all our memory there has not been one severe volcanic disturbance. And yet we have seen fifty earthquakes. Here is a man who has been building up a large fortune. His bid on the money market was felt in all the cities. He thinks he has got beyond all annoying rivalries in trade, and he says to himself, "Now I am free and sate from all possible perturbation." But in 1857 or in 1873 a national panic strikes the foundation of the commercial world, and crash goes all that magnificent business establishment. Here is a man who has built up a very beautiful home. His daughters have just come home from the seminary with diplomas of graduation. His sons have started in life, honest, temperate, and pure. When the evening lights are struck, there is a happy and unbroken family circle. But there has been an accident down at Long Branch. The young man ventured too far out in the surf. The telegraph hurled the terror up to the city. An earthquake struck under the foundation of that beautiful home.

The piano closed; the curtains dropped; the laughter hushed. Crash! go all those domestic hopes and prospects and expectations. So, my friends, we have all felt the shaking down of some great trouble, and there was a time when we were as much excited as this man of the text, and we cried out as he did, "What shall I do? What shall I do?" The same reply that the apostle made to him is appropriate to us: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

There are some documents of so little importance that you do not care to put any more than your last name under them, or even your initials; but there are some documents of so great importance that you write out your full name. So the Saviour in some parts of the Bible is called "Lord," and in other parts of the Bible he is called "Jesus," and in other parts of the Bible he is called "Christ;" but that there might be no mistake about this passage, all three names come together—"The Lord Jesus Christ."

Now, who is this Being that you want me to trust in and believe in? Men sometimes come to me with credentials and certificates of good character, but I cannot trust them. There is some dishonesty in their looks that makes me know that I shall be cheated if I confide in them. You cannot put your heart's confidence in a man until you know what stuff he is made of, and am I unreasonable when I stop to ask you who this is that you want me to trust in? No man would think of venturing his life on a vessel going out to sea that had never been inspected.

No, you must have the certificate hung amidships, telling how many tons it carries, and how long ago it was built, and who built it, and all about it. And you cannot expect me to risk the cargo of my immortal interests on board any craft till you tell me what it is made of, and where it was made, and what it is.

When, then, I ask you who this is you want me to trust in, you tell me he is a very attractive person. Contemporary writers describe his whole appearance as being resplendent. There was no need for Christ to tell the children to come to him. "Suffer little children to come unto me," was not spoken to the children; it was spoken to the disciples. The children came readily enough without any invitation. No sooner did Jesus appear, than the little ones jumped from their mothers' arms, an avalanche of beauty and love, into his lap. Christ did not ask John to put his head down on his bosom; John could not help but put his head there. I suppose a look at Christ was just to love him. How attractive his manner! Why, when they saw Christ coming along the street, they ran into their houses, and they wrapped up their invalids as quick as they could, and brought them out that he might look at them. Oh, there was something so pleasant, so inviting, so cheering in everything he did, in his very look. When these sick ones were brought out did he say: "Do not bring before me these sores; do not trouble me with these leprosy?" No, no; there was a kind look, there was a gentle word, there was a healing touch. They could not keep away from him.

In addition to this softness of character, there was a fiery momentum. How the kings of the earth turned pale. Here is a plain man with a few sailors at his back, coming off the sea of Galilee, going up to the palace of the Cæsars, making that palace quake to the foundations, and uttering a word of mercy and kindness which throbs through all the earth, and through all the heavens, and through all ages. Oh, he was a loving Christ. But it was not effeminacy or insipidity of character; it was accompanied with majesty, infinite and omnipotent. Lest the world should not realize his earnestness, this Christ mounts the cross.

You say: "If Christ has to die, why not let him take some deadly potion and lie on a couch in some bright and beautiful home? If he must die, let him expire amid all kindly attentions." No, the world must hear the hammers on the heads of the spikes. The world must listen to the death-rattle of the sufferer. The world must feel his warm blood dropping on each cheek, while it looks up into the face of his anguish. And so the cross must be lifted, and a hole is dug on the top of Calvary.

It must be dug three feet deep, and then the cross is laid on the ground, and the sufferer is stretched upon it, and the nails are pounded through nerve and muscle and bone, through the right hand, through the left hand; and then they shake his right hand to see if it is fast, and they heave up the wood, half a dozen shoulders under the weight, and they put the end of the cross to the mouth of the hole, and they plunge it in, all the weight of his body coming down for the first time on the spikes; and while some hold the cross upright, others throw in the dirt and trample it down, and trample it hard.

Oh, plant that tree well and thoroughly, for it is to bear fruit such as no other tree ever bore. Why did Christ endure it? He could have taken those rocks, and with them crushed his crucifiers. He could have reached up and grasped the sword of the Omnipotent God, and with one clean cut have tumbled them into perdition. But no; he was to die. He must die. His life for your life. In a European city a young man died on the scaffold for the crime of murder. Some time after, the mother of this young man was dying, and the priest came in, and she made confession to the priest that she was the murderer, and not her son; in a moment of anger she had struck her husband a blow that slew him. The son came suddenly into the room, and was washing away the wounds and trying to resuscitate his father, when some one looked through the window and saw him, and supposed him to be the criminal. That young man died for his own mother. You say, "It was wonderful that he never exposed her." But I tell you of a grander thing. Christ, the Son of God, died not for his mother, not for his father, but for his sworn enemies. Oh, such a Christ as that—so loving, so patient, so self-sacrificing—can you not trust him?

I think there are many under the influence of the Spirit of God who are saying, "I will trust him if you will only tell me how;" and the great question asked by many is, "How? how?" And while I answer your question I look up and utter the prayer which Rowland Hill so often uttered in the midst of his sermons, "Master, help!" How are you to trust in Christ?

Just as you trust any one. You trust your partner in business with important things. If a commercial house gives you a note payable three months hence, you expect the payment of that note at the end of three months. You have perfect confidence in their word and in their ability. Or again, you go home to-day. You expect there will be food on the table. You have confidence in that. Now, I ask you to have the same confidence in the Lord Jesus Christ. He says, "You believe: I take away your sins;" and they are all taken away. "What!" you say, "before I pray any more? before I read my Bible any more? before I cry over my sins any more?" Yes, this moment. Believe with all your heart and you are saved. Why, Christ is only waiting to get from you what you give to scores of people every day. What is that? Confidence. If these people whom you trust day by day are more worthy than Christ, if they are more faithful than Christ, if they have done more than Christ ever did, then give them the preference; but if you really think that Christ is as trustworthy as they are, then deal with him as fairly.

"Oh," says some one in a light way, "I believe that Christ was born in Bethlehem, and I believe that he died on the cross." Do you believe it with your head or your heart? I will illustrate the difference. You are in your own house. In the morning you open a newspaper and you read how Captain Braveheart on the sea risked his life for the salvation of his passengers. You say, "What a grand fellow he must have been! His family deserves very well of the country." You fold the newspaper and sit down at the table, and perhaps do not think of that incident again. That is historical faith.

But now you are on the sea, and it is night, and you are asleep, and you are awakened by the shriek of "Fire!" You rush out on the deck. You hear, amid the wringing of the hands and the fainting, the cry: "No hope! No hope!" We are lost! we are lost! The sail puts out its wing of fire, the ropes make a burning ladder in the night heavens, the spirit of wrecks hisses in the wave, and on the hurricane-deck shakes out its banner of smoke and darkness. "Down with the life-boats!" cries the captain. "Down with the life-boats!" People rush into them. The boats are about full. Room only for one more man. You are standing on the deck beside the captain.

Who shall it be? You or the captain? The captain says, "You." You jump, and are saved. He stands there, and dies. Now, you believe that Captain Braveheart sacrificed himself for his passengers, but you believe it with love, with tears, with hot and long-continued exclamations; with grief at his loss and joy at your deliverance. That is saving faith. In other words, what you believe with all the heart, and believe in regard to yourself. On this hinge turns my sermon: aye, the salvation of your immortal soul. You often go across a bridge you know nothing about. You do not know who built the bridge, you do not know what material it is made of; but you come to it, and walk over it, and ask no questions. And here is an arched bridge blasted from the "Rock of Ages." And built by the Architect of the whole universe, spanning the dark gulf between sin and righteousness, and all God asks you is to walk across it; and you start, and you come to it, and you stop, and you go a little way on and you stop, and you fall back, and you experiment. You say, "How do I know that bridge will hold me?" instead of marching on with firm step, asking no questions, but feeling that the strength of the eternal God is under you.

Oh, was there ever a prize proffered so cheap as pardon and heaven are offered to you? For how much? A million dollars? It is certainly worth more than that. But cheaper than that you can have it. Ten thousand dollars? Less than that. Five thousand dollars? Less than that. One dollar? Less than that. One farthing? Less than that. "Without money and without price." No money to pay. No journey to take. No penance to suffer. Only just one decisive action of the soul: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

Shall I try to tell you what it is to be saved? I cannot tell you. No man, no angel, can tell you. But I can hint at it. For my text brings me up to this point, "Thou shalt be saved." It means a happy life here, and a peaceful death and a blissful eternity. It is a grand thing to go to sleep at night, and to get up in the morning, and to do business all day feeling that all is right between my heart and God. No accident, no sickness, no persecution, no peril, no sword can do me any permanent damage. I am a forgiven child of God, and he is bound to see me through. He has sworn he will see me through. The mountains may depart, the earth may burn, the light of the stars may be blown out by the blast of the judgment hurricane; but life and death, things present and things to come, are mine. Yea, further than that—it means a peaceful death. Mrs. Hemans, Mrs. Sigourney, Dr. Young, and almost all the poets have said handsome things about death. There is nothing beautiful about it. When we stand by the white and rigid features of those whom we love, and they give no answering pressure of the hand and no returning kiss of the lip, we do not want anybody poetizing around about us. Death is loathsomeness, and midnight and the wringing of the heart until the tendrils snap and curl in the torture, unless Christ shall be with us. I confess to you an infinite fear, a consuming horror of death, unless Christ shall be with me. I would rather go down into a cave of wild beasts or a jungle of reptiles than into the grave, unless Christ goes with me. Will you tell me that I am to be carried out from my bright home and put away in the darkness. I cannot bear darkness. At the first coming of the evening I must have the gas lighted, and the farther on in life I get the more I like to have my friends round about me.

And am I to be put off for thousands of years in a dark place, with no one to speak to? When the holidays come, and the gifts are distributed, shall I add no joy to the "Merry Christmas," or the "Happy New Year?" Ah, do not point down to the hole in the ground, the grave, and call it a beautiful place: unless there be some supernatural illumination I shudder back from it. My whole nature revolts at it. But now this glorious lamp is lifted above the grave, and all the darkness is gone, and the way is clear. I look into it now without a single shudder. Now my anxiety is not about death; my anxiety is that I may live aright, or I know that if my life is consistent when I come to the last hour, and this voice is silent, and these eyes are closed, and these hands with which I beg for your eternal salvation to-day are folded over the still heart, that then I shall only begin to live.

What power is there in anything to chill me in the last hour if Christ wraps around me the skirt of his own garment? What darkness can fall upon my eyelids then, amid the heavenly daybreak? O, Death, will not fear thee then. Back to thy cavern of darkness, thou robber of all the earth. Thou despoiler of families. With this battle-axe I hew thee in twain from helmet to sandal, the voice of Christ sounding all over the earth and through the heavens: O Death, I will be thy plague. O Grave, will be thy destruction."

To be saved is to wake up in the presence of Christ. You know when Jesus was upon the earth how happy he made every house he went into, and when he brings us to his house in heaven how great shall be our glee. His voice has more music in it than is to be heard in all the oratorios of eternity. Talk not about banks dashed with effluence. Jesus is the chief bloom of heaven. We shall see the very face that named sympathy in Bethany, and take the very hand that dropped its blood from the port beam of the cross. Oh, I want to and in eternity with him. Toward that harbor I steer. Toward that goal I run. I shall be satisfied when I awake with his presence.

Oh, broken-hearted men and women, how sweet it will be in that good land to pour all of your hardships and bereavements and losses into the loving ear of Christ, and then have him explain why it was best for you to be sick, and why it was best for you to be widowed, and why it was best for you to be persecuted, and why it was best for you to be tried, and have him point to an elevation proportionate to your disquietude here, saying, "You suffered with me on earth, come up now and be glorified with me in heaven."

Some one went into a house where there had been a good deal of trouble, and said to the woman there, "You seem to be lonely." "Yes," she said, "I am lonely." "How many in the family?" "Only myself." "Have you had any children?" "I had seven children." "Where are they?" "Gone." "All gone?" "All." "All dead?" "All." Then she breathed a long sigh into the loneliness, and said, "Oh, sir, I have been a good mother to the grave."

And so there are hearts here that are utterly broken down by the bereavements of life. I point you to-day to the eternal balm of heaven.

Oh, aged men and women, grace for three score years and ten! will not your decrepitude change for the leap of a hart when you come to look face to face upon him whom having not seen you love? Oh, that will be the Good Shepherd, not out in the night and watching to keep off the wolves, but with the lamb reclining on the sunlit hill. That will be the captain of our salvation, not amid the roar and crash and boom of battle, but amid his disbanded troops keeping victorious festivity. That will be the bridegroom of the Church coming from afar, the bride leaning upon his arm while he looks down into her face and says, "Behold, thou art fair, my love! Behold, thou art fair!"

A CURIOUS TREE.

In a recent letter from Rev. Mr. D. W. Snyder of Luebo, Congo, Africa, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the missionary enclosed a drawing from which the illustration of a remarkable double tree, on this page, has been reproduced. The peculiar combination is a natural curiosity. Near the foot of a stately palm, fifty feet in height, a strange seed finds lodgment in the soil. As it shoots up, its tendrils reach out towards the great tree and soon they are clinging closely about its trunk. Higher and higher creeps the aerial-roots of the parasite on the palm, and, at a height of twelve feet from the ground, they unite to form a new tree whose topmost branches are soon almost as high as those of the palm itself. The parasite lives upon the palm, drawing its strength and its juices and it is only a matter of time when the noble tree will die of the continuous drain upon its vitality. Like sin which, weak and seemingly insignificant at first, grows in strength with every coil it is permitted to twine around the heart of man, till it saps the moral nature and destroys it, so the parasite of the palm unless dislodged at the outset, will eventually kill the tree, which must submit to its doom in impotent silence.

A GODLY CONTRACTOR.

At the beginning of work on the Manchester ship canal in England, a mission was organized among the workmen by the late Thomas Walker, contractor, a true Christian. Wherever a large body of men were stationed he built a mission hall and employed a missionary. The hut settlements had their own schools and teachers, as the villages were too far away, and the accommodation too meagre. There were also three hospitals for the sick and injured. When the canal was in full operation there were nine missionaries and a clerical superintendent; ten halls, seating from 150 to 600 each. Every week, by these means, thousands of people had the Gospel brought to them, hundreds of children were gathered into Sunday Schools, and most of the men were brought under the influence of the mission by the delivery of noonday addresses all along the canal. Temperance Societies, Bands of Hope, Circulating libraries, Bible and educational classes were kept in regular operation. Many men, women, and children were led to Christ, and many more to sign the temperance pledge. Mr. Frank Foster, of Shandon, Ohio, who took charge of two halls for a time, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that he remembers, with pleasure, how these working men and women stood by him in the open air, speaking earnestly and praying sincerely that their "mates" might be saved. The Navvies (grade-vies) in England are a separate class and go on "tramp" wherever public work is to be done. Until about seventeen years ago they were left to drink and the devil. Sunday was "dog-fighting and hair-cutting day," with not unfrequent "boxing." Mrs. Garnett (sister to Dean Hart of Denver), began a Bible Class for the men, making a "Reservoir" near Leeds. The converted men formed a prayer union, then a Navy Mission Society was organized, which sends a Missionary wherever large numbers of men are employed. The moral character of the men has been raised, and on almost every railway, canal, reservoir or other similar work under construction you would find a church, formed by the converts of this Society, seeking to "hold the fort" for Christ. Two other Societies have been organized of late years, one in Scotland, now sustained by the Presbyterian Church, and one in Italy, as an independent Mission. Is it not time that something was done in this country for this class of migratory laborers?

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

'Twixt Ebal and Gerezim.

(on the left in the illustration), has been at different times adorned with Jewish temples, Roman castles, Christian churches and Mohammedan mosques, all now in ruins. Many travelers climb the mountain for the sake of the glorious view it affords of the vale beneath, of distant Hermor with its snowy fringe and of wide-spreading region of valleys and plains of great natural beauty on either hand, with a line of ruined villages or cities along the northern road that leads to Nablous. On that highway, or near it, the traveler passes successively Bireh, Shafut (the ancient Mizpeh), Tulich-el-ful (formerly Gibeah), Er-Ram (once the powerful Ramah, where Rizpeh's sons were slain), and Seilon (the ancient Shiloh). A little below the hilly ridge and between it and the city are the ruins of a Crusader church, and an antiquated cistern in the solid rock, which the guides declare to be the veritable site of Jacob's Well. From it can be descried the white walls and tents of Nablous. None of those venerable localities would now be recognizable were it not for the well-preserved traditions concerning them, but Nablous itself is still great and populous, and its splendid history is unimpaired. Founded by Shechem, the son of Hamor, it was a great city even in Abraham's day. Near it, is the "Covenant Oak," under which the patriarch pitched his tent on first entering the land of promise, where he already found the idolatrous Canaanites worshipping Baal—the aboriginal inhabitants—in possession. Long ages afterward, when the Canaanites had been driven out, Joshua with his victorious army erected an altar in Shechem, in obedience to the command of Moses. Then dividing his army, he placed one-half on Mount Gerizim and the other half on Mount Ebal, the altar, priests and Levites being on Ebal. After a sacrifice and the pronouncing of "blessings and denunciations," the great assemblage dispersed. Many years afterward the Samaritans built an altar on Gerizim, and the religious rupture between them and the Jews became final when Manasseh, the brother of Juddua, the Hebrew High Priest, having refused to annul his marriage with the daughter of Sanballat, fled to Shechem and became the High Priest of the new sanctuary. The Samaritans then declared Gerizim the true centre of worship, and doctrines and rites similar to those on Mount Moriah were adopted. Thereafter, the Jews had "no dealings with the Samaritans." They hated them more fiercely than they did the heathen, because they were rivals.

The religious separation, which existed in full force and bitterness in our Saviour's time, was never healed. It found expression in the conversation that took place between the Saviour and the woman of Samaria at the well at Sychar, which is the subject of the Sunday School lesson treated on another page in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A BRAVE BIBLE WOMAN.

Thirty years ago European prisoners in Calcutta were constantly visited by a most excellent Bible woman, Miss Andrews. She was a little insignificant-looking Eurasian, but she was strong in simple faith, and mighty in the Scriptures. She spent her days in the cells, teaching each man separately. Some could not even read, and many were hardened desperadoes, but she won the confidence and respect of all, and many remarkable conversions could be traced to no other human instrumentality. One, formerly a soldier, had been condemned to death; another had, single-handed, committed burglaries all over Calcutta; a third, a colored man, was looked upon as incorrigible. These and many others became so totally changed that when transferred to Ootacamund to fulfil their sentences, the Governor of the prison at Madras remarked he had "never seen such prisoners," and the head of the prison at Ootacamund relaxed the rule which forbids all intercourse with a prisoner for the first three months, and allowed them freely to correspond with Miss Andrews. Mr. King, the master of the Calcutta gaol, spoke most highly of the excellent results of her influence, and gave her full liberty of action. It was a quiet work. There was no committee, and the lady who was styled her superintendent confined herself to raising her salary and helping her in any way she could. Such a work might surely be carried on in every prison in this land.

JESUS AT JACOB'S WELL.

S. Lesson for Sept. 16. John 4:9-26. Golden Text, John 4:14. By Mrs. Baxter.

BECAUSE the report of the works of Jesus in Judea, after the Pass-over was over, had reached the ears of the Pharisees, he must needs leave Judea; because there was waiting at Jacob's well, a soul prepared by his Father, "He must needs go through Samaria." There can be no accident, there is no possibility of anything like chance, to those who let themselves be led by the Spirit of God in conjunction with his Word. We have already seen how diligently our blessed Lord sought in the Scriptures to find a clue to all the will of the Father, that he might fulfil it in smallest details, and he knew from his Father, (for he did nothing from himself) that their was some reason why he should go through Samaria. The Lord's journeys were not regulated, either by the convenience or by the pleasantness of the route, but wholly and solely carefully sought and followed. There was no respite, he desired no respite from his ceaseless purpose to please him. Thus when he came near to Sychar, and wearied with his journey, he sat down to rest, on the well, it was not for him an opportunity to complain of the heat or of his weariness, —which was quite as great as ours is on a hot, sultry day, his only occupation was to watch for indications of his Father's object in leading him thither. A woman of the city came to draw water; a most ordinary thing which might happen more often than not, when a traveller sat to rest on the well. But to Jesus everything had a meaning; nothing could be an accident. Why did just this woman come, just at this moment, to draw water when the Son of man, God incarnate, sat there weary? His open ear listened for a word from his Father, and he then knew what next to do.

"Give me to drink," he said to the woman. "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" "If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, Give me to drink; thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water." A simple request rudely refused, did not look promising. But he did not judge according to the sight of his eyes, or the hearing of his ears; he was ever on the watch to learn from his Father. So guided, it was but one minute before he could speak in his own gentle and yet most uncompromising way to this most unpromising subject. Time spent with God in getting is time saved in the end, and the precious education to our own souls that comes through rude and offensive replies, and the priceless opportunities of manifesting the spirit of Christ, need a moment by moment dependence upon God. The woman's attention was secured; her rudeness gave way; it was no longer, "Thou a Jew," when she spoke to him, but "Sir" or "Lord, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep; from whence then hast thou that living water? Art thou greater than our father Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof, and his cattle?" (R.V.) It was ever the purpose of the Lord to lead those who sought him on to higher ground. He answered: "Every one that drinketh of this water shall thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up unto eternal life." (verse 14, R.V.) Without any understanding of the depth of meaning which lay in the Saviour's words, the woman's quick perception shewed her that he spoke of something which was infinitely beyond her present experience, and although she took it altogether materially, having no higher conceptions than the world of time and sense, and earthly consciousness, yet there was in her answer a real appeal to the Saviour: "Sir, give me the water, that I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw."

A definite request made to the Lord Jesus is never left unanswered. And yet how essentially different was the answer to anything which this woman expected! She had asked, all unconsciously, for the Holy Spirit of God, the "living water", and she little knew

The Consequences of her Request.

Living water, the Holy Spirit of God, cannot dwell in unclean vessels. But the woman was now fairly launched into an interview with him who has eternal life to give; she had preferred her petition, Jesus could not and would not ignore it. "Go, call thy husband, and come hither." "I have no husband." "Thou saidst well, I have no husband; for thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in this hast thou said truly." There is no coming to the light without the darkness being revealed and brought to the surface. If this woman would receive anything from Jesus, all hidden things must come to the surface. Oh, how many there are who want to have more to do with Jesus, but they are not willing to let him go deeply with them. They do not want the past to be searched out, they do not want to be humbled; they are not prepared to meet Jesus as a Prophet; a Seer, who sees what others cannot and do not see. How little this woman expected to have the veil torn off from her past, shameful life, and to have its horror exposed to view! And yet her request really involved this. She could never receive the living water to mix with the tainted, corrupted waters of her own life. All must be regulated by God if her prayer were to be answered. Let us take heed how we pray superficially. God is in earnest if we are not, and he will answer our real prayers in his own way. He sees preparation needful where we see nothing.

"Sir, I perceive that thou art a Prophet." Not one word of self-justification, not one attempt to deny, to excuse, or to palliate the awful revelation of her life; no word of curiosity as to how he could have obtained such information regarding her. It was a full admission that she was justly condemned; the Father had seen under all the sin and shame, one to whom he could reveal himself. She continued: "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain; and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." If Jesus were a prophet she must make the most of any religious knowledge she had. And Jesus did not accuse her of presumption and hypocrisy; that with such a past, she should presume to enter on such questions; but he again led her on to higher ground. Reality, this is the main thing; real worship, worship which is a real honor to God. Not hypocrisy, not feigned worship, not personal enjoyment in the search for happy feelings under cover of worshipping God; not a something which ministers to us, but the offering of a conquered, aching heart or hearts, which ministers to God,—such is worship in spirit and in truth.

It was nothing which emanated from her impure mind which made the woman instantly refer to the coming Messiah. Could it be that in her life of sin, of hopeless, falling deeper and deeper and deeper in her shame, there had been a longing, yearning outlook for the expected Messiah, not as was ordinarily expected in her time, but as one who could deal with such a fallen creature as she was? She wanted a Messiah who would show her how to live a changed life! "I know that Messiah cometh (which is called Christ); when he is come, he will declare unto us all things." "I that speak unto thee am he." And she was conquered! The Messiah, whom she had secretly looked for, while others would never have believed that such a woman could have had a thought about him, had broken into her life, and all was changed. The question about temporal water-supply occupied her no longer, her very waterpot was left behind, and with all the frankness which characterized her conversation with the Lord, she appealed to the men of the city: "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" No shielding herself; no sparing her own reputation for a moment. She was well known in the city, perhaps no other person, speaking the same words, would have had the same influence. Her appeal was not unheeded; they came out to meet Jesus.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

Jacob's Well.

AS in last week's lesson, the subject of study is a personal conversation. It is remarkable how much of what we have of Christ's teaching was first uttered, not as a set sermon to a large audience, but in conversation with one or two persons. A very different person was this from the one to whom Christ addressed the words we considered last week. Between Nicodemus and this woman of Samaria there was a wide gulf. He was, blameless, proud, learned; she was a woman of the common people with a tarnished character. As a great writer says: "She was evidently a woman of quick thought, fertile in expedient, and possessed of much natural force, just such a one as might have had five husbands. Love had not taught her delicacy or purity. One does not think pleasantly of five successive marriages, and is not surprised that her last choice had not even the pretence of marriage." Christ does not need to tell her, as he told Nicodemus, that a new birth was necessary. Her own conscience would tell her that. His talking to her at all excites surprise, but his doing so endears him to the fallen and the sinful to this day. The conversation is simple and natural, and as the woman changes the topic, Jesus follows her, not trying to force the talk, but allowing her to lead, bringing it always away from the impersonal and the doctrinal to the practical and the spiritual. He must needs go through Samaria. That was the direct route to Galilee, but devout Jews generally avoided the country, going through Perea in preference. The Jews and Samaritans disliked each other, and had done so since the days of Ezra, when the Jews refused to accept the help of the Samaritans in rebuilding the Temple and the wall. The Samaritans were a mixed race. Who they were and the cause of their being hated, we are told in II. Kings 17: 24-34. To this story may be added the fact, which was a sore grievance, that the Samaritans had sacrilegiously changed the reading of the Pentateuch so as to make Mount Gerizim, instead of Jerusalem, the appointed place of worship. Their religion was a vile mixture of Judaism with idolatry. Jacob's well was on the slope of Mount Gerizim, and may be seen to-day. It is about ten feet in diameter, and about eighty feet deep. A picture of the place appears on first page. Jesus had accomplished about half his journey when he reached the spot and sat down to rest while his companions went to obtain food. It is uncertain what time of the day it was. It John follows his usual custom of reckoning the hours on the Roman system, as we do, the sixth hour would be six o'clock in the evening; but it he follows the Jewish custom, it would be noon. To Jesus, sitting there, comes the woman with her water-pot, and his simple request for a drink introduces the conversation in which he declares himself the Messiah and lays down the broad principle as to worship that the place is not nearly so important as the condition of the heart.

If thou knowest the gift of God The trouble is that people do not know how near God is to them nor how ready he is to give them what they need for their good. A ship after long buffeting with a storm, driven hither and thither, and making no port, was without water. Its crew almost dying with thirst, hailed a passing vessel with the cry, "Water! Water! give us water!" The answer came back, "Let down your buckets; it is fresh water you are sailing in." They were off the coast of Brazil, in the outflow of the Amazon, which pushes its tide of living waters away out many miles into the Atlantic.

Living water. Dr. Cuyler relates that during a long country walk the late Dr. William Wisner stopped at a farm-house and asked for a glass of water. A young lady brought it to him in the porch where he sat, and he entered into conversation with her, telling her of the living water which refreshes and sanctifies the soul. She listened respectfully, but apparently without much feeling. But many years afterward she sought Dr. Wisner out and told him that she had found in Christ the living water to which he had directed her in her youth on that summer's day, and that his words had been used to her conversion.

Shall thirst again. Christ told the secret of real happiness and satisfaction when he spoke of the fountain of living water being "in the man," not outside of him. Those who seek happiness in pleasure, business, or any of the world's pursuits, are like the farmer who was lost on a Western prairie and spent the night under a delusion. He wanted badly to get to his home, but he could not recognize any landmark. At length, when almost in despair he came to the track of another sleigh. He followed it thinking it would bring him to safety, and was much rejoiced when after awhile he heard the jingle of other bells. But reaching the man he had been following, he found that he, too, was lost, and that he had both been moving in a circle, following each other round and round. They were both disappointed, but after some talk occurred to them to look at the North Star and before morning they were safe at home. The guiding light is in the heavens and there is nothing but dissatisfaction and disappointment in any other help.

Where men ought to worship. The old idea of worshipping idols led to the idea of sacred places which still survives among us. Many still imagine that it is only in church that God can be truly worshipped whereas he is ready to listen to a prayer uttered in business or on the street. History relates that, when the Roman conqueror captured the temple in Jerusalem and drove headlong into the holy of holies he was surprised at finding no graven image, no idol, no shining presence, no shrine of gold with a figure of the Deity inside it. "Why, it is only a vacant sanctuary," he exclaimed. So people think of the world but the Christian sees God in every flow and every part of creation.

Whence hast thou living water? The question is often asked about children and grown people who are sick or crippled, how it is that they seem happy when well people are discontented and miserable. The answer is that they go to God continually for living water. Day by day they get fresh supplies which are exhausted with the day's pain. The old fable of the buckets illustrates this. "How dismal you look," said one bucket to his companion as they were going to the well. "Ah!" replied the other. "I was reflecting upon the uselessness of our being tilled; for let us go away ever full, we always come back empty." "I know, how strange to look at in that way," said the other bucket. "Now, I enjoy the thought that, however empty we are, we always go away full. Only look at that light, and you'll be as cheerful as I am."

He would have given thee. The springs of the base of the Alpine mountains are the freshest and freshest when the summer sun has dried and parched the verdure in the valleys below. The heat that has burned arid plains has melted mountain glaciers, snow, and increased the volume of mountain streams. It often happens that when human aid seems powerless to help us, and the springs of earthly comfort and hope are dried up, that God's great spirit flows freshest and fullest to gladden the

A Friend's Mission to China.

Miss Margaret I. Holme Going to Nanking from the New York Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends to Labor for Christ among China's Millions.

MENTION was made in this journal a few weeks ago, of the noble effort of the Christian Endeavor Societies connected with the New York Yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, to commission one of their number as a missionary to China. The effort has been entirely successful. The New York Society has raised $250 the Brooklyn Society $300, and Friends' Societies in other parts of the State have raised the balance of the funds required. We are now through the kindness of Mr. J. L. Spicer enabled to publish a portrait of the new missionary and some facts concerning her and the work in which she will be engaged.

Miss Margaret I. Holme, whose love of souls and devotion to Christ's cause have led her to undertake this unattractive and possibly perilous task, is well fitted by education and experience for the duty. Nothing has been more conspicuous in her character and life, says one of her associates, than the complete surrender she has made of herself to the Master. She has looked to him in her every step for guidance, and has held herself entirely at his disposal wherever he might call her to go. The fact that the condition of the heathen world became a matter of personal concern to her, led her to think that God was calling her to work for him in that sphere, and when the special needs of China appealed to her with especial prominence, she felt sure that the call was real. She was confirmed in this belief by the removal of obstacles which appeared to bar her path, and when the way was opened for her to enter Rev. A. B. Simpson's Training College in New York, she availed herself gladly of the opportunity. In the firm conviction that she was walking in the path God had marked out for her. Fresh confirmation has come in the action of the Christian Endeavor Societies, who are now sending her to the field which has been most in her thoughts, and for which she has been specially trained. She sails from Vancouver, B. C., on Sept. 17, and is rejoicing in the nearness of her departure. The natural pain of parting from the beloved members of her family seems to be swallowed up in the joy of obeying the call to service. She has no fears for her safety or for support in her arduous duties; but does not assured that he who has called her will protect and care for her.

Miss Holme is not a beginner in this life of faith. She witnessed it as a girl in the life of her mother, and for the past twelve years it has been her own experience. She is an Englishwoman by birth, and is about thirty years of age. Her youth was a period of vicissitude. During her childhood her father met with business reverses, and her family had to adapt itself to straitened resources. Shortly afterward, her father's death left his widow with a family of three daughters and a son to struggle with the world alone—yet not alone, for God was with them. Miss Holme has a vivid recollection of one night in her girlhood when she spoke to her Christian mother about her soul, and of the solemn hour when, the rest of the family wrapped in slumber, she knelt by that mother's side and gave herself to Christ. Since then her one desire has been to be spent in his service, and she is thankful that he has deigned to accept of her labor. It is now eight years since the family left the mother country and settled on our shores. They had been members of the Society of Friends on the other side, and on coming here they joined the Friends' Meeting in Brooklyn, where they were warmly welcomed in the name of the Lord.

The Mission to which Miss Holme is going as a worker for Christ is located at Nanking, a city of about half a million population in Southern China. It is about a hundred miles from the East coast and was formerly the capital of the Empire. In some respects it is still more influential than Peking, the present capital, for it is Nanking that the nobles go for their education at its famous University. The Mission was organized in the spring of 1890, by the Society of Friends in Ohio. Esther Butler went out as the pioneer missionary and she enjoyed the distinction of being the first Quaker missionary who ever went to China. She labored with the quiet, unostentatious devotion characteristic of the Society, and with the success which God gives to those who think more of the Master and his work than they do of themselves. It soon became necessary to furnish her with a headquarters appropriate to the extensive work that had grown up. An excellent house planned expressly for the work of the Mission was erected, at a cost of seven thousand dollars. The better facilities it afforded gave a new impetus to the missionary labor and new needs soon developed. One of these which appealed strongly to the heart of the gentle lady at the head of the Mission, was for an orphanage, where the little waifs whose lot in China is peculiarly sad, could be sheltered and educated under Christian auspices. This need the Society of Friends promptly supplied. A large edifice costing over four thousand dollars was built in connection with the mission, and was speedily tenanted with the bereaved children. The institution is one of genuine helpfulness of a most Christlike kind, and it has in its elements of hope which cheer the hearts of the workers and the church. The adult Chinaman is hard to win and hard to keep, so many and strong are the ties which hold him to the religion of his fathers; but the children rescued from destitution and probably from early death, are not so bound, and are responsive to Christian influence. As they leave the place where they have been sheltered, to go into active Chinese life, they will carry with them the results of their religious training, and exert a beneficial influence wherever they may go. Perhaps in such institutions lies our best hope for the evangelization of China. Certainly the China of the next generation would be a better and happier nation if the example of the Society of Friends were followed by every Missionary Society in the empire.

A new project in connection with the mission has recently been launched. The urgent need of medical help is felt by all missionaries in China, especially surgical help, the Chinese medical fraternity being almost without knowledge and experience in surgery. The Friends' Mission therefore, proposes to establish a hospital for women in connection with its station at Nanking, and we learn that sufficient funds have already been contributed to erect the building. A training school for nurses and teachers will be attached so that the Mission will be complete in all departments.

Korea Still Silent.

No News yet received to Substantiate the Reports of Famine and Death—Result of "The Christian Herald's" Inquiries.

SEVERAL weeks have now elapsed since the first intimations of the prevalence of a great famine in Korea, were telegraphed from Washington. It was represented, at that time, that the situation in that afflicted country was painful in the extreme and that hundreds were dying daily of actual starvation. The publication of these statements in the daily press and especially the interview with the Korean Minister in Washington, Mr. Ye Sung Soo, which appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, excited widespread sympathy in behalf of the Korean people. In that interview, as our readers will remember, the Minister repeated the story of famine and disaster, and described the wretched condition to which his countrymen had been reduced by war and want together. The proprietor of this journal, moved by sympathy, offered to contribute one thousand barrels of flour toward any relief cargo that might be sent to Korea, and the Minister thereupon expressed the desire that all funds and contributions subscribed for that purpose might be sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. At the same time, it was announced in these columns that no conclusive steps would be taken in the matter until cable or mail advices arrived from Korea, confirming the rumors that had reached the Korean Legation in Washington, whence they had been widely disseminated through the press.

Up to the present writing, nothing has yet been received from Korea by mail or cable, to substantiate the gloomy reports of famine and death. Cable despatches of inquiry, sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to the American Minister at Seoul, the agent of the American Trading Company at Chemulpo, and Rev. Mr. Hall, missionary, have remained unanswered, owing probably to the partial telegraph blockade caused by the war; our State Department in Washington has no advices that tell of

In our issue of last week, it was announced that, owing to our inability to secure advices from Korea, confirmatory or otherwise, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would defer action on the proposed relief movement. The further and exhaustive inquiries made during the past week are still inconclusive. Unless, by September 15, we receive information from authentic sources of the continuance of the famine up to that time and in the aggravated form in which it was supposed to exist nearly a month ago, we shall then feel justified in concluding that Korea is not in such dire need of relief as His Excellency, Minister Ye considered her to be when he issued his appeal. And unless the contributors to the Korean Fund notify us that it is their positive wish that the money they have subscribed shall be sent to Seoul to the care of the American Minister for the suffering who may be found there, every subscription will be refunded to the sender by registered mail, at the expense of the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

AN OCEAN WAVE.

THAT which has been to me one of the great wonders in my voyages across the Atlantic and is now as fascinating in my first voyage over the Pacific, will I suppose be to me as great a wonder until the last push of the steamer after I have entered New York Harbor. I mean the architecture and adornment of an ocean wave. What mathematics could contrive its curve, or what compass execute it? Its gracefulness, its ease, its perfection, its suggestiveness of more curves if it desired to make them. Then the lace work of foam hung on it, all its threads woven by the finger of God, and looped up, and unrolled, and folded, and put back on shelves of crystal. Then the top of the wave as it makes up its mind to recoil or drop on the other side or mount higher. Now the white melting into the blue like snowy clouds dissolving into the blue of skies. Then two waves each garnished with surf rising to meet each other, and married into one bliss of opalescence, and emerald, and fire. Oh! the rise, the rush, the arch, the fall, the voice, the splendor, the convulsion, the miracle, the coronation, the divinity in an ocean billow. All the harmonies of heaven did not make St. John forget the "voice of many waters."

But there is the illumined wave, or the one that glows as it is struck through with light from the other side, or the wave that takes on the colors of hovering cloud, and is saffron or orange or solferino or beryl or amber, or the shifting of all the colors from the center of the wave's curve to the coronal and the base. Oh, the living wave, the inspired wave, the pictured wave, the wave just born, the wave just dying. The complexion of the wave is ever changing; fluorescent, rufescent, iridescent. Now phosphorescence decorates it with a flash, or the night sinks into it a silver anchorage of star, or the morning puts upon its brow a coronet. Blanced into white or blushed into carmine. Now black as a raven's wing, now roseate as the flamingo's plumage. From russet to ultra-marine, and thence to malachite, then incarnadined as if wounded into vermilion or magenta. I celebrate not the ocean. It is too big. I celebrate only one ocean wave. But there are times when it is hushed to sleep, on the great bosom of its mother which never ceases to heave, for though the billow may slumber, the ocean keeps its everlasting swell. The child may sleep, while the mother rests not. But he who has only studied the wave asleep or the wave a-roll, does not fully know it. The wave has moods. It sometimes passes from the calm to the irate, from the beautiful to the awful, from the pleasant to the terrific, from the slumberous to the paroxysmal, from esthetics to demoniacs, and though now it may play with the zephyr, it may afterwards wrestle with Caribbean whirlwind or Mediterranean euroclydon. Nothing can stand before it when commanded to destroy. It rallies from the abysses a semi-omnipotence. From all sides under the strength of the winds it rolls towards the ship or bombards the shore. It was one wave that consummated almost every shipwreck. The preliminary waves, the preparatory forces, the introductory turries may have done their work, but the final stroke was left for one climacteric force, and that gathered and rolled up and surged forward, black with wrath and charged upon the palaces of the deep, submerging them, or moved into the unsheltered harbor with the twisted bolts, and the split beams of ocean conquerors.

The ocean sentenced to death in the Book which says, "There shall be no more sea," seems determined to demonstrate, before it is slain, what one wave can do, in lighting up the world with the beautiful, or blackening it under the swoop of a tornado.

COUNTY FAIRS.

IT is a grand thing once a year to have the farmers and stock-raisers demonstrate what they are doing. It is cheering, while the fact of the advancement of the human race is established, to know that the herds and the flocks are also improving, and that although at the beginning the fruits and harvests were blasted by the first east wind that swept Paradise, now through the skill of agriculturist and pomologist and botanist the fields and the orchards and the gardens of our time are putting on a luxuriance at least suggestive of what the bountiful yield of the earth was before the first thorn stung the foot of our progenitors. When from the Edenic state man fell, at the same time the brute creation fell, and even inanimate nature reeled under the shock. The work of restoration is now going rapidly on, and, as it is hard to tell what the human race will be 300 years from now if the earth continues in existence, it would be equally difficult to prophesy the flora and fauna of the twenty-second century. Daniel Webster, after he was no longer able to walk across his farm at Marshfield, Mass., used to sit out on his piazza and have his cattle driven past him that he might breathe their clover-scented breath and admire their proportions, and it is a healthy and exalted experience in these autumnal days to have the herds and flocks of America driven within sight of the multitudes gathered on the fair grounds.

Such occasions also demonstrate that the horse is being regenerated. After for ages being whipped and galled and glandered and spavined through the cruelty of man, this creature is coming to appreciation and there is a possibility that he may through kindness and skill be made as beautiful and majestic an animal as the one you hear prancing and neighing in the Bible as Job cries out: "Hast thou given the horse strength? Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? He paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in his strength. He goeth on to meet the armed men. He saith: among the trumpets, ha! ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains and the shouting." My admiration for the horse is all the more confirmed when I see that his morals have not been in the slightest hurt by the roughs and the jockeys with whom he is often compelled to associate. Improving all the time is he, in arch of neck, in flame of eye, in roundness of limb, in speed of hoof, and I pray all success to the societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals which have done so much to arrest the abominations which have been practiced upon this king of beasts. Without betting and no surrounding of dissipation, let this mighty and beautiful creature of God—a well shaped and well broken horse—be brought on the fair grounds for admiration. If he be so constructed as to be able to go fast, let him go. Many a horse enjoys speed better than tardiness. At the rate some people drive it would have taken ascending Elijah's horses of fire six weeks to reach the gates of heaven. Glad am I that in our country and state fair it is being demonstrated that quadruped and bird and flower and fruit and grain are coming to higher standards, and instead of the plucked dominick, the Cochinchina, and instead of the poor runt of the pasture field, the Alderney, and instead of the sheep hardly worth the shearing, the Southdown, and instead of the flower with a few straggling leaves, the rose with all the splendors of rising and setting suns.

All patronage and prosperity to the county fairs. It would do those of us who live cramped up in cities an everlasting good if we could spend at least a half day this autumn in some county fair, amid the neighing of the horses and the bleating of the sheep and the crowing of the chanticleers. Especially would it turn those of us who were born in the country back again to boyhood and girlhood, and we would see the cattle standing again with their head through the bars as we went to the fields to bring them home at the eventide, and old-time voices that have long been silent might revive again, and our memory would be full of echoes glad and pathetic.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Subscriber, Willimantic Camp Ground. A friend recollects hearing the following lines sixty or more years ago:

"Look astern, on your way,
See your end, mark it well?"
Can any one supply the rest.

Possibly some reader may be able to give this information.

J. S. Johnson, Nashville, Tenn. What are the avowed religions of the rulers of the leading nations of Europe?

England, Germany, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Protestant; France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Austria, Belgium, Catholic; Russia, Greece, Greek Church; Turkey, Mohammedan.

A. P. Body, Reading, Pa. A young man here desires to become a minister of the Gospel, but his father opposes the choice. Does he do wrong or break the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother," if he goes ahead against his parents' wishes?

See answer to T. D. F., Elmira, Kan., in the MAIL-BAG of June 27th, last which would seem to apply to your case.

Reader. What must a person whose greatest fault is selfishness, do to overcome it?

Cultivate generous impulses and embrace every chance to do generous deeds. You will not lack opportunity, if you watch for it. Try to both feel and act kindly, and to anticipate the wants of others. If you are a member of the Epworth League or King's Daughters, take an active part in all missions of benevolence and charity. For the rest, pray to God to help you to overcome your selfishness, and the change will surely come.

August Verbist, Hope Villa. Is Dr. Talmage's book "From Manger to Throne" published in the French language? Where can I get the same and what is the price?

Although Dr. Talmage's sermons are published in nearly every language under the sun, we do not believe that his new book "From Manger to Throne" has yet been translated into French. You can procure the regular edition in English by sending $2 to this office, which will also entitle you to receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year.

Mrs. C. E. Elliott (a subscriber), sends us the following lines to "Mother":

When mother's face no more you see,
Think of the truths she taught to thee;
And when you bend your knees in prayer,
Think of dear mother over there.
Think of the hands that toiled for you;
Think of the heart that ever was true;
Think of the tear that oft would start;
When you had wounded that kind heart;
Though not a word her lips had spoken,
You knew her heart was almost broken.
Have you wandered far away?
Have you ceased my child to pray?
Oh, why not return to-day?
Jesus calls, do not delay.

H. R. White, Beverly, Mass. I have seen Dr. Talmage's book, entitled: "Manger to Throne," and would like to own it. Will you please let me know the price of your paper, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for one year and the book?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, and a copy of "From Manger to Throne," will be forwarded to any one desiring to subscribe, on receipt of $2 at this office.

Mrs. Kirk, Plainville, Neb. Is it possible to harmonize the two genealogies of Christ given respectively by Matthew and Luke?

Many efforts have been made to do so and several hypotheses have been suggested which are reasonable. The one that commends itself to the largest number of scholars is that of Dr. Barrett, who contends that Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph and Luke that of Mary. The husband and wife belonging to the same tribe would naturally have in their genealogical lines some ancestors common to both. After a great deal of research, he discovered that the Jews had a habit, in tracing the female line, of speaking of a woman's husband as the son of her father, when really he was the son-in-law. Thus Luke speaks of Heli as the father of Joseph, when he was Mary's father and Joseph's father-in-law. It is that theory is correct, Jesus could trace his genealogy through Mary to David and Abraham. That there was no flaw in it we may be sure, otherwise the Jews would surely have pointed it out when his Messiahship was claimed. It is matter of history that this question was never raised during his life or for a hundred years after his death.

Mrs. Mary Rutledge, 636 Front St., Fort Madison, Ia., writes us:

Please ask your readers to send religious papers, especially THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to me for use in State Prison work. The good that such literature does in this work shall never be known in this world.

Margaret Leith, Kirkwood, Wis. If you could put the pattern of Mrs. Evelyn M. Dick's bed-spread (which she gave to the Moody Fund), in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it would be pleasing to many of your readers.

It has already been pictorially presented in our issue of Aug. 1.

Old Subscriber, Santa Ana, Cal. Who is Prof. Fall, and how old a man is he? Has he predicted the end of the world this month?

He is a distinguished Vienna scientist, now about in mid-life. He has made no such absurd prediction, nor any prediction that this continent need worry about. His forecasts had relation to seismic and tidal disturbances elsewhere.

D. H. Johnson, Abbeville, N. C. Is it proper for a minister of the Gospel to kiss young women, who are not related to him, in the congregation or publicly? Is it proper under any circumstances?

Such practices are nauseating to all sensible people, and are not tolerated in decent society anywhere. We know of no Christian sect or denomination that would encourage public and promiscuous osculation, and those individuals who make a habit of it need to be sharply looked after. Kissing among relations within certain degrees, or even between very dear friends may, under certain circumstances, be permissible, as an expression of joy or sorrow at meeting or parting.

C. S. P., Montville, Ct. Do you think it is right for a Christian to make a practice of spending the Sabbath at home, reading sermons instead of going to church?

A true Christian will not neglect the appointed ordinances of religion and if church be available, he will go there to worship, no matter how simple the service. For a healthy man or woman professing Christianity to remain at home Sundays instead of going to church to publicly join with others in divine worship, is seemingly without excuse. Sermon-reading is a poor substitute for the audible Word, and may be a mere pretext for indulging laziness.

J. F., Brooklyn, N. Y. In Christ's talk with Nicodemus he spoke of the Holy Spirit's influence being like wind blowing where it listeth; am I then to blame if it does not touch me?

It is rather a question of loss to you than of blame. It will be a deplorable calamity for you if the Holy Spirit does not influence you. The very possibility should prompt you to seek the blessing most earnestly, and God has promised to give the Holy Spirit to them that ask it. (Luke 11:13.) He delights to answer such a prayer. Referring again to the simile of the wind, you should remember that although the sailor cannot bring the wind, he can do his part by hoisting the sail.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

CHINA IN THE FIELD.

WAR has evidently set in in earnest in Corea. That at least four battles have been fought is certain, but of their results and of the actual situation scarcely anything is known. All reports come from either Japanese or Chinese sources, and one is as unreliable as the other. The Japanese newspapers have been notified that if any news of the war is published other than that supplied by the Government, the Editor or Publisher, or both, would be imprisoned for a year. The result is that any report received from Yokohama announces a Japanese victory, and any report received from Shanghai announces a Japanese defeat, and there is a fair presumption that the two reports refer to the same engagement. The Chinese are clearly vastly superior in numbers, but the Japanese are superior in drill, organization and equipment. It is the conflict of the whale and the sword-fish. If the Chinese prevail, it will be by protracting the struggle and wearing out the strength of the Japanese, who cannot replace the army in Corea so easily as can China. Even in the matter of numbers and equipment it is difficult to get the truth, owing to the gross exaggeration of the official reports. A Hong Kong correspondent of the New York "Sun" gives an astonishing report of the extent to which this exaggeration prevails on the Chinese side. He says that from the chief generals down to the captains there is corruption and misrepresentation on the most impudent scale. A general draws pay for five regiments when he only has four; a colonel for ten companies when he has eight, and a captain for a hundred men when he has fifty. The Government has on its books as an effective force, for which full pay is appropriated, a brigade of cavalry which really consists of only twenty men mounted on ponies, who earn their living by carrying the mails of the local post offices. Many other illustrations are given of the frauds practiced on the Government. Beside this, the number of men actually in service by no means consists of properly drilled and equipped troops. A large part of the army belongs to the old force of "Banner-men," who know nothing of the methods of modern warfare. A second section is called "the army of the Green Standard," which is worthless in military efficiency, and is for the greater part equipped with axes, spears and bows and arrows. A third consists of irregulars who have done occasional service, but whom it would be difficult to mobilize. The fourth, which is the really effective force, is the army organized by Li Hung Chang, the prime minister, and one or two southern viceroys. It has been drilled by Europeans and its arms are of the modern pattern. Nominally its strength is said to be six hundred thousand men, but it is doubtful whether more than three hundred thousand could be put in the field. It has excited the jealousy of the other sections of the army, whose commanders would not be sorry to see it beaten. Thus the Chinese army, although numbered by millions, is divided in itself, and has comparatively few soldiers able and willing to do effective service. It is sad to think that the army of Christ in the world should to any extent resemble it in these characteristics, yet it is true that those who are loyal and zealously serving him are but a small band compared with the millions who, living in Christian lands, call themselves Christians. (Num. 32: 6.)

Prof. Koch's Discovery.

A New York physician who has recently visited Germany reports in enthusiastic terms the discovery by Dr. Koch, the eminent bacteriologist of a cure for diphtheria. He states that in every instance in which a patient is treated within thirty-six hours of being exposed to the infection the disease is warded off. In some cases that he investigated there was a moral certainty from the nature of the exposure that the patient would have taken the malady if he had not been treated with Dr. Koch's remedy. Its principle, like his remedy for consumption, is that of inoculation. Bacilli from a diphtheritic patient are cultured and an animal is inoculated with a mild infusion. Larger infusions are given on successive days until the animal ceases to suffer from them, and no swelling, loss of appetite, or other ill effects are produced by the inoculations. Its blood is then said to be thoroughly impregnated with anti-toxine and can be used to inoculate human beings. It appears from the physician's report that the remedy is not so efficacious when it is administered after the disease developed. Only one-half of the patients recovered who had allowed five days to elapse between the date of infection and their inoculation with the remedy. Every day's interval lessened their chances of recovery. The same thing may be said of spiritual remedies for sin. Though it is the glory of Christianity that the hoary estate between them, but when the will was read, it turned out that the testator had left them only a small legacy and had bequeathed the bulk of his property to the poor. It was to be used for erecting soup kitchens and other institutions for the benefit of the hungry and penniless. The brothers denounced the will as unnatural and contended that it should be set aside as the production of an insane person. This the judge declined to do, on the ground that apart from the will, there was no evidence of the testator being insane and that bequests to the poor were not in themselves proofs of insanity. It cannot, however, be said that the brothers were altogether wrong in characterizing the will as unnatural. The testator departed from the natural course, which would be to make the welfare of his relatives his first concern next to his own. But the natural course is not always the wisest or best course. Christ demands a better love than we give to relatives and he intimated that those who did his will were nearer and dearer to him than even his mother. (Matt. 12: 46-50.)

To Electroplate Ships.

An electrician in New Jersey believes he has invented a device which will solve a problem connected with our war-ships. Whenever a vessel returns from a cruise, nide of copper to clean the surface and to leave a film. The boxes will then be used as an ordinary electric bath by which a deposit of copper as large as the boxes will be fixed to the ship, and so by a removal of the boxes from place to place, the whole hull will be covered. He finds that iron or steel vessels may be treated in this way, thus obviating the need for sheathing. The cost will be less than cleaning and painting, and the results superior. A difficulty analogous to the one which this process is designed to remedy besets the Christian in his voyage through life. The world's evil clings to him like the barnacles to the ship as he moves through it, and it retards his progress in divine things. The remedy in his case, however, is not an outside veneer, but a more thorough change of nature which is accomplished by the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit. (Gal. 5: 16.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Last Year in Response to a Request made by the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, many of our readers were kind enough to furnish him with the names of twenty-five church members or adult Sunday School workers, in return for which they received a beautiful section of Olive Wood, cut from the Mount of Olives and polished in Jerusalem by workmen from Bethlehem. We have all these names now on file in our office, but would like to increase the list. We therefore, make the same liberal offer, namely, a section of genuine Olive Wood for every twenty-five new names not repetitions—but names which have not been already sent in, and hope that as many of our subscribers as can supply such names will avail themselves of this generous proposition. The Olive Wood is sent either by mail or express, all charges prepaid. Do not enclose communications of any other character in the application. Address your letter Premium Department, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

At THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack-on-the-Hudson, over one thousand children have already been accommodated this summer. It is proposed to continue the work for some time longer. The expense will be about one thousand dollars. The funds received for the Home are now completely exhausted and we would esteem it a great favor if such of our readers as have it in their heart to help in this blessed work of caring for the little ones, will send in promptly whatever sums they can conveniently contribute. Such contributions will be duly acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The largest Sunday School Library in the world is in Washington, D.C., the property of the Assembly Presbyterian Church.

Rev. Lucius Hippolyte, Pastor of the Baptist Church, Port-au-Prince, Hayti, sends an earnest plea for help in the evangelization of that island with its million of population.

Mr. Henry Varley's many friends in this country will be glad to know that his mission in Valvern, Eng., has become a great success. He expects to sail for Australia in November.

Eleven Polar Expeditions are now on their way to the North, three of them being primarily for the rescue of other explorers.

A Three Days' Sunday School Convention will be held in Washington, beginning October 8th. The principal object of this convention is to increase the interest in and improve the methods of Sunday School work.

One of the Best Things that can be Said of any Christian was recently spoken of a deceased convert in China by one of his friends. The Chinaman said "there was no difference between his life and the Book."

It is proposed that the Christian physicians of America and England present a well-bound copy of the Bible to each of the physicians of Japan, of whom there are forty thousand. The fund for the purpose has been opened in London.

The venerable Dr. John G. Paton, whose recent visit to this country will be long a cherished memory in the churches, has sailed for the New Hebrides. He takes with him three missionaries and sufficient money to purchase a new mission ship.

A marriage in which a large number of Christian people in all lands take an interest was solemnized on Aug. 29, in the Congregational Church, Northfield, Mass. It was the marriage of Mary, daughter of Major and Mrs. D.W. Whittle, to Mr. W. R. Moody.

Two Missionaries—W. C. Palmer and J. E. White—are setting out to labor among the negroes on the banks of the Mississippi. They have bought a stern-wheel steamer and fitted it up for the service and called it the "Morning Star." They expect to live on board and hold services there, or on land, as circumstances may favor.

According to the latest census returns, there are in New Zealand 1,197 churches and chapels, a growth of 134 in five years; 241 school houses and 161 dwellings and public buildings are used for Sabbath purposes, all these various edifices having accommodations for about 278,000 persons, less than half the population of the colony, and are actually attended by less than 200,000. Of the various denominations, the Presbyterians report 40,785 attendants, the Episcopalians 37,252, Roman Catholics 30,525, Wesleyans 27,106, and Salvationists 14,442.

A Wealthy New York Lady whose Name is not disclosed has purchased a house at Sharon, Ct., and devoted it to the use of crippled children. Several acres of well wooded ground surround the house and the lady has provided a number of invalid chairs on wheels for the use of the children who can thus spend their time under the trees. The children's hospitals of New York keep the house supplied with their patients, many of whom have been greatly benefited by the change and the fresh air. The house is named, The Bobolink.

headed sinner may be saved, yet it is a matter of fact that few are converted in old age, and every year's delay makes it more difficult to renounce sin and turn to Christ. (Eccles. 12: 1.)

A Will Upheld.

A suit to set aside a will has just been dismissed in a New York court. The testator was an eccentric bachelor, who when he died was eighty-one years old. He wrote the will himself a few months before he died and it had numerous interlineations and erasures. It looked as if he had altered his mind several times after signing it, and instead of making a new will had erased and changed parts of the one already made. He had two brothers, who expected to divide especially if she has been in tropical climates, it is necessary to have her hull scraped clear of barnacles, and painted. In the case of the cruiser "Chicago," the cost of this work is twelve thousand dollars. It has to be done, however, as the barnacles which adhere to the hull not only decrease her speed, but are destructive to the hull if they are not removed at short intervals. The fact that barnacles do not adhere to copper suggested to the electrician the idea he has worked out. It is to put a sheet of copper only the twelfth of an inch thick on the entire hull. His plan is to have a number of boxes whose edges conform to the shape of the hull, and are made air-tight with rubber packing, and to attach them to the outside of the ship when she is in dock. He will fill the boxes with a solution of cya-

Still on the Jericho Road.

The Brook Cherith and Memories of Elijah—An Adventure with Camels.

BEYOND the Khan Hathrur, the road from Jerusalem to Jericho grows more difficult until narrowing, almost without warning, into a bridle-path, it ends the speculations in which we have indulged as to the possibility of going by carriage all the way to the Jordan. So rough and straight is it that more than once I insist upon alighting and walking around a sharp spur where the track is a narrow ledge overhanging a precipice, or the hill we are to descend seems, to my apprehension, to have no more incline than the side of a house.

The brooding silence is oppressive to ear and spirit. Alcides avers gloomily that the "best Baedeker for Palestine" opens of itself at Jeremiah whenever we would consult it. Even a cluster of black tents would be "comely" to eyes wearied by the illimitable stretch of treeless mountains, but we see none. Following the example of their robber ancestry, the Bedouins burrow in ravine and "wady," and natural dens and caves of the earth. The shepherds far up the heights, a few men on foot and still fewer upon donkeys are all the fellow-creatures we see until, in the dreariest part of the route, a defile so deep that the sun never visits it in winter except at noon, a woman rides briskly past. Being portly of figure, she is no inconsiderable load for her donkey, and parcels of divers patterns and weights are strapped to her saddle, but she goes by our party at a smart amble and is soon lost behind the bulging shoulder of a hill. Two men, similarly mounted and a pack-donkey hardly visible under his load of baskets and sacks, follow her.

"An enterprising lady," the guide says admiringly. "She and her brother keep the hotel at Jericho. And keep it well. She has been to Jerusalem for supplies."

The incident is incongruous with the stern desolation of the scene, but we are glad of the relief of a laugh. A modern hotel, household supplies of sugar, eggs, flour, and coffee, not to dwell upon the brisk donkey and his plump rider,—bring us down—(or up) from meditations among the tombs of a mighty Past. The cheerful ring of our voices comes back in a shocked echo from the furrowed walls closing us in on either hand. The upper heights are honeycombed with caves, winding paths, slight threads at a distance, leading to black mouths of some. These were, ages ago, the cells of hermits, emulous of austere Elijah's fame, and little dreaming, amid fastings and prayers and temptations, of the far different warfare to be waged against flesh and blood by their successors in the tenantry of the high places of the rocks.

Down the Wady Kelt which, by and by, runs parallel with our road, wears a fierce little brook, brawling so noisily that we can hear it before we can see it.

"The Brook Cherith," David names it, and we have enough to think and talk of for the next mile. We alight then, and quitting the track, clamber over intervening hills and gulleys to reach the cliff at whose base foams the fussy torrent. It will shrink to a tiny rivulet in summer, and is making the most of its day of power. Right over against us, scarcely distinguishable in the shadow of the perpendicular wall opposite from the rock to which it clings, is a miniature edition of a Greek convent. Those who founded it believed, or said that they believed, the site to be near Elijah's hiding-place during the miraculous drouth that plagued the land in Ahab's reign. They named it, however, the Monastery of St. John, the Elijah of the New Testament. It is marvelous how the materials for building even so tiny an edifice were transported to the chosen spot, although we trace again upon the face of the precipice thread-like paths along which wild goats might tear the bottom we take a sharp turn and another world opens upon us. It is as if the two peaked promontories in which the sides of the pass terminate were rolled back like gates, and the landscape unfolded panorama-wise before our eyes. The plain of the Jordan loses itself behind sand-hills on our left, and farther away on the right is the Dead Sea, blue and serene as the Mediterranean on this afternoon.

Glimpses of the sacred river sparkle between clumps of green. The oasis, luxuriant upon the banks, disperses in sparser verdure and coppices of thorn trees receding from the water. The white tents of our camp gleam near one of these groves, and to reach it we must cross a plain overgrown with bushes, nearly a mile in width. The track is sandy; the mules with the best intentions with regard to their waiting supper, cannot make much speed. I am ashamed of the folly, but I have not been so undeniably terrified since first setting foot upon Syrian soil, as in discovering that the moving brown objects partially concealed by the low growth are camels,—a herd of them pasturing with nobody near to hinder any demonstration they may take it into their hideous heads to make toward the equipage which excites their curiosity. Utterly ignorant as to the stampeding proclivities of my favorite abominations, I do not know whether to expect a charge in force, or a window on my right hand, I see a particularly malevolent camel, a big blackish brute, "point" me fifty feet off, and come straight toward the palankeen, nose outstretched and shoulder hunched up after the manner of that most idiotic of feathered bipeds—a turkey-hen. In a truce a dozen other noses take the same line, and a row of the horrors is coming directly for us. The muleteers pay no attention to them, until my energetic gesticulation directs their eyes to the peril. Then both laugh a little, and one shouts carelessly at the foremost camel who halts to stare at us,—and with joy unspeakable, yet which I dare not confess, I behold the top of Alcides's "kafeyah" above the bushes that swallowed him up, just now, and he cantered back to see what has become of me. With all the consideration for my welfare that never sleeps or wavers, he has not betheought himself of my antipathy for the desert craft.

"What harm could they do to you? They are the most peaceable of animals," he chides, laughingly.

I offer no excuse for the silly terrors, from the effects of which I did not fully recover until the cup of four-o'clock tea Imbarak has ready when we dismount at the tent-door, has been swallowed and the exceeding beauty of the view begins to act soothingly upon jarred nerves. The absurd incident has peaceable fruits of righteousness in one particular, at least;—I shall never again sneer at a woman who jumps upon a chair at sight of a mouse, or screams when a spider runs over neck or cheek.

The situation of the camp is, as usual, well chosen. We are, as I have indicated, upon the outskirts of the oasis. Beyond the band of verdure, apparently so near that we are incredulous as to the miles that separate us from them, rise the mountains of Moab, purpled by the sunset, solemn with the glooms of falling evening. A double peak is pointed out as Mount Nebo.

There is light enough for us to read in the clear type of the "International Teachers' Edition," how "Moses went up from the plains of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah" — (or the hill), "that is over against Jericho. And the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead, unto Dan, and all Naphthali, and the land of Ephraim, and Manasseh, and all the land of Judah, unto the utmost sea;"

("That is the Mediterranean," is interjected here.)

"And the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm-trees, unto Zoar."

Jericho was worth having in that age, and fourteen hundred years thereafter, when enamored Antony deeded it to Cleopatra, from whom Herod rented it. The flow of milk and honey was scarcely a figure of speech. The fertile plains, irrigated from the Jordan, were grazed by flocks and herds, and bee-culture was one of the chief industries of the population. "A divine region," says Josephus, "covered with beautiful gardens and groves of palms of different kinds."

There are not a dozen palms in sight, when we stroll to the top of the bank beyond the camping-ground, for an unobstructed view, but the Jericho oranges have a reputation of their own. A man sent into the town on an errand brings back immense citrons, six inches in length and ten in circumference, sweet oranges, and, rather as a curiosity than to please the palate, sweet lemons, which we find insipid. It is

David's will that the dining-tent be decorated this evening, and the messenger is laden with fruit-bearing branches of citron and lemon-trees, long sprays of acacia, studded with fluffy golden balls, deliciously fragrant; an unknown white flower, and, because I have expressed desire to see them, bunches of the famous "Dead Sea apples." Several clusters are hung against the palankeen curtain, and Alcides transfers the group to a "film," while I cut open some of the nondescript vegetables for the purpose of classification. The writer who called them "a sort of potato," looked no further than leaves and flower, which strongly resemble those of the potato. But they grow upon a bush from two to six feet high, and in color and shape are identical tread. The monastery seems actually to "back up" against the grim wall as if afraid of falling.

Pink and rose-color have given place to chalky whiteness in the towering sides and heads of the mountains hemming us in. We are going down all the while, following generally the capricious turns of the brook, and never out of sight of the gorge it has worn in the everlasting hills. I have alighted to walk down a rocky fall—I cannot call it a descent—the abruptness of which makes me dizzy when I behold it from the palankeen; David Jamal and the sheik have gone down the same, their horses treading warily upon the rolling stones, when half-way to challenge to single combat. There are, I judge, at least one hundred of the hulking creatures munching the coarse grass, stripping leaves from the bushes and principally—or so it appears to me—wandering aimlessly over the meadow in quest of some stray bit of mischief peculiarly suited to the cameline nature.

All three of my mounted escorts have ridden on, Jamal, doubtless to make all ready for our reception in camp, and the sheik for Jamal's good company. With difficulty I restrain the wild impulse to scream to Alcides's disappearing figure as Massoud gallops after the pair now lost to sight in the coppice. Glancing through the

with our yellow egg tomato. The seed, also, are those of the tomato, but dark-brown, as is the soft pulp surrounding them. Jamal says that they give forth a goodly smell at a certain stage of ripeness. Now, we find in them no particular odor of any kind beyond a certain rank weediness shared by them with scores of other plants. They are not edible, nor yet poisonous, and assuredly are never filled with ashes.

"What sort of growth do you suppose the poet had in mind when he wrote —
And Dead Sea fruit shall quench the thirst
Of those who long for wine?"

queries Alcides, returning the kodak to its case. "And no tourist in modern Egypt can find the genuine lotus. There is a sign in New York City: 'Destroyer of Moths.' Foreign travel might be advertised as a 'Universal Myth Destroyer.'"

"We are to have visitors!" David comes up to say.

A long man and a short woman are alighting from their horses. It does not surprise, however it may annoy us, to recognize the inevitables. It is in accordance with the law of the general fitness of things—especially of human things—that Dr. and Mrs. Sharpe should have "dropped in" upon our sunset rest on their way to the Jordan Hotel in the lower valley.

IS YOUR ALL IN JESUS' KEEPING? *

Is your all in Jesus keeping?
Have you given him your heart?
Are you his awake, or sleeping?
Of your nature is he part?

Is his promise fraught with meaning?
In his word do you confide?
On his bosom are you leaning?
In his love do you abide?

Would you have his great salvation?
Have his sufferings atone?
Would you flee from condemnation?
And belong to him alone?

Is your back or face turned toward him?
Would you have his hand to guide?
Would you have his might protect you?
In his mercy would you hide?

* This poem was written in memory of a sermon preached by Dr. Talmage, and containing the following extract: "Is it an impertinence for me to ask, do you, my hearer—you, my reader, love him? Has he become a part of your nature? Have you committed your children on earth into his keeping, as your children in heaven are already in his bosom? Has he done enough to win your confidence? Can you trust him, living and dying, and forever? Is your back or your face toward him? Would you like to have his hand to guide you? His might to protect you? His grace to comfort you? His suffering to atone for you? His arms to welcome you? His love to encircle you? His heaven to crown you?"

When deep waters come upon you,
Would you have his grace uphold?
Would you have his face shine on you?
Would you have his arms enfold?

Can you trust him, living—dying?
And when crosses are laid down—
On his wondrous love relying,
Would you have his heaven to crown?

Ponder well the sacred pages
Telling of eternal things!
Trusting Christ, the Rock of Ages—
Lord of lords and King of kings!

WESLEY'S BEAUTIFUL FAITH.

A lady once said to John Wesley: "If you knew that you would die at twelve o'clock to-morrow night, how would you spend the intervening time?" "Why," was the answer, "just as I intend to spend it. I should preach to-night at Gloucester and again to-morrow morning. After that I would ride to Tewkesbury, preach in the afternoon and meet the society in the evening. I should then repair to friend Martin's house, as he expects me to entertain him: converse, pray with the family, retire to my room at ten o'clock, commend myself to my heavenly Father, lie down to sleep and wake in glory."

THE TRIBULATIONS.

Three Distinct Times of Trouble Predicted in the New Testament.

BY REV. W. MAUDE.

OUR Lord said of this second tribulation, the tribulation of Israel as reported by Matthew (24: 15-22): "There shall be great tribulations, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be. And except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved: but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened."

Now in the parallel passage in Luke's Gospel—for that it is a parallel passage and a chronological parallel the most able commentators are now pretty well agreed—we are plainly taught that the period of Israel's tribulation extends from the events which led to and accompanied the destruction of Jerusalem to the close of the present Gentile dispensation. Nor is there any real contradiction or even inconsistency between the prophecy as recorded by the Evangelist Matthew and the Evangelist Luke. The tribulation of Israel commences and ends in a terrible crisis. The commencing crisis was the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, accompanied by all the appalling sufferings of the Jewish people, of which their historian, Josephus, has left us so ghastly a narrative; and the closing final crisis is that which they have yet to endure under the last personal Antichrist. These two crises in their main features bear a striking resemblance to each other, and they alone seem to be referred to by Matthew. Luke, however, shows us that they are only the beginning and ending of one long period of tribulation extending over many centuries of more or less severe suffering to be endured by the Jewish people during their dispersion among the Gentiles.

This interpretation of the narratives of the three Synoptists alone enables us to affect a substantial harmony between them, without having recourse to the arbitrary and untenable assumption that while Luke describes only the events connected with the destruction of Jerusalem; Matthew, on the contrary, refers only to events to take place at the close of this dispensation. Mark, it is immediately after and in obvious connection with the announcement that "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," that Luke refers to the abnormal celestial phenomena which are to indicate the imminent "coming of the Son of Man with power and great glory." And surely it is difficult to doubt that the time, as well as the events themselves, are identical with those spoken of by Matthew, when he says: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. * * * And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth (lit. 'of the land') mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (Matthew 24: 29-31).

The point we desire clearly to bring out is this: Luke, as all admit, speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem as the days of Divine vengeance and wrath, to terminate only with the time of the Gentiles, and to be immediately followed by the predicted signs in the heavens, and the coming of the Son of Man. Matthew tells us that "Immediately after the tribulation of those days," these signs are to appear, and the coming of Christ is to take place. But when he speaks of "those days," to what days does he allude? What days have been previously spoken of? Plainly, days commencing with the destruction of Jerusalem, and which must continue their course to the end of the present age, since they are to be followed "immediately" by its closing events. Therefore, according to both Matthew and Luke, the tribulation of Israel has already extended over more than eighteen centuries, and in this sense, as well as that of the severity of its crises, it may truly be called "a great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world, no, nor ever shall be."

HUMAN LONGINGS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Sept. 16. Isa. 55.

WHAT shall a young man do with his life in order to make the best of it? The question is worth considering, in view of the number of spoiled lives and utter failures that abound on every hand. In thinking out the problem, one aspect is frequently overlooked. Old age seems so far off to the young that it is apt to become the horizon and the vast region beyond to be ignored. Plans and purposes are formed which are to have their fruition in a competence, in dignity, honor and influence, to be enjoyed after the half century mile stone is passed. It would be bad enough if the result of such planning were an eternity of exclusion from God. But this is not the only painful result. There is the added misery of years of discontent and dissatisfaction. Achievements, as they are realized, fail to give the solid gratification they seemed to promise. Wealth brings care and the desire for greater wealth. Honor is always alloyed with the jealous carping and envious depreciation of rivals. Pleasure satiates and demoralizes. Even learning is a pain and a weariness, and is perpetually opening new vistas which the scholar deplores his inability to explore. Gratification comes from each pursuit, but not satisfaction. There is ever a longing for something else, and the more intelligent a man is, the more this longing disturbs him. The reason is that there is in every man a spiritual nature which clamors for sustenance and development. Its demands are imperative, and if they are not met the man must suffer. It is a remarkable fact, too, that this spiritual craving is the one craving of human nature for which infinite provision has been made. It is boundless and fathomless as the nature of God himself. It was no vain boast that Christ made to the woman of Samaria that he who drank of the water that he gave should never thirst, but should have within him a spring of living water, springing up to everlasting life. Experience has proved its truth. Contact with the divine life produces life, and the new nature finds all its wants met with a provision that knows no exhaustion, and in which there is no surfeit. Beside this, there comes the moment when the animal nature that connects the man with the brute and the material world is sloughed off, and then the spirit, nourished and developed, soars to new spheres in which it is no longer restrained, but dwells in infinite delight. In such a path there is possession and hope, and from both there is unalloyed peace and satisfaction. "I shall be satisfied," wrote the Psalmist, "when I awake with thy likeness." And the likeness is forming all through the life, giving greater joy as it grows until its culmination, and the God-like soul enters the presence of God himself. There, every human longing is satisfied; the groping and striving of life are ended, and he walks in the perfect light of the throne.

A THRIVING ASSOCIATION.

The difficult problem of uniting the young men of two adjacent towns in the work of one Young Men's Christian Association, has been successfully solved by an Association in Pennsylvania. The two towns cheerful, well-lighted reading room, well equipped with periodicals and cabinets of good books; also the men's meeting room, which is used on week days for games and amusements, and on Sunday for the men's meeting. This room seats 100, and during the past year has often been crowded. An aspect of hospitality and kindly welcome pervades this entire floor.

From this floor a door, manipulated by electricity, opens to the stairway connecting with the basement, where are situated the locker and dressing-rooms; bath-room furnished with needle, shower and sponge baths, of the latest improved make. On this floor is also the gymnasium, bright and cheerful, well ventilated and well lighted. Its dimensions are forty feet by fifty feet, and it is well stocked with all the necessary and modern apparatus.

From the reception room, which is the key to all parts of the building, a wide staircase leads up to the second floor through a wide hallway to the auditorium, with a seating capacity of four hundred. Two class rooms, with wide folding-doors, open into it increasing the seating capacity by one hundred more. On this floor, also, is the members' parlor, with piano and furniture of a substantial and comfortable make.

The Association has an energetic Ladies' Auxiliary to which it is indebted for the entire furnishing of the building, including,

Resolved, That gratefully recognizing the providential rise, development, and possibility of the endeavor for Christian citizenship, we commend to all our societies the appointment of a committee for the arousing, instruction and co-operation of their members, churches and fellow-citizens in the effort to secure civic righteousness, industrial peace and the social unification of their respective communities, and that their work in behalf of Christian citizenship may be so done as to be an incentive to, and an expression of that power with God which alone can give us power with men, and is to be secured only through united prayer and personal consecration.

Resolved, That in the face of present distrust and recent breach of human relationships, we re-affirm our faith in the future, our confidence in the law-abiding and liberty-loving spirit of the people, our unshaken trust in the Christian solution of present problems, and our abiding hope for the coming of the kingdom of God on earth.

Resolved, That we re-assert Christ to be the centre of social unity; his righteousness to be the only basis of industrial peace; his cross of self-giving in service to be the only means of social salvation; his church to be his mediator for the reconciliation of men; and his spirit in human hearts to be the only power adequate to maintain or establish the brotherhood of man in the coming readjustment of human relations.

Resolved, That we will seek and will respond to opportunities to co-operate with all individual and organized efforts to promote civic righteousness, industrial peace, and social development.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

Preparations are being made for the great National Biennial Conference of Epworth Leagues in 1896.

Christian Endeavor Societies in the Christian churches in the State of Texas, have pledged $600 for the support of their denominational State Endeavor evangelist. Within a few weeks seven new societies have been formed in consequence of his work.

In Adelaide, South Australia, during the recent depression, a Christian Endeavor free soup-house fed nearly 16,000 hungry men. It required 4,000 gallons of soup, and more than 10,000 loaves of bread.

Mr. George Gray, the Secretary of the New South Wales Christian Endeavor Union, reports to the "Golden Rule" a large increase of societies and members in that country. There were registered in April 162 societies and 25 Junior societies, with a total membership of almost 6,000. This is an increase of forty societies since their last convention.

The Women's Christian Association of Kingston, Can., now has a number of useful agencies employed for the benefit of the women of the city. Among these is what is called a Kitchen Garden, for the teaching of cooking, housework and domestic operations of all kinds. Its kindergarten is largely attended, and it proposes to open a Creche for the care of infants, whose mothers have to earn their own living.

There are now in the Boone District, Iowa, fifty Epworth Leagues and one Christian Endeavor Society with an aggregate membership of 2,361, a net increase for the past year of 705; and twenty Junior Leagues with a membership of 1,067, a net increase of 380, giving a total increase for the year of 1,094. This large increase in new chapters and membership is due to an aggressive campaign carried on by President J. A. Henderson of Jefferson, and Secretary J. K. Elwell of Boone, assisted by the officers of the cabinet.

PURITY IN CITY AND SOCIETY.

How much the Christian Endeavor Societies, the Epworth Leagues and the Baptist Unions may do for the purification of municipal affairs and social life by sincere and hearty effort, may be realized when we consider the enormous number of their aggregate membership. It is therefore a wise and significant hint that the General Secretary of the Christian Endeavor Society gives by calling attention to the following resolution passed at the recent convention with which the sister societies, we may be sure, will heartily concur:

THE Y. M. C. A. OF SHARPSBURG AND ETNA, PA.
1. Staircase from the Reception Room. 2. The Main Building. 3. The Principal Entrance.

are Sharpsburg and Etna, and the report of the combined work there which is published by the "Young Men's Era" shows how much they have accomplished by tact and good-fellowship. Pictures of the building which is the headquarters of the Christian young men of both towns appear on this page. The aggregate population of Sharpsburg and Etna is about ten thousand, and it was felt that an association that would serve both might be organized with better results than an Association in each town. A site was secured accessible to all and a handsome and commodious building, costing with furniture $26,500, was erected.

The building is fifty by ninety feet, two stories high, and situated on a corner lot. The entrance is of a pleasing design, inviting in appearance. A short and wide stairway leads into the commodious reception room, and to the right is an alcove divided off by an oak railing for the business office. Communicating with the reception room, by means of large sliding door, is the large, ing the piano and the electric lighting fixtures. A promising Boys' Auxiliary has also been organized which has a large membership, and is exerting a wholesome influence in the two towns. The example of Sharpsburg and Etna, and the success which has attended the experiment may serve as a suggestion to other towns similarly situated.

Rural Life in Japan.

How the Villagers Live in the "Land of the Rising Sun"—Intelligent and Industrious—"The Yankees of the East."

EVERY year, the Western world learns more about Japan and sees more reason to admire many traits of the Japanese character. Should the present war with China result favorably to the Mikado's country, Japan will have a very fine prospect of assuming the first place among the Asiatic nations, in political, if not in commercial importance. In all matters that relate to science, invention, and modern progress, she has long led her Oriental contemporaries. Her people are the brightest, most amiable and most intelligent portion of the Mongol race. In a previous article, some timely and interesting facts were presented concerning social life in Japan, especially in the larger cities. To-day we give an illustration showing another side of the social picture, and by no means an unpleasant one. The Japanese farmer and his wife might easily find a counterpart in some of the countries of middle Europe at the present time, and their social condition and surroundings are no poorer than those of the European farm-peasants. With his broad sun-hat, grass coat and loose clothing, the tiller of the soil is protected from cold and heat. His wife, who is carrying a basketful of produce and the inevitable tea-pot, is accompanying him home from the field, or probably from the woodland where he has been felling trees or making fences. Farm-laborers in Japan work all day in the rice-fields, varying the work of cultivation with the felling of trees or cutting brushwood on the hills. As the wages are very small, they frequently eke out a livelihood by snaring birds or by fishing. Few are so well off as to be able to afford a pack-horse, or an ox, and most of the farm work is performed by hand. They use a small, single-handed plough which is drawn through the soft soil by a couple of "coolies" or possibly by a pony. To separate the ears of rice from the stalks, the latter are pulled by hand through a long row of iron teeth, projecting from a rude log. Winnowing is done by a laborer who walks slowly along with a fan in either hand, working both simultaneously. Their sickle is straight and only four inches long, with a fifteen-inch handle.

The peasants lead the simplest lives imaginable. Rice, potatoes, radishes, home-made bread, tea and excellent coffee constitute their chief articles of food, and even this list is often reduced in winter when the food supply runs short. Of late years, the grievous burden of taxation has been greatly lightened, and the farmer's life is a more tolerable one, but the slightest shortage in the harvest brings widespread suffering. Yet, although the life of the peasant in his straw-thatched dwelling may be full of hardships, these do not seem to impair his amiability of temper; even if he knew that the daimio, and the magistrates, and the "hata-moto," or nobles, and all the petty officials, had abundance of good things, while his own table was well-nigh bare, he would still be cheerful and comparatively happy. Cheerfulness is a national characteristic, and it is fortunate that it is so. There has been no serious unrest or revolution in Japan since the last great outbreak against official oppression in 1869. They are essentially a quiet and peaceable people, devoting much care to their gardens and rice fields and their schools, for even the poorest districts have public schools, established by the government.

"A Comfort in the House."

Just before the author of "Stepping Heavenward" was called to the heaven she loved and longed for, she said, "I prayed this morning that I might be a comfort to-day to everybody in the house." And she was, for her friends noted that despite great physical exhaustion, "she was in a sweet and gentle mood all the afternoon."

Two "Stupid" Boys.

Mr. Dawson, the master of a famous preparatory school in England, used to declare that the two stupidest boys he ever had in his classes, turned out to be the brightest men. One boy was stupid at figures, but gyman was residing in the family of a church member who was in the habit of finding fault with the food or cooking at almost every meal. After some days had elapsed, the man, as he frequently did, asked the minister to give thanks before dinner. "I think," said the minister, "that I shall not give thanks at your table any more." The man looked surprised, and said grace himself. Toward the close of the repast he asked the reason of the minister's seemingly strange conduct, who replied thus: "I have noticed that you are in the practice of finding fault with your victuals, much to the annoyance of your wife, and it seems to me inconsistent, nay, insulting to God, to give thanks for food and then be displeased with it. My advice to you is, eat your dinner without asking a blessing or giving thanks, and when you have done, if you like your dinner, thank God for it then." It is needless to say that the habit of fault-finding was broken off.

maining studies, and a boy may overcome by hard application his natural repugnance to a certain study, and become a master of it.

READY.
Ready to follow God's command,
Ready to labor heart and hand,
Ready to conquer every foe,
Ready the seed of truth to sow.
Ready to cheer the sad and weak,
Ready the erring soul to seek,
Ready with songs to praise our King,
Ready with all we have to bring.
Ready as soldiers, firm and true,
Ready our Master's work to do,
Ready to hold our banner high,
Ready to dare, and do, and die.

HOME SILENCES.

OMIT all the slights and be economical of censure in the home circle, writes Rev. Dr. Talmage, for there will before long be a hearse standing at your front door that will take away out of your presence the best friend you have on earth and the richest boon which God in his omnipotence and infinity has capacity to bestow, namely—a good wife. If a child go, that desolates the nursery. If a wife go, that desolates all the house and all the heart and all the world. The silences are so appalling when her voice is still, the vacancies are so ghastly, the gloom is as though the midnights of 50 years had dropped at once. The little child running around the room with a hurt finger calling for the mother who will not come, and at night asking for a drink and saying: "No, no: I want mamma to bring it." Reminiscences that rush on the heart like a mountain torrent over which a cloud has burst. Her jewels, her books, her pictures, her dresses, some of them suggestive of banquet and some of burial, put into the trunk whose lid goes down with a heavy thud as much as to say, "Dead." The morning dead. The night dead. The air dead. The world dead. Oh, man, if in that hour you think of any unkind words uttered, you would be willing to pay in red coin of blood every drop from your heart if you could bring back the unkind words. But they will not come back. Words gone from the lips do not fly in circles like doves coming back to their cote, but in a straight line, a million miles a minute across the eternities. They never come back. Flattering epitaphology, though a Dryden composed it, polished Aberdeen granite, though an Angelo chiseled it, cannot atone for unkindness to the living.

My mind is full of the memory of a couple who were united in holy marriage December 10th, 1863. Their Christian names were old-fashioned like themselves—David the one, Catharine the other. Legal contract, of course, but chiefly the Lord married them. They lived to see their crystal wedding, their silver wedding, their golden wedding, and nine years beside. They lived to weep over the graves of three of their children. They lived to pass through many hardships and trials, but they kept the Christian faith. They lived for God, for each other, for their children, for everybody but themselves. Their hair grew white with age and their steps grew shorter and shorter and their voices tremulous in the church psalm, though one they had led in the village choir. The one leaned heavily on a staff which I have in my house to-day, but heavier on the arm of God, who had always helped them. They were well mated. What was the joy of the one was the joy of the other; what was the sorrow of the one was the sorrow of the other. At last they parted. God gave to her three years precedence of departure, but the three years soon passed, and they were remarried. Their children are gradually joining them and will soon all be there. But the vision of that married life will linger in my memory forever and ever.

The Sweetest Lives.

The sweetest lives are those to duty wed,
Whose deeds both great and small.
Are close-knit strands of an unbroken thread
Where love ennobles all.
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells,
The Book of Life the shining record tells.

A JAPANESE FARMER AND HIS WIFE.

From a Photograph secured in Tokyo for "The Christian Herald."

How precious are such moods! When every one in any family is in a sweet and gentle mood, the life of the household is as the soft music of an Aolian harp. Its labors seem light. Every eye is beaming and every heart is glad. Happy household. Would there not be more such joyous homes if every inmate of every house earnestly prayed every morning, "Lord, make me a comfort to-day to everybody in the house."

The Fault-Finding Habit.

Many a home is made unhappy, and many a religious profession is rendered entirely nugatory, by the presence of the fault-finder. It is only now and then that he receives the rebuke he deserves. A cler-there was another who was yet more hopeless, and was unable to grasp simple addition and multiplication. At Rugby one of the boys rose like a rocket to every kind of eminence except that of doing "sums." In due time he distinguished himself at Oxford University. He became known to the world as Dean Stanley. The other stupid boy, "more hopeless" than he, afterward developed a phenomenal mastery of arithmetic. He became the great finance minister of after years. William E. Gladstone, who could make a budget speech of three hours' length, and full of figures, which so interested the members of the House of Commons that they filled the hall, standing and sitting till midnight. Thus we see that a boy may be stupid in one study and bright in all the re-

CHAPTER XI. A BRIDAL MORNING.

IF, a few months after the events just narrated, you had been passing along the slopes of Nazareth you might have seen, one evening as the twilight was coming on, a form kneeling in an olive-grove. And had you walked still nearer you might have been able to distinguish a countenance and a voice which you would at once have recognized.

The woman was thinking of an evening in Nazareth when Karmes the Egyptian spoke the words:

"Let her remember this hour years to come!"

She was thinking also of that morning in Jerusalem when the cup of cold water she was carrying to her lover was dashed from her hands, of the time spent in Rome and of the return to Palestine.

She had recovered from all the effects of her imprisonment. As she knelt in the kindly rays of the evening sun you would have said the girl of Palestine possessed that strange charm of presence, that wonderful symmetry of form, that enchanting and marvellous comeliness of countenance which poets and historians of ancient times have ascribed to eastern queens. She seemed more royal now, more lovely than ever before—for sorrow and love had graced with more than beauty the olive brow that only lacked a crown.

The stars cast long golden whispers down to where she knelt beneath the waving branches of the trees, praying: "Father, forgive them, they knew not what they did."

Then a holy purpose filled her soul: and as she arose she heard the disciples chanting near by, in a temple not made with hands, a hymn of the Nazarenes:

We believe in human kindness:
Large amid the sons of men,
Nobler far in willing blindness
Than in creature's keenest ken.
We believe in self-denial,
And its secret throbs of joy;
In the love that lives through trial,
Dying not though death destroy.

We believe in dreams of Duty,
Warning us to self-control,—
Foregleams of the glorious beauty
That shall yet transform the soul;
In the godlike wreck of nature
Sin doli in the sinner leave.
That he may regain the stature
He hath lost,—we do believe.

We believe in love renewing
All that sin has swept away,
Leaven like its work pursuing
Night by night, and day by day;
In the power of its remoulding,
In the grace of its relieve,
In the glory of beholding
Its perfection,—we believe.

We believe in love eternal,
Fixed in God's unchanging will,
That, beneath the deep infernal,
Hath a depth that's deeper still!
In its patience, its endurance
To forbear and not to retrieve,
In the large and full assurance
Of its triumphs,—we believe.

A bright day? Yes: for there, before her, stood—her lover.

"Zerola!"

"Thæon!"

Then for a while there was that silence which is sometimes the language of the purest and most passionate love. And as Zerola rested her head on her lover's breast, and Thæon pressed his lips to those of his betrothed, they stood clasped in one long embrace, each listening while the other whispered those words which lovers long so much to hear, and told of the past dark years and spoke of the brightening future.

Yes: what great changes may take place within the limits of a single day. When the sun again appeared above the eastern hills it was shining upon the happy bridal morning of Thæon and Zerola of Nazareth.

They were Jew and Jewess still. The followers of the Nazarene had not yet broken with Jewish rites and traditions. The marriage was to be according to the customs of the time and country. The whole village would have been disappointed had it been shorn of any of its festivity or of the rejoicing which accompanied the humblest wedding in Judæa. Zerola and her family were too well known and honored in Nazareth to permit of the wedding being other than an occasion of public interest. Both Zerola and Mary shrank from the time-honored customs, more elaborate and more boisterous than in Western lands, but with the selfishness and with the regard for the feelings and wishes of others, rather than their own, which sprang from the love of Jesus, they yielded to the public wish. Zerola was to be married with all the rustic pomp and ceremony that was demanded in Nazareth.

That Mary had been widowed and Thæon was fatherless, were facts which placed the marriage in a category of its own. They imposed a duty on every relative and friend of the bride's family. Appropriate gifts must be made, that the marriage-feast of seven days' duration should lack nothing of its lavish hospitality and profusion. The specially invited guests had accordingly received their invitations, accompanied with the new robe and the lamp with a supply of oil, which the messenger bore to the guest when he carried the invitation. On this day the messenger would again pay a second visit, to remind the guests that this was the day set for the wedding.

By evening everything was in readiness. Zerola's friends and relatives were beginning to assemble in the humble abode, where now she and her widowed mother were the only dwellers. Many of them had not seen her since her return, and she had to recount to them the story of her seizure, imprisonment and deliverance. Jewish propriety did not admit of Thæon's being present at these conversations. The old figment of his being a complete stranger to his bride must be respected. He was to be supposed as not having seen her, and must spend the day in solitary prayer and purification until the ceremony had been performed, and he should lift her veil and gaze for the first time on her beauty. Old forms long survive the facts on which they are based, and the pretty fictions and emblematic ceremonies of a by-gone time were to be observed, although their meaning had been forgotten in the clearer and better light of a more advanced civilization. At sunset Zerola was duly robed for the ceremony. Such ornaments as she had were put upon her. Poor and of little value were those that her mother could give her, but among them were several gems almost priceless which Corthene and Corbulo had insisted on giving her when she quitted Rome. The country people had at rare intervals seen such gems, on occasions of their visits to Jerusalem at the feasts, when some wealthy Jew, or some Roman potentate showed himself on the streets, his attire sparkling in the sunlight with the glitter of the jewels. They had no conception of their cost, but knew it must be enormous. All these the bride must wear, it being the law that whatever was on her person when she entered the home of her husband to become his wife was her inalienable property. Houses and lands and furniture that she might own became his by the marriage, and he even retained in his own hands the dowry with which he was supposed to endow her, and which must equal in amount the sum given by the bride's father. In the event of divorce, the dowry must be given up to the divorced woman, but it was sometimes difficult to secure it. The jewels and clothing she wore at the ceremony of marriage were, however, her own and on these her husband had no claim. Thæon, himself, although he had travelled into many lands in his search for Zerola knew almost as little as the Nazareth peasants the enormous wealth that Zerola carried about her on that happy evening. The sparkling stones were very beautiful in their clear light, but that was all. Zerola herself looked queenly as she was arrayed in her simple garments on which the jewels flashed and glowed. Her people thought her majestic and they kissed her and bent before her in genuine admiration. Every girl was the Queen of the village on her wedding-day, and the girls cheerfully rendered her the homage they expected to some day receive for themselves. Then the bridal veil was produced, and thrown over her and, over all, enveloping her completely and making her look like an animated heap of clothing some large piece of cloth richly embroidered which was generally borrowed for the occasion and had done duty for generations. So attired Zerola set forth from her mother's dwelling.

The bridal procession was quickly formed. First came a band of performers on the drum, the flute and other musical instruments. Then a number of women in white mantles, walking two by two. These in the intervals of the music uttering the quavering joyous shout of "Zugaret," the word which, pronounced in the same thrilling tone, probably Leah and Rachel and all the Hebrew brides of the Old Testament heard on the eve of their nuptials: Children in gay attire followed, dancing merrily to the time of the music, and on each side of the road were the women of the village, who scattered flowers and rice and candies in the path of the procession. In this order Zerola and her companions made the circuit of the village, ending at the dwelling which Thæon had provided for their married life.

Later in the evening there was a second spectacle to delight the people of the village. This was the procession of the bridegroom, who must also be conducted in state to his new home. An interval of uncertain duration elapsed between the two processions and many of the people dispersed to their homes. The fiction must be kept up that the bridegroom wished to go to his bride unobserved. But as Thæon emerged from the house of his friend, where he was temporarily staying, the cry went through the village, "Behold the bridegroom cometh." Then there was a rush from all the houses, and the men and women with lamps alight sallied out to join in the procession.

Like the procession of the bride a band of music was at the head, but now the musicians played martial airs and the men danced in accompaniment, whirling their torches and swinging their lamps. With two friends, one on either hand, Thæon walked, with head erect and joy lighting his countenance. Veiled women, members of his family followed, each carrying a lighted lamp and uttering their peculiar "zugaret" cry. The circuit of the village was again made and ended at Thæon's home. There his bride was presented to him and in a minute Zerola's veil and stifling covering were stripped off and she was clasped in her lover's arms. The religious ceremony was then performed. It was of the briefest kind. A few words of prayer for the young couple, the placing of a ring, the emblem of a fetter, on Zerola's hand and a benediction completed it. The village scribe had legal formalities to observe and his documents in triple copies were ready. One was for his own custody, one for the bride and one for the bridegroom. Thæon and Zerola affixed their signatures to each, which were duly witnessed by their friends and the marriage ceremony was over.

But there must be a feast. No marriage in Oriental lands could be complete without such a celebration. With the revelry and excesses that sometimes marked such scenes, Thæon and Zerola and their friends could have nothing to do. But their Christian profession was no bar to hospitality and cheerfulness. Jesus himself had joined in such a scene of festivity and had hallowed it with the performance of a miracle. There was no reason why the newly married couple should restrain the natural joy that filled their hearts. For were they not happy? Their separation and the sufferings both had endured had made a background for the sunshine which was now shed on their lot. It had all ended better than they feared and they were full of love for each other and gratitude to God. Instinctively they shared their joy with the friends and relatives who had come from distant towns and villages to rejoice with them, and the time-honored custom of the feast was observed with all its accompaniments of story-telling, reminiscence and merry-making.

"God has been very good to us," said Zerola, as she and Thæon walked together alone in the old garden that night, where more than four years before they had plighted their troth and Karmes had watched them with malignant envy. "Only he who gave us to each other could have brought us together through so many perils. Thæon, my husband, we must live together for him. Our lives belong to him."

"Surely, they do," Thæon replied. "We will find out what we can do and we will do it with all our hearts. Now, that I have thee for my own, I shall have a better heart to the work and thou wilt encourage and cheer me. I know that thou wilt and thine own service will be a blessing. When I thought I had lost thee utterly, my heart sank and I grieved that those stones had not killed me as the persecutors thought they had. God was kinder to me than I hoped. And thou, dear one, didst thou never lose faith and hope, even in the dungeon?"

"Often I lost hope, but never faith. Our Lord's words, that we so often repeat in our times of trouble, about the very hairs of our head being numbered, used to come into my mind and I knew that I was safe in his hands. Jesus did not deceive us; he said we should have persecution. I suppose we shall have more. I remember that terrible picture he drew of the time that is to come when Jerusalem will fall into the enemy's hands, and not one stone be left upon another. I pray, Thæon, that we may be together in that day to strengthen each other."

"We will always be together, my wife, until we are called hence. If thou hadst died, I would have asked Paul to let me be a servant to him and go with him in his journeys: but now I will stay here in Galilee and Judæa and work. There is much yet to be done here, and it was the Lord's command to preach here first. I will do that, for I cannot be silent."

"Oh, my Thæon, they will surely kill thee. Can we not do good and be helpful and kind and live good lives without thy preaching? Already many have been put to death as thou knowest for preaching Jesus in Judæa. The priests are exceeding bitter. Think, my husband, what it would be to me to lose thee now."

"Fear not, Zerola, we are his and he will keep us in all our ways. Thou would'st not really in thy heart of hearts have me silent. Thou would'st come to despise me as a coward if I did not proclaim my faith. Though it were for love of thee that I spoke not, thou wouldst be ashamed of thy husband if he had not courage."

"Never, Thæon. I know thou art brave, but I cannot bear the thought of losing thee. I would have thee prudent and discreet. I cannot think of thy defying those cruel priests."

"Remember his words, my wife, 'He that loveth father or mother or wife more than me is not worthy of me.' Love to him requires me to tell all men of him and thou knowest that if I am silent it will be because I love thee better than him."

"Oh, no, no," cried Zerola, "do not say that. I would be very dear to thee, Thæon, but not to come between him and thee. Thou savest truly, Thæon, that would be shameful. Oh, heed me not, I am a woman and weak. Do thy duty and the will of the Lord be done."

[THE END.]

PROFIT OUT OF LOSS.

A farmer living in the Northern part of New York State has gained a large sum by what he regarded as a misfortune. A year ago his barns were burned, and he had reason to believe that an enemy started the fire that consumed them. They were not fully insured, but he collected on his policies enough to largely reduce his loss. They were large barns, and their removal opened up a delightful view of the surrounding country, which they had hidden all his life. His neighbors, while sympathizing with him also expressed their pleasure in the prospect of the miles of country which the barns had shut out. A short time ago some visitors were in the neighborhood and were so enchanted with the view that they offered to purchase some of the farmer's land, and named a price such as he had never dreamed of securing for it. If the barns had not been burned no one would have made him such an offer. It is not often that an enemy's malicious act brings benefit to his victim, but it is very common for spiritual good to come by way of misfortune. The Christian, indeed has the explicit assurance that "all things work together for good to them that love God." (Rom. 8:28.)

THE BOOK SHELF

DE SOTO AND THE INCA.*

THE first meeting of the Inca and De Soto was a noble sight, and one which the historian has delighted to describe. On the wide plain beyond Caxamarca stretched the tents of the Indian army—a force numbered by thousands—with the gorgeous pavilion of the Inca in their midst; and here, sheltered by his protecting legions, the Indian ruler awaited the approach of the Spaniard. When within a few paces of the Inca, partly out of respect to the dignity of his presence, and partly to lessen the fears of the attendants, who were unable to emulate the proud indifference of their King at sight of the spirited white horse which the stranger rode, that gallant cavalier dismounted, and advanced to offer his salutations.

In reply to his request that Pizarro be granted an audience, the Inca appointed the next day, and, as De Soto noticed during their conversation that Attahuallapa betrayed some interest in the restless movements of the horse, which had been left in charge of an attendant, he mounted and performed several equestrian feats, greatly to the astonishment and terror of the awed retainers. This over, De Soto retired, bearing the royal message to Pizarro.

It was not until late in the afternoon of November 16th, 1532, that the Inca, with cortege, approached the public square of Caxamarca, the place which had been agreed upon for the meeting. Already the body of armed warriors, drawn up in imposing array, awaited his coming. Attahuallapa, dressed in the gorgeous robes of his office, his handsome head bound in the variegated turban from which hung the scarlet tassel, the insignia of his rank, his pensive features standing out in striking contrast against the glittering palanquin, presented an impressive and suggestive spectacle to the Spaniards.

Friar Vincent, Pizarro's spiritual adviser, and the chief among the missionary band, so-called, now advanced toward the King with upheld crucifix, and in the language of his priestly office exhorted him to embrace the Catholic faith, presenting some of its doctrines, and saying that it was for this that his countrymen had entered the Peruvian territories.

The abruptness and strangeness of the address somewhat surprised Attahuallapa, who, with becoming firmness, refused to relinquish the religion of his fathers, and awaited the further pleasure of his inexplicable guests. Friar Vincent immediately reported his non-success to Pizarro, and, incensed at the proud bearing of the Peruvian encouraged his master to set upon the obstinate unbelievers. The time for action had come. If the opportunity were lost, the Spaniards might be surrounded and annihilated, for their leader well knew that his outrages would, sooner or later, raise rebellion. In a moment the square was a battleground, the Peruvian retainers, filled with consternation, and defenseless, were being hewn down, or attempting to escape the massacre; the bearers of the royal palanquin were giving way before the deadly swords of their assailants, and the Inca was at the mercy of Pizarro and his men. A body of desperate Indians had burst through the stone inclosure of the square and were fleeing toward the distant tents, hotly pursued by a body of horsemen; but their object gained, the troops were recalled and the carnage stopped.

What part De Soto took in this perfidious affair has not been recorded. With the friendly feeling he had for Attahuallapa, it is not probable that he would enter into any conspiracy against him, or that he would countenance such a breach of military honor. If he was a witness of the scene, and made no attempt to prevent it, this is the darkest accusation that can be brought against him, but his subsequent kindness to the outraged monarch would seem to deny even this.

"MOTHER!—JESUS!"*

In the tenderest terms she bade each farewell, bidding them meet her in heaven, and telling the others to take care of mother, and her father to meet her in heaven; and said to him, "You must, you must! You know how well I love you all, but mother best next to Jesus. You know I love Jesus, and oh, I wonder if it is wrong to think of you so when he is coming to me! I wish he would come right now: I suffer so. I hope—I hope—I hope I'm ready. Yes, I know I am, for I am one of the lambs, and Jesus carries the lambs in his bosom. I hope he will take me right into his arms." Again she said, "I hope I'm pure and fair to enter into heaven. Oh, I hope I'm worthy! I know my sins are all washed away in the blood of the Lamb."

Her sufferings seemed so great that those who were with her thought she had better not talk, but she replied, "Let me talk while I can, for I shall never see another day break." Presently she said, "I am going easier than I expected. I almost knew I would." Her dearest friend came in, and calling her to her bedside, Fannie said, "I have always loved you so. Do not forget me, and meet me in heaven." She also sent loving messages to her many friends, with love to all and everybody.

Prayer was offered, and when "Amen" was said, she also said "Amen." Turning to those she was leaving, she said, "Kiss me again." Mother, sisters, father, brother, and the few dear friends pressed nearer for a last kiss, and she murmured, "Mother—best of all next to Jesus!"

Presently she said, "Please turn up the light, for it is growing dark;" and a moment later, "The light has gone down." On being told it was still burning, she replied, "The light is all right, but it is still dark, and I know why; but it is all right. I'm not afraid to die. I'm growing cold." Gazing through the darkness, she said, "I can see you all yet;" and each name for the last time lingered lovingly on her lips,—"Mother—best of all next to Jesus." Then as if gazing beyond, "It is all light now. Good-by—good-by. I'm going home—home—home—forever and forever more."

Again her lips moved faintly, but the last word was inaudible, and with perhaps the word "Mother" or "Jesus" she had passed through the darkness beyond the shadow into the light of the blessed.

MOTHERHOOD WISDOM.

To be a mother is the grandest vocation in the world. No other human being has a position of such power and influence. She holds in her hands the destiny of nations; for to her is necessarily committed the making of the nation's citizens.

Fröbel says that we must look to the mothers of a country for that country's welfare, far more than to those who shape its policy and make its laws. And he adds this pregnant declaration, "We must therefore cultivate mothers." All thoughtful students of the great problem of humanity must echo this declaration. The children of the future are crying to the people of the present, "Educate our mothers;" and the ears of this generation are beginning to hear the cry. But with amazement we discover that almost nothing has ever been done to fit mothers for the solemn responsibilities laid upon them. Of all the specialists on earth, the mother brings the poorest training to her immortal task.

Therefore it is that a new science is gradually developing among us, which we may call the Science of Motherhood. Some may shrink from this word "science," and may declare that mothers are made such by the will of God, and cannot be improved by any science. But what is a science? Webster defines it to be "knowledge duly arranged and referred to the general facts and principles upon which it is founded." If there is no science of motherhood in this sense, it is high time there was.

If it is worth the effort of a life-time to lift a fellow creature out of a pit of degradation, how much more worth while must it be to prevent him from falling into the pit. And this work of prevention is, in the highest sense, the mother's privilege. She it is to whom is given the first and the largest opportunity of influencing the man or woman that is to be; hers is the privilege of laying the foundation stones of their future life. To her is intrusted, in a large measure, the working out of God's ideal for each child given to her care; and upon her will it largely depend whether characters shall be rounded out into the fullness of a noble manhood or womanhood, or dwarfed by neglect and deformed by sin. It is a high privilege to be allowed to start in the right path the immortal soul just entering upon its perilous journey; and the mother to whom this privilege is accorded must surely be eager to bring to her work the best wisdom and the clearest knowledge. The science of motherhood means simply the development of this wisdom and knowledge.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

ELI BROWN.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh. ELI BROWN, Jackboro, Tenn.

Dr. Talmage in New Zealand.

He Discusses Antipodean Experiences and Balaklava on a Bishop's Dining-table—Woman Suffrage Triumphs.

DUNEDIN, NEW ZEALAND, July 20, 1894.

THE Angels of Night were descending from the evening skies and ascending from the waves of the Pacific and riding down in black chariot of shadow from the mountains of New Zealand as we approached the Harbor of Auckland, and the light-house on the rocks held up its great torch to keep us off the reefs, and to show us the way to safe wharfrage, seeming to say, "Yonder is a path of waves! Ride into peace! Accept the welcome of this Island continent!"

It was half past seven o'clock when the great screw of our steamer ceased to swirl the waters, and the gang plank was lowered and we descended to the firm land, our name called as we heard it spoken by a multitude who were there to greet us. Strange sensation was it ten thousand miles from home to hear our name pronounced by those whose faces we had never seen before, and whose faces could be only dimly seen now by the lanterns on the docks and the lights of our ship, just halted after a long voyage. What made the night more memorable was that I was suddenly informed at eight o'clock I was to lecture in their Hall, and thirty minutes was short time to allow a poor sailor like myself to get physical and mental equipoise, after twenty-one days' pitching. But at eight o'clock I was ready and confronted a throng of people, cordial and genial as any one ever saluted from platform or pulpit.

Never so glad were we to stand on firm land as the night of our arrival at Auckland. Wondrous New Zealand! Few people realize how it was discovered. They tell us of Captain Cook and of Dutch navigators, but all the islands of the South Sea as well as this immense New Zealand were discovered as a result of the effort to watch the transit of Venus over the sun's disc from the South Seas. The Royal Society sent out ships for this purpose, and Captain Cook and the astronomers and botanists who accompanied him on his voyage were only the agents of science. How the interests of this world are linked with the behavior of other worlds, and how the fact mentioned suggests that most of the valuable things known in this world have been found out while looking for something else, and what sublimity all this gives to the work of the explorer, the transit of Venus an island of light, resulting in the transit of many islands from the unknown into the well known. But the prowess of such men can never be fully appreciated. To me and to most people who come here, New Zealand is a splendid surprise. We have all read so much about the superstitions and outrageous cruelty of this land in other times, that we are startled on arriving here to find more churches in New Zealand than in America, in proportion to the number of the population. In one village that I visited since coming here, I find eight churches to a population of three thousand people. There are too many churches in many places in New Zealand and they jostle each other and contend for right of possession, hindering each other, and half-starving many of their ministers as is sure to be the case when there are too many churches and consequently not enough support for every one of them.

Another surprise to me is that female suffrage is in full blast. I found elegant ladies telling of their experience at the ballot box, and I hereby report to the American ladies now moving for the right of female suffrage that New Zealand is clear ahead of them and that the experiment has been made here successfully. Instead of the ballot box degrading woman, woman is here elevating the ballot box, and why in New Zealand or America or anywhere else should man be so afraid to let woman have a vote, as though man himself had made such a grand use of it. Look at the illiterates, and the incompetents who have been elected to office and see how poorly the masculines have exercised the right of suffrage; look at the governments of nine-tenths of the American cities and see what work the ballot box has done in the possession of man. Man at the ballot box is a failure, give woman a chance. I am not clear that governmental affairs will be made any better by the change; but they cannot be any worse. New Zealand has tried it, let England and America try it. It is often said in America that if women had the right to vote they would not exercise it. For the refutation of that theory I put the fact that in the last election in New Zealand of 100,000 women who registered 90,000 have voted, while of the 193,000 men who registered only 120,000 have voted. This ratio shows that women are more anxious to vote than men. Perhaps woman will yet save politics. I know the charge that she is responsible for the ruin of her race, since she first ate the forbidden fruit in Paradise, but I think there is a chapter in that matter of Edenic fruit not written. I think that Adam when he saw Eve eating that apple asked for a bite and getting it into his possession ate the most of it, and he immediately shook the tree for more apples and has been eating ever since. If woman did first transgress I cannot forget that she introduced into the world the only Being who has ever done much towards saving it. Woman has started for suffrage and she is a determined and persevering creature, and she will keep on until she gets it; she may yet decide the elections in England, and elect Presidents for the United States, as already she is busy in the political affairs of New Zealand. I was surprised also in these regions to find how warmly loyal they are to old England. I had heard that they had become somewhat impatient of their governmental mother. But this is not so. They practically have things their own way, electing their own Parliament, and all Governors sent out from the old country are such men as are agreeable, and the people are required to pay no tax to the British crown, and they are in good humor with the British flag.

Among our most interesting hours in New Zealand were those spent at the Bishop's house in Auckland. Lord Bishop Cowie is a man of marvellous attractiveness, and his home is an enchantment, adorned with many curios which he brought from India when he served as chaplain during that war which interests and appals the world with its tales of mutiny. While chaplain he rode with Sir Colin Campbell and his historical host for the capture of Lucknow, that city whose name will stand in the literature of all ages as the synonym for Sepoy atrocities, and womanly fortitude, and Christian heroics. He told us most graphically how the women waiting for death at Lucknow tore up their underclothes to make bandages for the wounds of the soldiers, and that when at last these women were rescued they appeared in the brilliant dress of the ball-room. These dresses formerly worn by the convivial having been suddenly come upon, and when the wives and daughters of missionaries and Christian merchants had nothing else to wear.

Lord Bishop Cowie also had on his walls pictures of some of the most stirring scenes of the Russian war with which the military friends of the Bishop had been cognizant. Here is a pictured scene where there was no retreat for the English and yet their standing firm seemed certain destruction, and their General cried out, "Men! there is no retreat from this place, you will die here!" and the men replied, "Aye, aye, we are ready to do that!" And yonder another pictured scene of Balaklava after the famous charge of the six hundred, and the Commander said to the few men who had got back from the awful charge, "Men, it was a mad-brained trick," and they replied, "Never mind, General, we would do it again." The Bishop's walls in other places were made interesting by swords, belts, and torn insignia of battle from the fields of India, all the more interesting because we expect in our journey around the world to visit Lucknow and Cawnpore and Delhi and many of the chief places made immortal by the struggle between British valor and Sepoy infamy.

Pearl-glass and pearl-top chimneys last as a teacup lasts.

And here from the Bishop's own words. I got a satisfactory answer to a question I have asked many times, but for which I never received a satisfactory answer. I said, "your Lordship knew the chief men of Balaklava, and will you please explain to me what I have never been able to find out, and to which Tennyson makes reference in his 'Charge of the Light Brigade,' and in that line where he says, 'Some one had blundered.' Do you know and will you tell me exactly what that blunder was?" He said, "I can and will." Then the Bishop illustrated with knives and forks and napkin rings on the dining-table the position of the English guns, the Russian guns and the troops. He demonstrated to me plainly what the military blunder was that caused the dash and havoc of that cavalry regiment whose click of spurs, and clatter of hoofs, and jingle of bits, and spurts of blood you hear in the Poet Laureate's battle hymn. Here was the line of the English guns not very well defended, and yonder was the line of Russian guns backed by the whole Russian Army. The order was given to the cavalry regiment to take care of those English guns and keep them from being taken by the Russians, and the command was, "Take care of those English guns!" But the words were misunderstood and it was supposed that the order was to capture the Russian artillery. Instead of the command, "Take care of those English guns!" it was thought the command was, "Take those Russian guns!" For that ghastly and horrible assault of the impossible, the riders plunged their spurs and headed their horses into certain death. At last I had positive information as to what the blunder at Balaklava was. At Edinburgh, Scotland, years ago I asked one of the soldiers who rode in that charge the same question, but even he a participant in the scenes of that fiery day could not tell me just what the blunder was.

Now I have at last not only told in stirring words of a natural orator and magnetic talker, but on the dining table of the Lord Bishop of Auckland I had it set out before the eye dramatised and demonstrated by the cutlery on the white table cloth; but instead of the steel bayonets, the silver forks of a beautiful repast, and instead of the sharp swords of death, knives for bread-cutting, and instead of the belching guns of destruction, the napkin rings of a hospitality the memory of which shall be bright and fresh as long as I remember this visit to New Zealand.

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule, I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Roulah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colic, Asthma, Chronic Irritis, together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

Congreve's Balsamic Elixir can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot on receipt of $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

Ocean Grove's Love Feast.

Over 300 Persons Testify in an Hour Before an Audience of 11,000 People.

ALL previous Gospel gatherings in this country were outdone by the unprecedented assemblage at the closing services of the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting. At the early forenoon service on "Camp Meeting Sunday" (Aug. 26), in the great Auditorium, there were over 10,000 persons in the building, and several thousand more around the various entrances. After several short addresses, Rev. Dr. Stokes asked that everyone in the vast audience shake hands. What followed is thus described in the Asbury "Daily Press": "Shake hands with me," said the doctor, extending his hand, and thousands of hands were stretched out toward his. "Have your experiences short," he said; "if you don't, some one will shorten them." Rev. A. E. Ballard was the first to respond. "Lifted from witness of spirit to witness of God Almighty." "I have found the land of beauty," shouted a man from the gallery.

"Oh happy day that fixed my choice On thee my Saviour and my God!" sang the audience.

"He taught me how to live—rejoicing every day!" said an aged lady.

"A converted rabbi for thirty-three years—my salvation is in Christ—praise God for this heavenly Jerusalem come down on earth!" said a converted Jew.

"Glory to God!" "The Lord is with them that fear him!" "Washed in the blood of the Lamb," came from several voices.

"My Saviour came a drunkard save, for he has rescued me," said a fine-looking man in the audience.

"Sixty years ago I started to serve God—fifty-six years ago to preach, and twenty-six years ago was sanctified," declared a happy-looking old colored minister.

"When the roll is called up yonder I'll be here," promised a man with a G. A. R. button on his breast.

A sweet-faced woman—Mr. Burriss, from Washington, D.C.—thrilled the audience with modest testimony, and was followed by Mrs. Bottome of the King's Daughters: "He that liveth and believeth in me shall ever die."

"Where he leads me I will follow," sang a man in the audience, when an avalanche of testimonies poured in. Many were on their feet and a happy confusion prevailed in various parts of the vast hall men and women spoke to those around them.

"Christ keeps me on the road, in the hotels, and at my business," declared a commercial traveler.

"Oh, sing of his mighty love," rang out from choir and congregation.

"He leadeth me," sang a man in the audience, followed by D. L. Anderson of John Wanamaker's Sunday School in the long experience, "A little talk with Jesus."

A missionary from Africa praised God for help in the past, and asked the prayers of the congregation for himself and wife as they went to their distant field.

"I've reached the land of corn and wine" sounded out from the choir; the congregation took up the refrain and in a moment a sea of fluttering handkerchiefs waved in the Chautauqua salute, while a perceptible scent of perfume and cologne filled the building. The chorus was repeated, and again and again the flashing sea of white eaned out.

A quiet fell on the audience as blind Fan- Crosby, the sweet hymn writer rose, Glory to God in the highest—my heart hallelujah!" she said.

"Shake hands," said Dr. Stokes from the platform, and the hand of the blind woman was extended in the direction of the vice. The audience broke out in one of the latest hymns: "In that Happy Land."

"Ceaseless joy, ceaseless thanksgiving!" The present time is the best of my life in Christ!" were uttered experiences. "For thirty-four years I've known the keeping power of Christ," said white-haired Father reet.

"An engineer—pray for the brotherhood Locomotive Engineers," said a stalwart pking man from the gallery.

"August 26th, 1894, saved up to date! alleluiah," replied a business man.

"I was saved from drunkenness—I am asking the people to go with me and vote t the cursed liquor traffic," declared a re-mer.

"For forty years I've been attending Methodist love feasts! Praise God, they grow better every year!" said a grave-looking old man in measured cadence.

"Saved, saved, glory to God," sang "Gypsy" Smith in his sweet tenor voice, aided in the chorus by the deep-toned alto of Mrs. John G. Wilson.

And so, unconsciously, the time had passed away. Two hundred and ninety-five persons by actual count had spoken, and doubtless some were missed by the reporter.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" AT OCEAN GROVE.

From the Ocean Grove Record.
Dr. Louis Klopsch, publisher of the above paper, has again placed 1 Ocean Grove under large obligations for the editorial and pictorial prominence given in his widely popular paper to this place. The HERALD never does a thing of this kind by halves. Under the most generous and liberal control, it leads the press of modern times in munificence. Accompanying magnificent illustrations, we find a concise yet comprehensive sketch of Ocean Grove in its organization, peculiar character, Silver Anniversary the present season, and especially the building of the greatest auditorium in Christendom and its dedication free of debt. It is very highly appreciated by every recipient, and will be carried to thousands of homes as a beautiful souvenir of the season and place.

From the Ocean Grove Times.
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contains fine cuts of the Auditorium with pictures of Drs. Stokes and Hanlon, and also a full and interesting description of the dedicatory services, and other matter of interest. Copies of this edition will no doubt attract a great deal of attention.

The Gospel in Syria.

Good Work of American Missionaries in the Ancient City of Sidon—Native Christians Multiplying.

(From a Special Correspondent.)

FROM a city standing on the shore of the Mediterranean, in the centre of the great highway of ancient commerce, from Sidon, the ancient city, I write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, telling our sincere Christian brothers in the West about our present state and what the Gospel is doing here. The present Sidon may hardly be called a city, with not more than 12,000 inhabitants, three-fourths of whom are Mohammedans and the remaining fourth Christians who are greatly oppressed. Despite many difficulties, they build churches and establish schools. Tyranny, like a monstrous millstone, rests upon and compresses the energies of the Oriental Christians and they are all but annihilated by the stern rule of the Turks.

Zealous American missionaries came to this city about forty years ago, and since that time they have been distributing religious books and inspiring a taste for reading and inquiry, not only in the city but in many of the neighboring towns and villages. It is gratifying to know that their work is not in vain. The Bible is now spread nearly over all Syria, and thousands of the people who once never thought of possessing it, now read it regularly. Two of our devoted missionaries, Rev. W. R. Eddy and Rev. G. A. Ford, know the Arabic language well and the work they are doing is astonishing. They are not satisfied to labor in the city only but are doing itinerant work by journeys over a wide district in the country. They have about twenty different stations outside and in each there is a church with a native preacher, and a school with a native teacher.

Mohammedans are very ignorant here. They have no high schools, no learned people among them to elevate them and take away their ignorance. Nearly everywhere in Syria, Mohammedans are not permitted to let their children go into Christian schools. Many of them know nothing about Christianity and those who do know anything of it are the rich and officers of the government, who chose worldly wealth and honor rather than the privilege of being members of Christ's church.

Our American missionaries have organized two boarding schools in Sidon, one for the boys, the other for the girls. The students come from all parts of Syria, and after being through, go back into the country to teach and preach the Gospel everywhere. The number of pupils in the Academy this year is seventy, with six native teachers. The Girls' Seminary has about forty with six female native teachers, three American ladies and a native teacher, Mr. David Curban, a graduate of the S. P. College. From these two schools a good number of graduates every year go out in the country to fulfil the command of the Master. We have a great hope that the work of true Christians in Syria may be extended and greatly blessed if carried on in absolute dependence on God. AMUN YUSUF.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.
Discovered by Accident.—In Combing, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pore, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. Correspondence strictly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (All letters mention your country and this paper.) Cut this advertisement out.
Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. MONT LAWN'S RED-LETTER DAY.

The Arrival of the One Thousandth Child at our Children's Home—Lillie S., a Typical "Cherry Hill" Gamin and Her Touching Story—Grateful Letters from Parents.

THERE was a breeze of excitement among the hundred and thirty or more youngsters at Mont Lawn last week, indicating that something of unusual importance was about to happen. Our little folks, whose numbers of late have run far up into the hundreds, were watching for the advent of one whom they spoke of in whispers as "Number 1,000." Many the surmises indulged in. Would 1,000 be a boy? Of course, all the little fellows said so; why, it could never be a girl! Would he be a tall boy, and would he take the lead in their sports over the lawn, and their berrying parties through the woods, and in the bathing and swimming down in the Hudson? And so, by common consent, the children prepared in their juvenile way a royal welcome for Number 1,000 who was yet to come. Meanwhile, the missionaries who assist House-mother Faulhaber in the conduct of the Home, entered heartily into the matter, and kept close tally of the children, watching for the mysterious stranger whose arrival should round out the thousand.

Number 1,000 was found in New York on Saturday, and proved to be a little girl—a typical child of the streets, such as cannot be found anywhere else on this continent, save in the great metropolis itself. She was in charge of Miss M. A. Delany, a mission worker connected with the Catherine Street Mission. The little one's name is Lillie S., and she belongs to Cherry street, where she was born, of American parents, who were born in the same neighborhood. Lillie's parents, it need hardly be said, were delighted to have the little one spend ten days at Mont Lawn, and the mother looked especially grateful. The house in which they live is one of the most tumble-down rookeries in the Cherry Hill district, and is the very picture of utter dilapidation.

When Lillie came to us, her sad little features lighted up and her eyes danced in gleeful expectation of the good time she expected to have with the other children at Mont Lawn. But what did she know about Mont Lawn, this slip of a child, whose bare feet had never pressed the grass; whose only glimpses of trees or flowers had been those stunted specimens seen in the purlieus of the city; who had never known the pleasures of a free romp in a green field, and who could not tell a cow from a sheep? Outside of the dingy, dilapidated tenement in which she lived, her whole world had been bounded by the curb stone, and her playground had been a narrow, gloomy alley on Cherry street, where two children could hardly stand abreast. She had often heard the roar of the Elevated road; but until the kind missionary took her up to the Bible House, she had never yet ridden on the Elevated. The country and all its charms were to said softly, in answer to a question. "We lives on the foist floor in der rear, and me 'n' der others plays on der side-walk. Yes, I'm ten going 'leven (she looks about eight), and I'm de oldest livin'. There's Georgie—he's two, and there's me sister Maggie—she's eight, 'sides me; an' (this with childish sigh that was peculiarly touching) der was 'leven in the family, but six be dead!"

Six dead! And this child of ten the oldest of the living! As she stood there, with her poor little tattered skirt, with the undergarments peeping out through the big rents, and with bare feet whose toes show-which the great city consumes ere they reach manhood and womanhood. Yet there was something sweet and attractive about this child: her dark-brown eyes reflected truthfulness, and the whole face, in spite of the tangled hair and the rags, was not unattractive.

"No," continued Number 1,000, "we never goes to church. I never was inside one, 'n I never went to Sunday School until dis lady," indicating Miss Delany, "tuk me to the Catherine Street Mission, little 'wile ago. I goes dis way barefoot all summer."

When Number 1,000 was taken with the other children on board the steamer,

"Chrystenah," the fact that somebody of consequence was in the party soon leaked out, and Lillie was surrounded by the other children who kept up a constant chattering until the Nyack dock was reached. Then came the lovely drive up through the Rockland road to the Home—twenty minutes' smooth riding through a beautiful pastoral country. At last the Home was reached, and a delegation of youngsters poured out into the roadway to meet THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wagonette.

"Have you got him? Has he come? Oh, missionary, where is he?" cried the children. Even the horses, used to being surrounded and petted by our young folks, kept their eyes wide open during this scene, as if they, too, took an interest in the new arrival.

"Yes, he has come," said the missionary, and suiting the action to the word, she handed Lillie, all smiles and radiant with happiness, out into the middle of the road, "and there he is."

A dozen of the bigger girls crowded around and said, "Oh, its a girl! its a girl!" and the boys drew back in momentary chagrin. But the sulks do not last long at Mont Lawn, and soon the hundred odd children were calling aloud in welcome to Number 1,000. She was cheered and greeted and patted and petted: some gave her apples and pears, and one wee fellow who stood looking with wide-open eyes, lispingly remarked: "I tought it might be a boy."

During the week, Lillie was the child heroine of the Home—if such a shrinking, timid little creature can be called by so dignified a title. A great wave of sunshine had entered into the life of the wee, barefoot, ragged girl from Cherry Hill. Clad in a nice, clean, well-fitting frock, a snowy apron, and with the added luxury of shoes and stockings, she entered into the pleasures of the other children with a strange eagerness born of unacquaintance. Everything was strange and new:

the singing of the birds by day and the ceaseless hum of insect-life in the woods atter nightfall; the drives, the romps across the meadows, or the games on the lawn where they played "ring-a-rosy" around the Lib-

COMMUNION OF SAINTS.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Judges 12: 6, "Then said they unto him, Say now Shibboleth: and he said Sibboleth: for he could not frame to pronounce it right. Then they took him, and slew him at the passages of Jordan."

Do you notice the difference of pronunciation between shibboleth and sibboleth? A very small and unimportant difference, you say. And yet, that difference was the difference between life and death for a great many people. The Lord's people, Gilead and Ephraim, got into a great fight, and Ephraim was worsted, and on the retreat came to the fords of the river Jordan to cross. Order was given that all Ephraimites coming there be slain. But how could it be found out who were Ephraimites? They were detected by their pronunciation. Shibboleth was a word that stood for river. The Ephraimites had a say "shibboleth" always left out the sound brogue of their own, and when they tried to of the "h." When it was asked that they say shibboleth they said sibboleth, and were slain. "Then said they unto him, say now shibboleth; and he said sibboleth, for he could not frame to pronounce it right. Then they took him and slew him at the passages of Jordan." A very small difference, you say, between Gilead and Ephraim, and yet how much intolerance about that small difference! The Lord's tribes in our time—by which I mean the different denominations of Christians—sometimes magnify a very small difference, and the only difference between scores of denominations to-day is the difference between shibboleth and sibboleth.

The Church of God is divided into a great number of denominations. Time would fail me to tell of the Calvinists, and the Arminians, and the Sabbatarians, and the Baxterians, and the Dunkers, and the Shakers, and the Quakers, and the Methodists, and the Baptists, and the Episcopalians, and the Lutherans, and the Congregationalists, and the Presbyterians, and the Spiritualists, and a score of other denominations of religionists, some of them founded by very good men, some of them founded by very egotistic men, some of them founded by very bad men. But as I demand for myself liberty of conscience, I must give that same liberty to every other man, remembering that he no more differs from me than I differ from him. I advocate the largest liberty in all religious belief and form of worship. In art, in politics, in morals, and in religion, let there be no gag law, no moving of the previous question, no persecution, no intolerance.

You know that the air and the water keep pure by constant circulation, and I think there is a tendency in religious discussion to purification and moral health. Between the fourth and the sixteenth centuries the Church proposed to make people think right by prohibiting discussion, and by strong censorship of the press, and rack, and gibbet, and hot lead down the throat, tried to make people orthodox, but it was discovered that you cannot change a man's belief by twisting off his head, nor make a man see differently by putting an awl through his eyes. There is something in a man's conscience which will hurl off the mountain that you threw upon it, and, unsinged of the fire, out of the flame will make red wings on which the martyr will mount to glory.

In that time of which I speak, between the fourth and sixteenth centuries, people went from the house of God into the most appalling iniquity, and right along by consecrated altars there were tides of drunkenness and licentiousness such as the world never heard of, and the very sewers of perdition broke loose and flooded the church. After a while the printing-press was freed, and it broke the shackles of the human mind. Then there came a large number of bad books, and where there was one man hostile to the Christian religion, there were twenty men ready to advocate it; so I have not any nervousness in regard to this battle going on between Truth and Error. The truth will conquer just as certainly as that God is stronger than the devil. Let Error run if you only let Truth run along with it. Urged on by sceptic's shout and transcendentalist's spur, let it run. God's angels of wrath are in hot pursuit, and quicker than eagle's beak clutches out a hawk's heart, God's vengeance will tear it to pieces.

I propose to speak to you of sectarianism—its origin, its evils, and its cures. There are those who would make us think that this monster, with horns and hoofs, is religion. I shall chase it to its hiding-place, and drag it out of the caverns of darkness, and rip off its hide. But I want to make a distinction between bigotry and the lawful fondness for peculiar religious beliefs and forms of worship. I have no admiration for a nothingarian.

In a world of such tremendous vicissitude and temptation, and with a soul that must after awhile stand before a throne of insufferable brightness, in a day when the rocking of the mountains and the flaming of the heavens and the upheaval of the seas shall be among the least of the excitements, to give account for every thought, word, action, preference, and dislike—that man is mad who has no religious preference. But our early education, our physical temperament, our mental constitution, will very much decide our form of worship.

A style of psalmody that may please me may displease you. Some would like to have a minister in gown and bands and surplice, and others prefer to have a minister in plain citizens' apparel. Some are most impressed when a little child is presented at the altar and sprinkled of the waters of a holy benediction "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," and others are more impressed when the penitent comes up out of the river, his garments dripping with the waters of a baptism which signifies the washing away of sin. Let either have his own way. One man likes no noise in prayer, not a word, not a whisper. Another man, just as good, pretends by gesticulation and exclamation to express his devotional aspirations. One is just as good as the other. "Every man fully persuaded in his own mind."

George Whitfield was going over a Quaker rather roughly for some of his religious sentiments, and the Quaker said: "George, I am as thou art; I am too bringing all men to the hope of the Gospel; therefore, it thou will not quarrel with me about my broad brim, I will not quarrel with thee about thy black gown. George, give me thy hand."

In tracing out the religion of sectarianism, or bigotry, I find that a great deal of it comes from wrong education in the home circle. There are parents who do not think it wrong to caricature and jeer the peculiar forms of religion in the world, and denounce other sects and other denominations. It is very often the case that that kind of education acts just opposite to what was expected, and the children grow up, and, after a while, go and see for themselves; and, looking in those churches, and finding that the people are good there, and they love God and keep his commandments, by natural reaction they go and join those very churches. I could mention the names of prominent ministers of the Gospel who spent their whole life bombarding other denominations and who lived to see their children preach the Gospel in those very denominations. But it is often the case that bigotry starts in a household, and that the subject of it never recovers. There are tens of thousands of bigots ten years old.

I think sectarianism and bigotry also rise from too great prominence of any one denomination in a community. All the other denominations are wrong, and his denomination is right because his denomination is the most wealthy, or the most popular, or the most influential, and it is "our" church, and "our" religious organization, and "our" choir, and "our" minister, and the man tosses his head, and wants other denominations to know their places. It is a great deal better in any community when the great denominations of Christians are about equal in power, marching side by side for the world's conquest. Mere outside prosperity, mere worldly power, is no evidence that the church is acceptable to God. Better a barn with Christ in the manger than a cathedral with magnificent harmonies rolling through the long-drawn aisle, and an angel from heaven in the pulpit, if there be no Christ in the chancel, and no Christ in the robes. Bigotry is often the child of ignorance.

You seldom find a man with large intellect who is a bigot. It is the man who thinks he knows a great deal, but does not. That man is almost always a bigot. The whole tendency of education and civilization is to bring a man out of that kind of state of mind and heart. There was in the far East a great obelisk, and one side of the obelisk was white, another side of the obelisk was green, another side of the obelisk was blue, and travellers went and looked at that obelisk, but they did not walk around it. One man looked at one side, another at another side, and they came home each one looking at only one side; and they happened to meet, the story says; and they got into a rank quarrel about the color of that obelisk. One man said it was white, another man said it was green, another man said it was blue, and when they were in the very heat of the controversy a more intelligent traveller came, and said "Gentlemen, I have seen that obelisk, and you are all right, and you are all wrong. Why didn't you walk all around the obelisk?"

Look out for the man who sees only one side of a religious truth. Look out for the man who never walks around about these great theories of God and eternity and the dead. He will be a bigot inevitably—the man who only sees one side. There is no man more to be pitied than he who has in his head just one idea—no more, no less. More light, less sectarianism. There is nothing that will so soon kill bigotry as sunshine—God's sunshine.

So I have set before you what I consider to be the causes of bigotry. I have set before you the origin of this great evil. What are some of the baleful effects? First of all, it cripples investigation. You are wrong, and I am right, and that ends it. No taste for exploration, no spirit of investigation. From the glorious realm of God's truth, over which an archangel might fly from eternity to eternity and not reach the limit, the man shuts himself out and dies, a blind mole under a corn-shock. It stops all investigation.

While each denomination of Christians is to present all the truths of the Bible, it seems to me that God has given to each denomination an especial mission to give particular emphasis to some one doctrine; and so the Calvinistic churches must present the sovereignty of God, and the Arminian churches must present man's free agency, and the Episcopal churches must present the importance of order and solemn ceremony, and the Baptist churches must present the necessity of ordinances, and the Congregational Church must present the responsibility of the individual member, and the Methodist Church must show what holy enthusiasm, hearty congregational singing can accomplish. While each denomination of Christians must set forth all the doctrines of the Bible, I feel it is especially incumbent upon each denomination to put particular emphasis on some one doctrine.

Another great damage done by the sectarianism and bigotry of the Church is that it disgusts people with the Christian religion. Now, my friends, the Church of God was never intended for a war barrack. People are afraid of a riot. You go down the street and you see an excitement, and missiles flying through the air, and you hear the shock of fire-arms. Do you, the peaceful and industrious citizen, go through that street? Oh, no! you will say, "I'll go around the block." Now, men come and look upon this narrow path to heaven, and sometimes see the ecclesiastical brickbats flying every whither, and they say, "Well, I guess I'll take the broad road; there is so much sharp shooting on the narrow road I guess I'll try the broad road!"

Francis I. so hated the Lutherans that he said that if he thought there was one drop of Lutheran blood in his veins he would puncture them and let that drop out. Just as long as there is so much hostility between denomination and denomination, or between one professed Christian and another, or between one church and another, so long men will be disgusted with the Christian religion, and say, "If that is religion, I want none of it."

Again, bigotry and sectarianism do great damage in the fact that they hinder the triumph of the Gospel. Oh, how much wasted ammunition! how many men of splendid intellect have given their whole life to controversial disputes when, if they had given their life to something practical, they might have been vastly useful! Suppose, while I speak, there were a common enemy coming up the Bay, and all the forts around the harbor began to fire into each other—you would cry out, "National suicide! why don't those forts blaze away in one direction, and that against the common enemy?" And yet I sometimes see in the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ a strange thing going on: church against church, minister against minister, denomination against denomination, firing away into their own fort, or the fort which ought to be on the same side, instead of concentrating their energy and giving one mighty and everlasting volley against the navies of darkness riding up through the bay!

I go out sometimes in the summer, and find two beehives, and these two hives are in a quarrel. I come near enough, not to be stung, but I come just near enough to hear the controversy, and one beehive says, "That field of clover is the sweetest," and another beehive says, "That field of clover is the sweetest." I come in between them and I say, "Stop this quarrel; if you like that field of clover best, go there; if you like that field of clover best, go there; but let me tell you that that hive which gets the most honey is the best hive!" So I come out between the churches of the Lord Jesus Christ. One denomination of Christians says, "That field of Christian doctrine is best," and another says, "This field of Christian doctrine is best." Well, I say, "g-where you get the most honey." That is the best church which gets the most honey of Christian grace for the heart, and the most honey of Christian usefulness for the life.

Besides that, if you want to build up any denomination, you will never build it up by trying to pull some other down. Intolerance never put anything down. How much has Intolerance accomplished, for instance, against the Methodist Church? For long years her ministry were forbidden the pulpits of Great Britain. Why was it that so many of them preached in the fields? Simply because they could not get in the churches. And the name of the Church was given in derision and as a sarcasm. The critics of the church said, "They have no order, they have no method in their worship," and the critics, therefore, in irony called them "Methodists."

I am told that in Astor Library, New York, kept as curiosities there are seven hundred and seven books and pamphlets against Methodism. Did Intolerance stop that church? No; it is either first or second amid the denominations of Christendom, her missionary stations in all parts of the world, her men not only important in religious trusts, but important also in secular trusts. Church marching on, and the more intolerance against it the faster it marched.

What did Intolerance accomplish against the Baptist Church? If laughing scorn and tirade could have destroyed the church it would not have to-day a disciple left. The Baptists were hurled out of Boston in olden times. Those who sympathized with them were imprisoned, and when a petition was offered asking leniency in their behalf, all the men who signed it were indicted. Has Intolerance stopped the Baptist Church? The last statistics in regard to it showed twenty-five thousand churches and three million communicants. Intolerance never put down anything.

In England a law was made against the Jew. England thrust back the Jew and thrust down the Jew, and declared that no Jew should hold official position. What came of it? Were the Jews destroyed? Was their religion overthrown? No. Who became Prime Minister of England? Who was next to the throne? Who was higher than the throne because he was counsellor and adviser? Disraeli, a Jew. What were we celebrating in all our churches as well as synagogues only a few years ago? The one hundredth birthday anniversary of Montefiore, the great Jewish philanthropist. Intolerance never yet put down anything.

But now, my friends, having shown you the origin of bigotry or sectarianism, and having shown you the damage it does, I want briefly to show you how we are to war against this terrible evil, and I think we ought to begin our war by realizing our own weakness and our imperfections. If we make so many mistakes in the common affairs of life, is it not possible that we may make mistakes in regard to our religious affairs? Shall we take a man by the throat, or by the collar, because he cannot see religious truths just as we do? In the light of eternity it will be found out, I think, there was something wrong in all our creeds, and something right in all our creeds. But since we may make mistakes in regard to things of the world, do not let us be so egotistic and so puffed up as to have an idea that we cannot make any mistake in regard to religious theories. And then I think we will do a great deal to overthrow the sectarianism from our heart, and the sectarianism from the world, by chiefly enlarging in those things in which we agree rather than those in which we differ.

Now, here is a great Gospel platform. A man comes up on this side of the platform and says: "I don't believe in baby sprinkling." Shall I shove him off? Here is a man coming up on this side of the platform, and he says: "I don't believe in the perseverance of the saints." Shall I shove him off? No. I will say: "Do you believe in the Lord Jesus as your Saviour? Do you trust him for time and for eternity?" He says: "Yes." "Do you take Christ for time and for eternity?" "Yes," I say. "Come on, brother; one in time and one in eternity; brother now, brother forever." Blessed be God for a Gospel platform so large that all who receive Christ may stand on it!

I think we may overthrow the severe sectarianism and bigotry in our hearts, and in the church also, by realizing that all the denominations of Christians have yielded noble institutions and noble men. There is nothing that so stirs my soul as this thought. One denomination yielded a Robert Hall and an Adoniram Judson; another yielded a Latimer and a Melville; another yielded John Wesley and the blessed Summerfield, while our own denomination yielded John Knox and the Alexanders—men of whom the world was not worthy. Now, I say, if we are honest and fair-minded men, when we come up in the presence of such churches and such denominations, although they may be different from our own, we ought to admire them, and we ought to love and honor them. Churches which can produce such men, and such large-hearted charity, and such magnificent martyrdom, ought to win our affection—at any rate, our respect. So come on, ye hundred thousand Episcopalians in this country, and ye five hundred thousand Presbyterians, and ye million Baptists, and ye two million Methodists—come on; shoulder to shoulder we will march for the world's conquest: for all nations are to be saved, and God demands that you and I help. Forward, the whole line! In the Young Men's Christian Associations, in the Bible Society, in the Tract Society, in the Foreign Missionary Society, shoulder to shoulder all denominations.

Perhaps I might forcefully illustrate this truth by calling your attention to an incident which took place about twenty years ago. One Monday morning at about two o'clock, while her nine hundred passengers were sound asleep in her berths dreaming of home, the steamer "Atlantic" crashed into Mars Head. Five hundred souls in ten minutes landed in eternity! Oh, what a scene! Agonized men and women running up and down the gangways, and clutching for the rigging, and the plunge of the helpless steamer, and the clapping of the hands of the merciless sea over the drowning and the dead, threw two continents into terror. But see this brave quartermaster pushing out with the life line until he gets to the rock; and see these fishermen gathering up the shipwrecked, and taking them into the cabins, and wrapping them in the flannels snug and warm; and see that minister of the Gospel, with three other men, getting into a life-boat, and pushing out for the wreck, pulling away across the surf, and pulling away until they saved one more man, and then getting back with him to the shore. Can those men ever forget that night? And can they ever forget their companionship in peril, companionship in struggle, companionship in awful catastrophe and rescue? Never! Never! In whatever part of the earth they meet, they will be friends when they mention the story of that night when the "Atlantic" struck Mars Head. Well, my friends, our world has gone into a worse shipwreck. Sin drove it on the rocks. The old ship has lurched and tossed in the tempests of six thousand years. Out with the life-line! I do not care what denomination carries it. Out with the life-boat! I do not care what denomination rows it. Side by side, in the memory of common hardships, and common trials, and common prayers, and common tears, let us be brothers forever. We must be.

One army of the living God,
To his command we bow;
Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now.

And I expect to see the day when all denominations of Christians shall join hands around the cross of Christ and recite the creed: "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, and in the Communion of Saints, and in life everlasting. Amen!"

Railroads in Palestine.

The Land of the Bible being Opened Up by Modern Enterprise.

ALL the world is aware by this time that a railroad from Jaffa to Jerusalem has been in active operation for now more than a year, whose engines were manufactured in the United States of America. The Jaffa depot is close to the German colony; and the line, after passing Ramleh and Lydda, takes a circling southward course to the Judean mountains, issuing past Bittir, and running near Bethlehem, terminating at another German colony to the southwest of the walls of Jerusalem, at a quarter of an hour's walk from the Jaffa gate of the city. But all the world may not know that another line of railroad is now in rapid construction by an English Company from the maritime termini of Haifa and Akka, or Acco, across the plain of Esdraelon and the valley of Jezreel, to the famous city of Damascus. A French Company is said to be working a road from Beyrout, near the ruins of Baalbek, also to Damascus.

Thus the land of the Book, the land of the Patriarchs and Prophets, Apostles and Martyrs, the cradle of the Bible and of Christianity, is being opened up by the iron road to pilgrims and tourists, who take pleasure in her stones, and to commerce and European civilization; and this at the very time when the rightful heirs to the land are returning in thousands to their patrimony, and the "latter rain," so long withheld, and so indispensable to agricultural prosperity, is returning also in regularity and copiousness.

Did the prophets know anything, or predict anything, of railroads? I decidedly incline to maintain that Isaiah did, and foretold these very railroads in chapters 35: 8; 10: 23; 11: 16; 62: 10. His "Maslul and Mesilla,"—literally "cast up, embanked roads,"—are, I believe, railroads. The correct translation of 35: 8 is, "And there shall be there an embanked (cast up) road, and a road,"—thereby intimating an unusual road—"and the road to the Holy (city or place) it shall be called." Jerusalem's name in Arabic and other eastern tongues is simply "the Holy," and the prophet tells us how this road shall be called—"Derech Hakodesh"—Arabic, "Trek Elkhods"—the very name now heard in the streets of Jaffa and Jerusalem! He says even stupid people shall not lose their way in that kind of double road; and that there would be no need to quarry stones for it, but simply "to gather them," 62: 10. He knew they would be plentiful on the surface of the ground.

From Jaffa to the Judean range are the plains of Philistia and Sharon, liable to inundation by the winter rains. So the prophet foresaw that it would have to be an embanked road. As a matter of fact, the company began by making a slight embankment for the railroad, which the first winter rains washed away, and it had to be reconstructed more solidly and higher.

In chapter 10: 23 the Prophet predicts prolongations of the Palestine lines to Egypt, and Assyria; and I hear from Jerusalem that the prolongation of the line to Gaza, and down to Egypt, is to be commenced soon.

The "Kirkaroth" of Isaiah 66: 20—swift, rolling vehicles—not swift beasts, nor dromedaries—may be the future electric cars of Palestine; while the "fiery peladoth" is riding," if Nahum 2: 3, may represent some new invention of aerial locomotion.

The "Salt Sea," not "Dead," is now navigated by sailing vessels! They are employed in picking up bitumen from the surface of the water on account of the Sultan, to be followed, doubtless soon, by steam launches, rendering it possible to visit the highlands of Moab in a few hours!

Everybody thinks we are on the eve of great events that will eclipse past history, and none will be greater than those now looming on the horizon of the Holy Land. The great Eastern Question has its centre there—in the city of the Great King.

CHRIST'S PEACEFUL REIGN.*

S.S. Lesson for Sept. 23. Isa. 11: 1-9. Golden Text, Isa. 11: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THEY shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." The Lord has said it, and it will surely come to pass. But when, and by what means? This is the burning question for the children of God in these last days of a dying dispensation. The word "And," in the beginning of our chapter, connects it with what has gone before. The Lord has been speaking, through his prophet, of

"A Remnant."

Israel, as a nation, had failed to understand, and to carry out the purposes of God. Before the law was given on Mount Sinai he had said to his people, "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagle's wings, and brought you unto myself. Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex. 19: 4-6); and again (Deut. 7: 6): "Thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth." But Israel had failed; they had desired a king that they might "be like the nations," they had adopted the gods and the customs of the heathen; and the dividing line between them and the nations was broken down: they failed to be God's witnesses.

But God's purpose, once formed, is unalterable. The failure of man cannot change it. In the beginning God made man in his likeness, after his image. He has never abandoned his purpose to make man like God, and to have a people upon earth who should "show forth the praises [or virtues] of him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." If the people of Israel, as a nation, did not understand, there was a remnant who did understand, of which we read (Isa. 10: 20-23): "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the remnant of Israel, and such as are escaped of the house of Jacob, shall no more again stay upon him that smote them; but shall stay upon the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, in truth. The remnant shall return, even the remnant of Jacob, unto the mighty God. For though thy people Israel be as the sand of the seas, yet a remnant of them shall return." The Apostle Paul quotes these words thus: "Isaiah crieth concerning Israel, If the number of the children of Israel be as the sand of the sea, it is the remnant that shall be saved: for the Lord will execute his Word upon the earth, finishing it and cutting it short." All through time God's purposes must stand: they do not depend on the faithfulness of man. He seeks to unite man with him in his purpose; but if one generation fails him, he can call another, or where, as in the case of Israel, a people fail him, he can call a remnant out of this people, who will respond to him.

This principle of God's working is of the last importance to his people now upon the earth. Since the Jews, as a nation, rejected Christ, God has visited the Gentiles "to take out of them a people for his name," i.e., for his character. The Church of Christ, composed of converted people of all churches, denominations, and nations, in these times of the Gentiles, has miserably failed of her high calling, to be "a people for his name." Other names, their own name, their denominational name—another character,—the character of the age in which they live have been far more manifest in the Church than the names and character of Christ; and he must withdraw from his people to a remnant again: from "the Churches" (Rev. 2: 2, 3) to "the overcomers in the same chapter that his purpose may be accomplished and that he may be free to carry out, and to fulfil this glorious promise: "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Christians pray for the blessed time to come as though God were tardy. "God is 'not slack concerning his promise, but he is waiting for the co-operation of his people. Before the world can know that God has sent his Son, those whom the Father has given him must be one. "As thou, Father, art in Me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. And the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them; that they may be one, even as we are One: I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one [perfected into one, R.V.]; and that the world may know that thou hast sent me, and hast loved them, as thou has loved me." It is not our God who delays the world's conversion: it is that those whom he has given to his Son, have not fully yielded to his work upon them, in making of them, together, "one perfect man" made out of many members. The whole creation is waiting for this time of blessing mentioned in our text; but, in order that it should come about, there must be "the manifestation of the sons of God," for which the creation waits: the Bride of Christ must make herself ready. It is not God who keeps the world waiting for blessing. It is "the remnant," or the overcomers, who in this day take their place, that are

and keeping the world waiting for the future time of blessing. God never cast away his people whom he foreknew; but there is, at this present time, a remnant according to the election of grace." What Israel seeketh for, that he obtained not, "but the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded." It is just the same now: A few have seen "the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus," but the Church, as a whole, is hardened against that true, practical holiness of life by which the Bride shall make herself ready. But we are living in a critical hour: "A hardening in part hath befallen Israel, until the fullness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved." (R.V.) The movement among the Jews in our day which attracts so much notice among the nations upon earth; their power influence and riches, their persecutions, the awakening among them to assert again their nationality; the many changes in Palestine itself, all goes to show us that "the times of the Gentiles" are almost run out. What then is our position? Paul would have us know concerning the Jews that "as touching the Gospel, they are enemies for your sake," or "through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles, for to provoke them to jealousy." "But as touching the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sake. For the gifts and the calling of God are without repentance. For as ye in times past were disobedient to God, but now have obtained mercy by their disobedience, even so have these also now been disobedient, that by the mercy shown to you they also may now obtain mercy." It is a wondrous and stirring truth that as soon as God's purpose is accomplished fully to gather out from among the nations a people for his name, a Bride who has made herself ready, as soon as the one shall be taken, and the other shall be left, then blessing will come upon the sleeping church, and through the church upon Israel; and after the times of Antichrist, through Israel, blessing will come upon the world, and the peaceful reign of Christ will be ushered in.

It is in connection with the remnant that Isaiah prophesies: "And there shall come forth a Rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots: And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord; and shall make him of quick 'scent' [margin] in the fear of the Lord." Then follows the description of his reign as though, immediately upon his appearance, this wondrous time of peace and prosperity, this complete cancelling of the physical consequences of the fall, should take place. Righteousness also should prosper and the enmity between the beasts of prey and the domestic animals should be done away.

their diet by Daniel and his three companions in captivity. Critics from the time of Porphyry to the present day have made the book of Daniel an object of attack. Whatever is the view taken of the dispute as to the date and authorship of the book, there can be no question of the beauty and inspiring quality of the historical facts therein set down. The one recorded in the verses selected for the lesson is especially notable. Its picture of Daniel, a prisoner of war, an exile, and an ardent worshipper of the true God, pleading for and at last obtaining permission to abstain from the delicacies and wines provided from the royal table, is very impressive. The circumstances detailed imply that Daniel was at the time a youth about seventeen years old, of princely if not royal blood, who had been singled out by the great king of Babylon, from among the prisoners to be educated and trained for high office. Such a distinction would develop pride and vanity in ordinary boys, and lead them to not only abjure their nationality, but their religious principles. There would naturally be a strong temptation to become a Babylonian in manner and in religion. Daniel is represented as overcoming the temptation and remaining true to his God. The apparent way to advancement to influence and power would be docility and at least an outward acceptance of Babylonian religion, yet at the outset Daniel is described as resisting, and proving by a practical test that he was right in resisting, the regulations of the palace. This, too, in a matter in which a young man's resistance would be least expected. The rich viands and choice wines would be eagerly enjoyed by many young men. But Daniel was no epicure, and he refused them. His action was justified by the mental as well as physical results. Not only were he and his companions superior "in matters of wisdom and understanding," but were "fairer and fatter in flesh" than those who had lived on the royal dainties.

Daniel purposed in his heart. All good and evil purposes start there. The philosopher-king never said a truer word than when he declared, "as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Ruskin insists in reference to painters, that "a person false at heart may, when it suits his purpose, seize a stray truth here or there; but the relations of truth, its perfectness, that which makes it wholesome truth, he can never perceive. As wholeness and wholesomeness go together, so also sight with sincerity. It is only the constant desire of and submissiveness to truth which can mark its infinite aspects, and fit them and knit them into the strength of sacred invention."

Their countenances appeared fairer. There is no greater mistake than to think that intoxicating liquor is good for the physical health or for the mind. The temporary exhilaration produced by a few glasses of wine soon passes away, and even under their influence, a man's high spirits generally are so evidently artificial as to bring him into contempt; while the puffed and bloated and inflamed countenance of the habitual inebriate provokes the derision of everyone. A broker returning to his office after a lunch with a client in which a good deal of wine had been drunk, remarked complacently to a visitor, "The world looks different to a man when he has a bottle of champagne in him." The visitor looked at him significantly and replied, "Yes, sir, and he looks different to the world."

Prove thy servants ten days. Daniel asked to be allowed to live on pulse and water. It is not certain what pulse was, but its name implies that it was a preparation of vegetables, peas, barley or seeds. This, and only water to drink, formed the diet which the four young men had, and on which they thrived so well that, at the end of ten days, they looked better than those who had eaten the king's meat and drunk the king's wines. Some people are not content to make even a ten days' experience of the kind, but go on drinking for years until constitution and character are both ruined. Dr. Lobb tells the story of a man who stood at a bar pleading for a glass of liquor. The bartender refused him, having been warned not to sell him any. He tried to bribe the man to supply him, but the bartender was firm. "You have had delirium tremens," he said, "and I dare not sell to you." The man was angry, and he stepped aside sullenly to make room for two young men who gave their order and received their drink without demur. The first man was annoyed, and he said to the bartender, "You would do less harm by giving me the liquor than giving it to them. I am ruined body and soul, and it can make no difference to me now, how much I drink; but those young men will be ruined by it as I have been. When I was their age you sold me liquor freely enough. Now, after I have been drinking for years, you refuse me and you ruin someone else." Then, turning to the young men, he said, "Keep on as you are doing and in a few years you will be like me."

Wisdom and understanding. Both were needed in the man who was to occupy the high position for which Daniel was destined. His attitude as to the wine was one proof of his possessing them. Statesmen do not appear to realize how the country is impoverished by the drinking habit. No only is money wasted in the cost of the liquor, but in the extra number of prison jailers, policemen and others, required owing to the wicked things men do when they are drunk. A few years ago in a box of treasures imported from Europe, some grasses were used as packing to keep the delicate glass from being broken. Attached to the grass were some germs of a destructive moth, which destroys trees and plants. They came to life and have multiplied enormously. A Boston journal says that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has already spent $205,000 in efforts to exterminate it, and the latest request for an appropriation for the purpose called for over $100,000 more. But the losses caused by the ravages of the moth which they are striving so hard to destroy are small compared with the losses caused by intoxicating liquor.

Therefore stood they before the king. This is to say they were trusted officers of the court, men who could be relied on. A historian of the war says that at Gen. Grant headquarters one evening, a number of officers were assembled in council. After the business, others joined them and a social glass was proposed. Only one declined giving as his reason that he "never drank." The evening passed and each went to his respective duty. A few days afterward the officer who declined a drink, received a note from Gen. Grant asking him to call upon him. When he appeared, Grant reminded him of his saying that he never drank and asked him if that was true. The officer replied that it was, he was on principle a total abstainer. Gen. Grant said that he wanted a man of those principles to take charge of the Commissary Department and pointed him on the spot. He served in that capacity through the war and afterward when Grant became President, the officer who never drank was again in request. I had earned in the army the reputation of a man who could be relied upon, and such men are needed in all kinds of public business.

THOUSANDS HOMELESS AND HELPLESS!

THE PITIFUL CONDITION OF THE SUFFERERS BY THE GREAT CONSTANTINOPLE EARTHQUAKE.

One of the Worst European Calamities in Many Years—An Overwhelming Disaster that has Brought Suffering Upon Moslem and Christian Alike—Hon. A. S. Hewitt's Eloquent Plea for Help from America—Minister Terrell's Telegram.

EW disasters in recent years have been productive of such widespread and poignant suffering among thousands of people of all ages and conditions, as the series of great earthquakes where dwellings and shops had fallen, numbers of dead were taken out, some being mangled beyond recognition. Up to the present time no accurate estimate of the number of lives sacrificed in Constantinople has been made, but it is known to be very large and the number of those injured is much greater. At the present moment, there are thousands of persons in that city homeless and unsheltered, living out in the open fields, with insufficient clothing and food. The Sultan has assisted, to the full extent of his power, in helping these cases; but so widespread is the suffering in Constantinople and many of the surrounding from abroad, if the misery and want are to be seriously relieved."

Ex-Mayor A. S. Hewitt, writing from accurate information as to the condition of affairs, gives this moving picture of the situation in the capital:

"The older portion of Constantinople is practically in ruins. The bazaars, which are really only covered streets, are, with their priceless contents, overthrown and destroyed. The loss of life has been very great, and the remaining population are living in tents and such temporary shelters as can be provided, while business has ceased and the ordinary avenues of employment are closed. The suffering is intense, and the resources of the government, being small at the best, are entirely inadequate to meet the demand for succor and relief from starvation. Women and children are suffering from hunger, and if assistance be not promptly furnished, famine and pestilence are certain to follow."

Not only in Constantinople itself, but in the suburbs, as already stated, the devasta-buried in the ruins.

At Broussa, Smyrna, Tchatalja, Balikesar, Panderna, Karahissar, Sahib, Ghemlek, Sandikli, Biledjick, Lefke, Iregheut, Moudania, Krenastli, Trilla and other places, the soil was shaken and the greatest terror was inspired among the inhabitants. In many of the districts in the outskirts of Constantinople the earthquake did much damage, not a village being spared. Khans were demolished, walls thrown down, churches, convents, shops and dwellings ruined, mosques and minarets cracked, and traffic wholly stopped. Several were killed at Pera and a number injured; at Ederne-Kapou, a number perished, at Fatnieh, seventeen are known to have been killed and sixteen injured and at a nearby village twelve were seriously injured by collapsing walls. Ten were killed at Toulou on the Gulf of Ismid. In the region of Stamboul alone there were one hundred and thirty deaths. It is not known how many died in the ruins at Yakadjik and Yalova, twenty-five are known to have lost their lives at Ada-Bazar, twelve at Halki, several at Pendik, three at Pancaldi and four at Hasskeni. At all of these places and many others the suffering among the survivors is extreme and but little can be done to relieve them. Tents, loaves of bread and physicians were promptly forwarded by the government to the scenes of the greatest suffering. Already several of the European governments have taken action looking to a popular movement for aiding the sufferers in Turkey. Americans recall the fact that when the news of the Johnstown calamity reached the Old World, American travelers met and organized, in order to provide relief for the sufferers and the first substantial subscription came from the Sultan of Turkey.

Indifference, when questions of human sympathy with suffering are concerned, is not a characteristic of the American nation. This has been strikingly demonstrated by the splendid aid it rendered to Russia two years ago, when the "Leo" and other vessels were sent laden with food for the starving peasants, and by the promptness with which it showed its readiness to respond to the call of Korea for help—which fortunately proved unnecessary. Had the facts been accessible earlier with regard to the present Turkish calamity, we believe that ere now a relief movement would have been under way, and that Americans would have shown that they had not forgotten how to be grateful to the Sultan, for his prompt sympathy for the sufferers in the Conemaugh valley several years ago.

The same humane, Christian spirit which has inspired the generosity of Americans in the past, will prompt them now to extend a helping hand to the Turkish sufferers, regardless of race or creed. Relief organizations are already at work in London and Paris, but the need is so great and the cause so urgent that American aid will be gladly welcomed and all the more if rendered speedily.

It need not on this occasion be sent in the form of food cargoes, as was the case with Russia and Ireland, and as would have been the case with Korea, had her condition been such as to require aid. We are advised that the best way in which the Constantinople earthquake sufferers can be aided is by sending any moneys that may be contributed direct to the American Minister in Constantinople, he to superintend the distribution of the same, in conjunction with the Ottoman authorities. Every contribution, no matter how small, sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for this purpose, will be duly acknowledged in these columns, and such amounts will be promptly forwarded to U. S. Minister Terrell at Constantinople.

which recently laid the older portion of Constantinople in ruins. Until within a few days ago, the details of this calamity, in one of the oldest and greatest of European cities, were not known in this country, the cable accounts having been comparatively meagre. It is now known, however, that the extent of the earthquake was far greater than previously supposed, and that its disastrous effects have been such as to temporarily paralyze the Ottoman government in its efforts to extend relief to the victims.

It is impossible to draw too realistic a picture of the suffering that has been inflicted on thousands—Moslems and Christians alike—in the Turkish capital, and unless adequate relief be extended, the condition must soon become even worse than at present. In response to a cablegram of inquiry from the proprietor of this journal, the United States Minister in Constantinople has telegraphed as follows:

"CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York. Condition does warrant relief. All European Governments have contributed. The Sultan gave generously during Johnstown disaster and Christian America should reciprocate. TERRELL."

Reading for the first time the story of this series of tremendous natural convulsions, which laid thousands of dwellings in ruins, one is forcibly reminded of the vivid narratives of the ancient historians, describing the engulfment of Antioch, the swallowing up of the old Roman cities, Herculaneum and Pompeii, and the awful Lisbon disaster. Such calamities transcend the power of the pen to describe. No writer has thus far been able to do justice to the fearful scenes that took place in Constantinople in July 10th and 11th last, when four distinct shocks of earthquake were felt in every street, shaking and rocking the ancient city to its very foundation. Hundreds of houses in Stamboul and the suburbs were completely wrecked, especially in the older quarters of Uzuntecharchi and Yenidjani. The grand bazaar, well known and beloved of all European and American visitors to Constantinople, as the most wonderfully picturesque agglomeration of marts in the world, was almost totally ruined, and where formerly were piles of glistening fabrics, rich silks, laces, carpets and jewelry, all is now desolation and debris. Scores of shops were involved in the wreck, the swaying earth, like a very sea, toppling over every building that stood in the path of its waves.

But the saddest part of the picture lay not in the shattering of buildings and the ruin of merchandise, but in the loss of life and the tremendous amount of human misery that has been entailed on the survivors. In one quarter in the grand bazaar, 134 dead bodies were taken out of the ruins on the first day. In other parts of the city villages, that the relief measures are entirely inadequate, and there are no funds available for so great a crisis.

The Sultan, in order to allay the panic, forbade publication of the detailed accounts, but from other sources it is learned that the destruction of life and property has been in excess of the first hasty estimates. Admiral Woods Pasha, in a letter to the Lord Mayor of London, says: "There are many thousands of people sleeping out on the bare ground, their homes having been completely destroyed, and many of them lacking the necessities of life. Here at Constantinople the material loss and moral effects have been bad enough, but away across the Marmora, and up towards Angora the devastation is terrible. The town of Ada-Bazar is in ruins, and many villages between there and Ismid are level with the ground. Such is also the case with the outlying villages to the southward of Constantinople, and along the northern shore of the Marmora. The Sultan is doing all he possibly can in the way of providing tents and rations, but it is necessary that these efforts should be supplemented by all possible aid tion has been widespread, and the consequent destitution appalling. The factory at Djoubali was greatly damaged, and other houses collapsed, several people being killed. The earthquake was felt with especial severity at Princes Isle in the Sea of Marmora. At Prinkipo, the chief town, and a favorite resort of the citizens of Constantinople, the Greek Orthodox Church and a large number of elegant villas and country residences were destroyed or seriously damaged, including some houses belonging to British residents. Houses also fell in at Mizzi, where four people were killed. On the island of Halki nearly all of the houses have been rendered uninhabitable. A portion of the Great Ottoman Naval College also collapsed, six students being killed and several injured. On the island of Antigoni not a house was left intact. At Pera four houses fell in, and many were damaged, the number of victims being five. At Galata the death-roll amounted to ten, including several women and children. The houses and shops in this quarter suffered severely. At the village of St. Stefanos five women and a Greek family of six persons were

KOREA HEARD FROM.

AFTER considerable delay, occasioned, doubtless, by the interruption to cable service caused by the war, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a reply to its message to United States Minister Sill, our Government's representative in Korea. It is brief and to the point, being as follows:

"FUSAN, Korea.

By Post from Seoul.

"CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

"No famine prevails in Korea."

(Signed), SILL.

This is the first direct and authoritative news of the real condition of affairs in Korea that has reached this country, and is a complete contradiction of the famine rumors that were circulated through the Korean Legation in Washington several weeks ago. It furnishes ample justification for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S delay in entering upon any relief movement, until reliable intelligence could be received from Korea.

As announced in last week's issue, all contributions sent to this office for the purpose of extending aid to Korea will now be refunded to the senders, unless they expressly desire them to be devoted to other purposes of a like nature. We respectfully ask those contributors who sent their gifts anonymously to forward their names and addresses, with such other information as will enable us to identify and return their contributions.

WHEN TO STOP.

THERE is occasional discussion in the papers as to how long or short sermons and prayers ought to be. Some say a discourse ought to last thirty minutes, and others forty, and others an hour; and prayers should be three minutes long, or five, or fifteen. You might as well discuss how long a frock-coat ought to be, or how many ounces of food a man ought to eat. In the one case, everything depends upon the man's size; in the other, everything on the capacity of his stomach. A sermon or a prayer ought to go on as long as it is of any profit. If it is doing no good the sermon is half an hour too long though it take only thirty minutes. If the audience cough and fidget, or shuffle their feet, you had better stop praying. There is no excuse for a man's talking or praying too long if he have good eyesight and hearing. But suppose a man have his sermon written and before him. You say he must go through with it. Oh, no! Let him skip a few leaves. Better sacrifice three or four sheets of sermon paper than sacrifice the interest of your hearers.

But it is a silly thing for a man in a prayer-meeting or pulpit to stop merely because a certain number of minutes have expired, if attention be deepening: absurd as a hunter on track of a roebuck, and within two minutes of bringing down its antlers, stopping because his wife said that at six o'clock precisely, he must be home to supper. Keep on hunting for souls till your ammunition gives out. Still we must all admit that the danger is on the side of prolixity. The most interesting prayers we ever hear are by new converts, who say everything they have to say and break down in one minute. There are men who, from the way they begin their supplications, indicate a long siege. They first pray you into a good frame, and then they pray you out. They take literally what Paul meant to be figurative, "Pray without ceasing."

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

THERE are now in the United States nearly forty agricultural colleges. They are doing much for the science of farming. May all prosperity attend them! We think, however, that men seldom get to be practical farmers through such institutions. The students there have so delicate a time that they will not feel much like going out into the teeth of the northwest wind to sow winter grain, or drag logs through the snow with the thermometer five degrees below zero. We think that the most successful farmers are those who in boyhood rise at early daybreak, milk the cows and drive them out to pasture, eat a chunk of salt pork, and get off to the fields before city people have come to their last morning dream.

Many of the best farmers in the best farming regions of the world never heard of an agricultural college. The practical part of the science of agriculture must be dug up by two brawny hands out of the middle of a corn field. Those make the successful farmers who come in the regular line of succession. Their father tilled the soil, and their grandfather and their great grandfather, who went from the plough to Lexington and back again from Lexington to the plough. Many a man puts down his gilt-edged book on phosphate and subsoiling, puts on his gloves, takes a jack-knife, and goes out to trim his grape-vines, trimming them in the wrong place, and is under the delusion that he is a farmer. That does very well if you have inherited or first made your fortune, and have an income of twelve thousand dollars a year, and you can afford to lose six thousand of it annually in experimenting with cows and chickens and unheard-of rotation of crops. But if we wanted our boy to come out an agricultural success, we would put him when very young in the furrow and tell him to go ahead till he comes to the hay-stack, then turn round the hay-stack and go back to the furrow.

By all means, through agricultural colleges, keep up the science of farming; but let none suppose that you can keep your soft hands and untanned cheek and fastidious tastes, and yet be a successful tiller of the soil. You must learn to rough it.

CHRISTIANS IN POLITICS.

OUGHT Christian ministers and Christian people enter actively into a political campaign? This question is asked every day, and ought to be intelligently answered. As far as pastors of churches are concerned, I say let them do as they seemed called of God to do. If they think it is best for them to take the Republican or Democratic or Prohibition platform, they have full right so to do. When a man becomes an ordained minister of the Gospel he nowise surrenders his rights of citizenship. Some of the best ministers of religion in all denominations are discussing political principles in public halls before excited assemblages, and they ought not to be reprehended for so doing. When a candidate is received into the ministry the hands of ordination are put upon his head and not upon his mouth. Ministers of religion, if they wish to take the political field, have good precedent and clear back. Rev. Dr. Emmons of Massachusetts, spoke freely about Thomas Jefferson as a candidate for the Presidency and Rev. Dr. Mayhew declared what he thought of the repeal of the Stamp act. As for myself, while I have discussed the great questions of Christian patriotism and public welfare as much as any of my ministerial brethren, I have done so always in the pulpit and have never felt called to take the partisan platform. What I say on the great theme of public morality and national interest I prefer to say where no political party can either dictate or be held responsible.

But what position should a Christian layman take in a time when municipal, State, and national interests are under discussion? An active part in politics, it is his own good morals are sufficiently established to warrant it. Politics is a rough sea on which frail barkly had not better venture. With the best intent and the determination to reform politics I have known good men start out in an election campaign and at the close of two or three seasons of such work they were confirmed drunkards. A few years ago, a gentleman had a serious talk with me about the importance of effecting an improvement in city politics, and he started out in exalted missionary spirit to purify the caucus and the ballot box, but the last I heard of him was that he sat in a low restaurant after midnight too intoxicated to get home without help. So we have record of a missionary who went from this country to India to convert the Hindoos, but the Hindoos converted the missionary. If, however, your habits of integrity and sobriety are thoroughly fixed go out in the strength of God and help in the political contest. There are times when a man can as thoroughly serve God in a political meeting as in a prayer meeting. If we leave to the unprincipled demagogues to decide who shall rule, what will become of us?

OUR MAIL-BAG.

E. E. Ellis, Wilmington, Del. What is the meaning of 1 Cor. 15: 18? How can those who sleep in Christ perish?

They cannot; and that is precisely what Paul avers. He is proving the certainty of a resurrection and he shows that it must be so, otherwise those who sleep in Christ have perished, which is inconceivable. To illustrate: you might say the President was born in the United States; if he were not, the United States have had one President who was not born on the soil.

Subscriber, Vincennes, Ind. If, as we are told, flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, how will it be possible for us to know our friends in heaven?

The spiritual body may, and probably will, bear a sufficient resemblance to the natural body to permit of recognition. Christ after his resurrection was recognized by some who knew him, but not by all. It is probable, too, that the vision of the glorified man will be of a different order from that of the mortal body, so that the power of recognition may be increased. Spirit beholding spirit may be as quick to recognize a loved one as a mortal beholding another mortal.

G. B. Moody, Springtown, Tex. Did our Lord have any brothers and sisters?

The "people of his own country" said he had both (see Matthew 13: 54-56), and they gave the names of his brothers as James, Joseph, Simon and Judas. The Church of Rome, however, insisted from early times that Mary had no children beside Jesus Christ, and contended that the word translated brothers in this and other passages referred to the first cousins of Christ, who were the children of Mary's sister, who was the wife of Clopas. Scholars say that the word might mean cousins, but the first and common meaning is that of actual brothers.

Earnest Seeler. — Is it right for a converted person to join a church if his or her parents are opposed to it?

The question is one of duty to Christ or to parents. Christ required a public confession of him before men, and joining the church is the recognized mode of confession. The first duty of a converted person is to his Lord. Care should be taken not to make the disobedience to parents offensive. The young person should explain to his parents with respect the reasons for disobedience, and show by his conduct his desire to obey them in all things wherein his conscience does not require him to do otherwise.

New Subscriber, Harvard, Ill. 1. What is meant by dividing asunder the soul and spirit? Heb. 4: 12: are they not identical? 2. Is not 1 Cor. 9: 5, a proof that Paul was married?

1. The writer is speaking of the convincing and converting Word of God, which he represents as a sword coming closer to a man than anything else, dividing soul from spirit. There are several ways of explaining his meaning, but the most natural is that he regards the soul as the seat of the affections and emotions and the spirit as the seat of the conscience and the divine influence as far as it can be imparted to a man. The Word of God separates the two, setting them against each other so that the converted man finds there are many things he loved before which his spirit now forbids him to love. 2. We think not. The Apostle is there only claiming the right to have a wife if he chose. His expressed wish in 1 Cor. 7: 7, 8 seems conclusive on the question.

Subscriber, Saybrook, Ill. 1. Did King Solomon repent of his sins before his death? 2. Why did Paul say it was better to marry than to burn? (1 Cor. 7: 9.)

1. If Solomon ever repented there is no record of it in the Bible. It is most probable, however, that a man so wise as he would mourn over his fall and the evils of his life. There is no value in speculation on the subject where there is no basis. 2. The Apostle deprecated marriage in the conditions of persecution and insecurity existing at the time. But he still more deprecated unchastity. If a man could not remain unmarried without being vicious he had better marry.

Subscriber, Greenfield, O. If the Book of Enoch is apocryphical, as is generally believed, and Jude quotes from it as if it were genuine, does not that suggest doubts of Jude's own inspiration and imply that he was not kept from error?

Jude does not say that he quotes from the Book of Enoch. He says that Enoch made a certain prophecy. There is no evidence to show that Enoch did not make the prophecy, even if a book purporting to be his were proved not to have been his. Beside this, a man might quote from a book without endorsing the book, as Paul, in his sermon on Mars' Hill, quoted from Aratus, the Greek poet, but would not be understood as endorsing all the poems of Aratus.

J. H. R. Why was it necessary for Christ to come into the world? If men were being saved before he came, could they not have continued to be saved to the end of time?

The fact of Christ's coming and suffering and dying should preclude all thought of such a question. If God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, you may depend that there was supreme need for it. In Christ the types and sacrifices of the Jewish dispensation found their fulfilment as well as their culmination. Without him and his life and death they would have been empty meaningless forms. Beside all this Christ came to reveal the Father to the world. If all that we owe to Christ and his Gospel to-day were eliminated from the world, the gloom and poverty and hopelessness of life would be appalling.

G. Conant, Osceola, Mo. 1. What is the general belief as regards the heathen who never heard of Christ? 2. Will the millions of people who died before Christ be judged according to the Old or the New Testament?

1. It is folly to dogmatize as to the future state of the heathen. It is our duty to carry the Gospel to them. Those who died without hearing of Christ will be judged by a God who is merciful as well as just. All that we can know on the subject is what our Lord himself said (Luke 12: 48). "He that knew not and did commit things worthy of stripes shall be beaten with few stripes." 2. The same verse shows that people will be judged according to the light they had. In Hebrew 11 you will find that under the Old Testament, as under the New, the cardinal question is whether a man exercised faith and lived up to it.

J. G. Beringer, Pa. Is a man justified in believing that he is converted and that he may start in to work for Christ, if he has never been to a mourners' bench nor prayed until he felt a change and shouted as others do?

We cannot tell if such a man is justified in believing himself to be converted unless we knew what ground he has for the belief. He need not doubt the genuineness of his conversion on account of the absence of the experiences mentioned. The mourners' bench has been the way by which thousands have come to Christ, but other thousands have come in other ways. Nor is the ecstatic shout that is the natural expression of joy with others, essential. If a man repents of his sins and believes in Christ, and accepts him as his Saviour and his Lord, he will be saved. He is not saved by his tears, or his ecstasy, or his shouting, but by Christ, who has promised to save all who put their trust in him.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

AN IMPERIAL WEDDING.

THE Russian capital has recently been the scene of a magnificent marriage celebration. The Czar's eldest daughter, Xenia Alexandrovna, was the bride, and the Grand Duke Alexander Michaelovitch, was the bridegroom. The portrait of the imperial bride appears on this page. Although there is only nine years difference between their ages, they belong to different generations. Both are descended from the Emperor Nicholas, the bridegroom being his grandson and the bride his great-granddaughter. The ceremony attracted a large number of imperial and royal personages. The bride is related through her mother, the Czarina, to the royal families of Denmark, England, and Greece, all of which were numerously represented on this occasion. The Czar gave orders that the ceremony should be of the most magnificent character and no expense was spared in giving effect to his command. It was followed by a banquet to the distinguished guests, which was on the same lavish scale. The court chronicler records with evident pride as a specimen of the expenditure, that the cost of bringing the fish from Volga and Caspian fisheries to the wedding table was three thousand gold roubles, which is equivalent to two thousand dollars. Concerts and illuminations concluded the festivities of a day that will not soon be forgotten in St. Petersburg. The part of ordinary citizens in such a celebration is of necessity that of spectators only, but a day is coming, which is described by the prophets under the figure of a marriage, when the lowliest of the subjects of the Great King, if he has been loyal and faithful to his trust will be welcomed, and will sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb. (Luke 13: 29, 30.)

A Druggist's Weapon.

A novel weapon was used by a druggist in Brooklyn, N. Y., last week in a struggle with burglars. He sleeps at the rear of his store in a room which he uses as a laboratory as well as a bed-room. He was awakened one night by a noise at the door of his store, and thinking that someone wanted a prescription prepared, he rose and went into the store. There he saw a man climbing in through the transom. A second man came in by the same way. Knowing that he would have little chance unarmed in an unequal struggle with two desperate men, he went into the laboratory to look for a weapon. A bottle of ammonia stood on the table and he poured some of it into a glass and returned to the store. The burglars were searching for the money drawer, and one of them came behind the counter where the druggist was standing. Before he had time to strike, or draw a pistol, the druggist flung the ammonia in his face and the burglar dropped like a log. Almost suffocated and blinded, he struggled to his feet and made for the door. He could not open it, but he broke the glass and jumped through. His companion followed him, but not before the druggist had flung a glassful of the ammonia on the back of his neck. He gave a yell of pain as he ran, which was heard by a policeman, who succeeded in arresting one of the pair. The druggist was very pleased with the result of his encounter, and said if he had to face an antagonist he would rather have a glass of ammonia in his hand than a pistol or a club. Probably no one but a druggist would have thought of such a weapon; but, like David, in the Bible story of the fight with the big Goliath, he overcame with the weapon with which he was familiar. The incident suggests a lesson for those who think what great things they could do in the conflict between good and evil if they had only wealth, or genius. They may do more effective service with the powers they have than with those they covet. (1 Cor. 12: 7-11.)

Wasted Work.

Two gangs of workmen were watched by a curious crowd as they toiled in Columbus avenue, New York, a few days ago. One gang was undoing the work that the other gang was doing. For some weeks past, a car-company has had contractors at work laying tracks and a trench for a cable to run in. The car-company is under contract to pave the avenue with granite blocks after its tracks are laid. It was about to do so, when a gas company asked to have the work delayed. They had received permission to lay a main alongside the tracks and wished to do so before the new pavement was put down. The car-company, however, refused to comply with the request and went on laying the stones. They levelled them accurately and sanded them afterward. The gas-company's men were soon on the scene, but could not dig the trench for their main until they had taken up the stones just laid. They went to work with their crowbars and took up the stones and piled them on the sidewalk, where they were before. The two gangs were only a few yards apart and the stones were taken up before they had been down half-an-hour. They worked in this way for two days, and at the end the avenue was in the same condition as when they began. The men received wages for their work, which was the only satisfactory feature of the affair. The antagonism and lack of co-operation is deplorable and it extends through much of the world's work. Unhappily, too, the spirit often manifests itself in the work of the Church. In aggressive effort in the domestic and foreign mission fields the workers are frequently seen antagonizing each other's work, rather than co-operating with each other and economizing resources for the advancement of the common cause. As it was in the days of the great apostle, many preach Christ even of envy and strife and some of good will. The one of contention but the other of love. (Phil. 1: 15, 16.)

Captors and Prisoner Entombed.

A party of fishermen in Clay County, West Virginia, made a startling discovery recently. Two of the party wandered from the camp in which they have been spending their summer vacation, on Big Sycamore Creek, and climbed over the cliff about two miles away to a flat ledge far below. They noticed that the front of the cliff was crumbling away and that apparently for many years past great masses of earth had fallen from it. Some had rested on the ledge for a time and then had rolled over into the ravine below. There was a large hole in the side of the cliff and the two men looked in. They were surprised to see an old army musket lying within. It was covered with rust as if it had been there a long time. They penetrated farther and found themselves in a cave twenty feet in diameter and twelve feet high. On the shingle floor of the cave were three heaps of clothing. Looking closely at them, the men were horrified to find that they were the remains of three soldiers. They were only skeletons and their uniforms were rotted away. The brass buttons, however, showed that two were Confederate and one a Union soldier. It is conjectured that the two Southerners had captured a Northern soldier and were conveying him to camp when they took shelter in the cave, perhaps for the night, or only from a storm, but were shut in by one of the landslides and captors and prisoner all perished. It made little difference in their sad situation which was prisoner as one fate overtook them all. So will it be at the last with all classes. Now there is a great deal of pride and prejudice and we make much of social distinctions but in that day all barriers will be swept away and all will stand on the same plane before God to be judged according to the deeds done in the body. (1. Peter 1: 17.)

The Escape of a Train.

A trainload of passengers had a narrow escape from death on August 30, in passing over a bridge which spans the Bronx River. The train left the Grand Central Station, New York, at its usual hour and had reached White Plains where the track crosses an iron bridge which was built twenty years ago over the Bronx, to replace a wooden bridge which had been burned. As the engineer reached the centre of the bridge he heard a crash and felt the track sinking beneath him. He looked back and saw the train undulating like a boat on a stormy sea. The speed was about fifty miles an hour, but the engineer threw open the throttle and put the locomotive at its highest rate. He held his breath in suspense for a few moments, but to his intense relief saw the last car pass safely over the bridge on to the firm ground. Then he slowed up and sent a man back to ascertain what had occurred. It was found that two of the great iron girders had worn loose and had fallen into the river. The bridge was tottering to its fall and the train had been saved only by the spurt the engineer made when he realized the danger. It is much to be wished that people who find themselves in a place where there is spiritual danger would always make similar haste to leave it. Too often they linger under the spell of fascination until they lose their souls. (Prov. 6: 5.)

A Hap-Hazard Destination.

A hard-working business man in New York took unusual chances in spending his vacation this year. The opportunity for leaving his work for a month occurred unexpectedly and he had formed no plans for using it. He was indifferent, too, and cared only to get a change of scene and a complete rest. On consulting his wife he found that she, too, had no preference. They drove to the Grand Central Depot with their plans still unformed and as they stood in the ticket-office were undecided whether they should go to the seashore or the mountains. Finally, the man went to the window and, looking over the racks in which the tickets are kept, pointed to one compartment and asked for two of the tickets in it. The clerk handed them to him, received the money for them and told him when the train would start. On coming away from the window, his wife asked him if he knew now where they were going. He looked at the ticket and told her the name of the town but neither of them had ever heard of it, or knew where it was. They boarded the train in the same state of ignorance and did not seek enlightenment. On his return to New York, the man said they had spent a delightful month. Their tickets were for a quaint little town in Canada, far away from the beaten tracks of summer excursionists, where they stayed at a pretty little hotel and found a simple, plain, but interesting lot of people. They had been very kindly treated and had thoroughly enjoyed their stay. Not many would have been content to go even for a month to a place they knew nothing of and it may be supposed that they would not have been willing to do so if their sojourn had been for years instead of a month. Yet how many there are who know that they have an eternity to spend somewhere, who live as if they were indifferent whether they spent it in scenes of bliss or misery! (Deut. 32: 29.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Collections in England on Hospital Sunday amounted to $209,000.

Evangelists Holland and Davis are conducting very successful revival services at Fall River, Mass.

A Church has been built at Leith, Scotland, in memory of the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon. His son, Rev. Charles Spurgeon will officiate at the dedication.

The First Congregational Church of Middleboro, Mass., celebrated its two hundredth anniversary on Aug. 26. One of its pastorates—that of Dr. Israel Putnam was of thirty years duration.

"The Presbyterian," London, Reports that in New Zealand, owing to the adoption of female franchise, the very existence of the liquor trade is being threatened in that colony.

Miss Frances Willard announces that owing to the financial distress in the country she returns to the National Women's Christian Temperance Union her last two years' salary, which she received as president of that organization.

A New York Newspaper recently published an article purporting to be by Col. Ingersoll defending the commission of suicide. Copies of the article have been found in the possession of seven persons who have killed themselves since its publication.

The Salvation Army has undertaken to act as disbursing agent for the people in Chicago who wish to devote money for the relief of the suffering people at Pullman. The Army has opened a receiving station at 538 West Madison street, Chicago.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church reports 184,138 communicants. The additions to membership were 16,818. The number of congregations is 2,881; of ministers, 1,708, and of presbyteries 126. Besides the ministers, there are 266 licentiates and 259 candidates.

Mr. W. Dean Howells' New Book, "A Traveler from Altruria," is having an enormous sale. Mr. Laurence Hutton in reviewing it remarks that there really is an Altruria and One came from thence nineteen centuries ago to tell the world of it but he was scoffed at and crucified.

Russia is reported to have ceased banishing the Stundists to the Caucasus. The earnest and devoted men have been making converts to the faith in their places of banishment so fast that there are now large number of Stundists there, where there were none until the exiles were sent there. There are now over 300,000 Stundists in Southern Russia.

A Correspondent of the Chicago "Interior" says that the Romanists in Japan have a special dispensation from the Pope, allowing them to hold half of the Sabbath day and attend to their religious services the other half. But in spite of these concessions, Romanism does not receive the favor given to Protestantism.

Baron Hirsch has sent some three or four thousand Russian Jews to the Argentine Republic, and he hopes to have a Jewish community there of 100,000 within ten years. He sends them out in companies of fifty families, each provided with a rabbi and a doctor, and he expects them to settle in villages, giving a special tract for each company.

The New York Bible Society, Auxiliary to the American Bible Society, is making an effort to supply a copy of the Bible to every scholar, who can profitably use one, in this city. As the cost will be greater than the income of the Society can meet, a fund is being raised in the schools and churches and by the King's Daughters and private collectors.

An interesting ceremony took place recently at Walhalla, N. D. It was the removal of the remains of Benjamin Terry to the new Protestant Cemetery. Terry was a young Protestant Missionary who was murdered in 1852 by the Sioux, to whom he went to preach the Gospel. There being no Protestant Cemetery at that time, he was interred in the Roman Catholic burial ground in a corner set apart for "suicides, heretics and unbaptized infants."

A Series of Meetings for the Deepening of spiritual life will be held in Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, Oct. 9-12. The following pastors are expected among others to take part: Dr. K. S. MacArthur, Dr. A. T. Pierson, Dr. Harsha, Dr. L. W. Marshall, Dr. Gregg, Rev. George C. Needham and Major Whittle. All particulars may be obtained by addressing the pastor of the church, Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., 424 Clermont avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dr. George Dana Boardman Made an Earnest appeal for Christian Unity at a recent meeting of the Institute of Christian Philosophy. He proposed as a basis for a union church, the Bible as supreme, a simple creed, baptism as a mode of admission, a Presbyterian form of government, and historical Episcopal headship, a Methodist discipline, a liturgy blending the stateliness of ancient with the appositeness of modern adjustments communion with Christ the term of communion with all Christians, and a voluntary system of financial support.

The Dead Sea.

Our Traveler Visits its Lonely Shores—
A Glimpse of Mount Nebo—Reflections
Concerning Sodom and Gomorrah.

WITH hospitable tact, the head of our commissary department has fresh tea made, and our easiest chairs are paraded for the visitors. It chimes in with our present opinion of the ex-college-president that he rejects sugar and cream, and gulps the boiling-hot liquid without winking. Setting the cup down with unnecessary stress, he summons David.

"Now, I dare say you have been telling these 'Innocents Abroad'—in grimmest pleasantry—that the contemptible 'run' of rain-water up there is the Brook Cherith, where Elijah was fed twice a day by the ravens?"

David's inclination of the head and slight smile are the soul of the Oriental's respectful forbearance.

"And being a latter-day dragoman, you have thought it incumbent upon you to hint at doubts of the ravens themselves? Some traveled tool—the most obnoxious species of fool extant—probably a professor of theology—has rattled off a lot of stuff about the same word meaning 'ravens' and 'Arabs' or, as others have it—'merchants,' or still others—'Orbites'—the inhabitants of the neighboring city of Orb. Each and all of these efforts to explain away the miracle plainly recorded in the inspired Word is an insult to the Book and to the learning of those who translated it into the vulgar tongue."

"I am not a scholar, Dr. Sharpe," David begins deprecatingly.

Aldices has got hold of an idea.

"If the word translated 'ravens' can be made to mean any one of the three other things you have mentioned, why not give Elijah the benefit of the doubt, and relieve his memory from the obloquy of eating tainted flesh? Anybody who knows the raven's habits and taste must prefer this reading. And"—warming with the theme—"what more likely than that the Bedouins would have protected and fed the fugitive who threw himself upon their hospitality? They would do it to-day, wouldn't they, David?"

"Without a doubt, Captain."

"The question, young gentleman, is not what you, or I, or anybody else would prefer—"

"Now, doctor, dear, why will you dispute with everybody?" Mrs. Sharpe slips in, plaintively. "I declare you quite spoil the pleasure I had anticipated in going through dear, dear old Palestine in company with a learned man. It is so much sweeter and more Christian to believe what the Church and the dragomen, who were born here and have lived here all their lives, tell us, than to be forever in the seat of the scornful, as one might say. As for Cherith—doesn't the Bible say expressly that it dried up, after awhile, and what more likely than when the summer weather came on—and, as you have remarked," turning to Aldices—"the idea of tainted meat isn't pleasant to a person."

Her spouse jumps up and strides away to his horse, calling harshly to the dragoman that the sun is down and they ought to be off. Mrs. Sharpe finishes the tea she has had qualified with "two lumps, a good deal of cream, and a dash of hot water—if you please!" before rising to follow.

"The blessed man is a saint at heart, but a little impatient of contradiction," she murmurs softly with her "good night."

We renew our laugh over the interview after dinner, when a company of friends from the hotel below walk over the intervening half-mile to pass the evening with us. There are two clergymen among the guests and both have fled for their lives, have dared to lean toward what we call "the Bedouin theory."

We are thankful nothing was said to the critic of Nebo or Pishgah in looking by the light of a late moon toward the solemn height across the river. Already we have learned to seek out that point of the landscape, and dream, in gazing upon it, of the solitary man who climbed it to see "sweet fields beyond the swelling flood," before dying there alone. Then

The angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the sleeper there.

"But no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day."

The march over the plains is begun sometimes on the morrow. It leads, shortly after quitting the camp, right through a Mos-plain where the recent rains have settled in bluish mud. The horses keep upon drier ground, David and the sheik dashing away for horseback practice upon a stretch of short, scant grass. Both are well mounted and the racing, the sudden turnings and wheelings, the bounds and curvettings of the blooded animals are interesting to watch. My muleteers are ankle-deep in the sticky mire, drawing their feet out with a sucking sound. The subaltern has taken off his red slippers (it is always a puzzle to me how he ever keeps them on, for they are turned in under the heel and held in place by the toes only) and carries them in his hand till I suggest that he put them into the "boot" of the palanquin.

The sun shines hotly overhead by the time we get an unobstructed view of the Dead Sea. A blue haze hangs above it and veils the encompassing range of mountains; ineffable lights play over hills and sea; the water gives back the sunshine from dimpling waves. All the storied desolateness of the scene is to be found upon the land. The horses kick up salt as they walk, and about the hoof-prints in the sands are borders like hoar-frost—salt, so acrid to the tongue, that I marvel at the mules' disposition to snatch mouthfuls of it.

Hereabouts archæologists incline to locate Sodom and Gomorrah, and not in the bed of the salt sea.

Another shock to early belief and dreams!

were at the basin of the Jordan lying at the upper, or northern end of the sea. The southern border is sharply precipitous and a line of mountains would have hidden from Abraham in Hebron, "the smoke of the country that went up like the smoke of a furnace," had this "country" occupied the present bed of the Dead Sea. Excavations in the mounds near the Jordan are constantly unearthing the rubbish of buried towns, and the subsoil of the waste lands over which we are riding is saturated with bituminous ooze. "The vale of Siddim was full of sin-pits"—i.e., say erudite authorities, liquid bitumen, such as was used for mortar in the tower of Babel, and by Semiramis in building Babylon. The doomed cities came to their ruin by brimstone and fire from the Lord. The whole region would burn like tinder if once ignited. The agency of water in the terrible work does not appear in the sacred record.

"DEAD SEA APPLES"

(From a Photograph by Marion Harland.)

"I am afraid we must give it up," concludes my fellow-student, ruefully. "But should we encounter Dr. Sharpe here—(which may the fates foretell!) we will not admit our discomfiture to him. He is quite capable of discounting the whole story, Bible or no Bible."

Two large boats are beached upon the shelving shingle, lapped by the sparkling waves. The government has a monopoly of the bitumen that floats upon the surface of the Dead Sea, and the boats are here to collect it. A piece weighing fourteen tons arose to the top of the water last week, and smaller fragments are found in abundance, especially after a storm of wind. To the government alone belongs all the salt brought into and sold in Syria. The driftwood along the shore of this sea is thickly encrusted with it, and the peasants of the region come by stealth to scrape it off for family use. When detected in the act, they are arrested and punished as thieves.

Of course, Alcides must take the regulation bath in the saline waves, so buoyant that, as he reports afterward, it is impossible to sink oneself without great effort, and then the body bounds back to the surface like a rubber ball. While he is absent with an attendant, I pace the wet shingle, as hard as a floor, and find mood and scene wondrously tranquil—not at all what might be expected with the Dead Sea washing the tips of my boots, and the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah vivid in my mind. Far away toward the southern extremity of the shining sheet, which is likewise known as "Lake Asphaltum," once stood Machias, in whose dungeons John the Baptist was murdered, and nearer to us "little Zoar," spared that Lot might take refuge there. The latter place is yet more to me because it was the boundary of the sweep of the undimmed eye of the prophet, nigh unto death, and yet in the full vigor of manly perfection.

My eyes return, and lingeringly, to "Nebo's lonely mountain," sublime in noon-tide serenity, still the warder of the plain and sea. All the beauty of the "city of palm-trees" and the "glory" (not the "swellings") of Jordan, could not have hindered a compassionate thought from crossing the seer's mind as he beheld from afar the region he had so lately described as "the land of brimstone, and salt, and burning, that is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein—Sodom and Gomorrah and Admah and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath."

lem burial-ground. Six men are hollowing a shallow grave in the sand; about a stone's cast away, the corpse that is to fill it, wrapped in coarse matting, is laid in the shadow of a thorn-tree; a group of women wail and sob intermittently about it; the intermission is devoted to cheerful chat, probably to gossip.

"It was an old man, or they would not be laughing and talking between their crying-fits," says David, in riding by. "If he were young, they would mourn loud and long."

Chalk hills bound the tedious level in the direction from which we have come; the purple mountains of Moab are upon the left; all about us are spread sand-dunes and clumps of scrub-growth; thorn bushes—the "Spina Christi" or "Christ-thorn," with wild willows and now and then a bunch of pinkish flowers growing from a tall succulent stem, with fleshy leaves and a shrub resembling the larch, but with more feathery foliage, that bears brownish-red berries. In an hour the land dips to a lower

Never more can I repeat the weird lines conned with delightful shivers in my girlhood:

The wind blows chill across the gloomy waves
How unlike the green and dancing main!
The surge is foul as if it rolled o'er graves—
Stranger! here lie the cities of the plain.

Another myth goes down before scientific investigation. The waves are not gloomy, much less foul, and the tradition that the cities of the plain lie underneath is—traditional! Loath to admit all this, we have fled to the history and the testimony concerning the destruction of the guilty towns, and are confounded that the main narrative and confirmative passages to which the margin refers us, do not so much as intimate the engulfment by the Dead Sea of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim. Again and again, we read, that they were "overthrown by the Lord in his wrath," but the incoming of the bitter waters has no part in the tragedy. Furthermore—the "cities of the plain" would show that they Revival Echoes.

Mr. C. N. Crittenton, Founder of the Florence Mission, Writes of a Year of Spiritual Work in the West.

GRASS VALLEY, CALA., Aug. 16, 1894.

DEAR Brother Klopsch: After seeing you last fall, I visited England for about two months, returned again to our own country and attended the Christian Workers' Convention at Atlanta, Ga., where we have a Florence Home, which is doing a blessed work for the Master, and our precious girls are saved from evils of sin and degradation. I return to New York to the mother Florence Mission where, as you know, there is a perpetual revival the year around.

On November 30, I commenced revival meetings in Adams, N. Y., from there to Dansville, N. Y., thence to Woodville and Henderson, all these places being in my native county of Jefferson, and where over six hundred started heavenward. I then went to Niantic, Conn., into the Baptist Church, the pastor there being a convert of our New York Florence Mission. Brother Carpenter of Jersey City, N. J., was with me in all these meetings. On February 20 I left New York for Elko, Nevada, and had meetings in Elko, Reno and Canon City. I then went to Virginia City, where there has been $425,000,000 taken out of the ground of gold and silver (mostly the latter).

We had a blessed meeting there, several good Presbyterian ladies, who did not believe in revivals, attended regularly, were sanctified wholly and since that time have been workers for God. All glory to Jesus! About one hundred started in the good way. I then left Nevada for California, where I have been for four years in evangelistic work, with the exception of the time mentioned above.

On Sunday, April 22, we commenced meetings in Santa Rosa, Cala. (City of Roses), a two weeks' series. At the close of these services, when all the evangelical churches were in union, old residents stated they never saw the city so stirred by the power of God. Then I went to Willits with my brother and Sister Tuttle. It is a small country village. God blessed his own Word and many were converted. Loads of people came twenty-five miles to listen to the plain, simple Gospel. From Willits to San Francisco, where we open a ten days' union meeting in Grace M.E. Church. The Congregational, Presbyterian and Baptist Churches uniting, and the God of Elijah was with us and some very remarkable conversions, believers being quickened and sanctified. June 1 to June 10 inclusive, we had camp-meetings at Beulah Park, Oakland. Rev. John A. Wood presided, and Rev. T. P. Brasee the "tornado preacher" of Los Angeles, assisted. The last night there was a scene long to be remembered, sobs, tears, groans and shouts of victory, closing by singing, "We're Marching to Zion."

The following Wednesday night we commenced a two weeks' meeting in Watsonville—truly a time of refreshing and soul-saving among all classes from the Mayor of the city, down to the children. Then on to a small village, Centreville, to help our friend and brother, Rev. F. H. Robinson. Many were converted and God's children were wonderfully served, so that all worldliness was laid aside and resolutions made to "Love God with all their hearts."

From Centreville to San Jose, to hold the fourth anniversary of the Florence Mission. On July 21st we went to Elm Grove Camp-meeting, among the Redwoods, where Rev. G. S. Montgomery and his blessed little wife, sister Carrie Judd Montgomery, presided, and where a large number of God's saints were assembled and were fed from his precious Word. We commenced a two weeks' series of meetings here, in this beautiful mining city of Grass Valley, on Sunday, August 5. The interest has steadily increased, until the whole city and surrounding country are being wonderfully stirred. Yesterday we had an "all-day meeting," and at different hours Rev. J. A. Macanby, Rev. R. Garver, and Rev. O. B. Smith, preached. A large street meeting was held at 7 p.m., and at 7.30 p.m. the regular Evangelistic service. There was a real old-fashioned pentecostal shower of blessing.

Yours in the Work.

ALL IN CHRIST.

AS I go on the road of life,
Still toiling upward day by day,
I need a staff on which to lean.
To help my steps along the way,
Christ is my staff.

Sometimes my feet no resting find, [sand," Beneath the ground seems "sinking
I ask the Lord to guide my steps,
I seek and find safe place to stand,
On Christ my rock.

Night has come down, I lose my way,
Dense clouds have veiled the starry sky,
When lo! a pure sweet Light hath shined,
And in its beams the shadows fly,
Christ is my light.

With earnest work the day is filled,
So much is needed in earth's strife,
I toil till spent, the flesh is weak,
I hunger for the Bread of Life,
Christ is that bread.

He's all things for me, wisdom, love,
But deepest is this wondrous word,
Feed on him, live upon his life,
And walk with him, the Master, Lord,
Christ is my life.

Oh, blessed Master, longing faint,
Let me lean close upon thy breast,
Draw me into thy heart of love,
And let my soul find peace and rest,
Christ is my all.

Berlin, Mass. —PHOEBE A. HOLDER.

COMFORT ONE ANOTHER.

COMFORT one another,
For the way is growing dreary,
The feet are often weary,
And the heart is very sad.
There is heaven burden-bearing,
When it seems that none are caring,
And we half forget that ever we were glad.

Comfort one another;
Let the grave-gloom lie behind you,
While the Spirit's words remind you
Of the home beyond the tomb—
Where no more is pain or parting,
Fever's flush or tear-drop starting,
But the presence of the Lord, and for all his people room.

Comfort one another
With the hand-clasp close and tender,
With the sweetness love can render,
And the looks of friendly eyes.
Do not wait with grace unspoken,
While life's daily bread is broken—
Gentle speech is oft like manna from the skies.

Comfort one another
By the hope of him who sought us
In our peril—him who bought us,
Paying with his precious blood:
By the faith that will not alter,
Trusting strength that shall not falter,
Leaning on the One divinely good.

THE BODY'S POWER ON THE SOUL.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Sept. 23. Daniel 1: 8-20.

VERY close is the connection between soul and body. So close is it that some materialistic philosophers have denied the existence of the soul altogether, and have contended that the brain and nerves constitute the thinking and the emotional part of the human being. In a Christian Endeavor Society there is no need to go over the arguments for the existence of the soul. The Topic assumes its existence, while recognizing its sensitiveness to physical influences. It is the ethereal, impalpable, invisible tenant of the body, and, like everything in nature, is affected by its environment. The story is told of a clergyman, that, having moved into a new house, he became nervous, irritable and incapable of study. His medical adviser, after trying the usual remedies, ordered change of air and scene. The patient speedily recovered, but on returning home was again seized with his former malady. Finally it occurred to the physician to examine the rooms in which he studied and slept. He found that the delicate, pretty paper on the walls reeked with poison, which it exhaled whenever the temperature of the rooms was raised. It was this poison which robbed the clergyman of his health and vigor. Both were restored when a new and harmless paper was substituted for the poisonous one. In like manner does the soul suffer by dwelling in a body reeking with foul appetites and lusts. Indulgence in eating to excess or in drinking in toxicants, affects thought and disposition as every one knows who has tried the experiment. Indulgence of the physical nature produces weakness of the mental and spiritual nature and there are many forms of bodily disease which induce mental suffering. More than this, the body may be so pampered and indulged that it becomes strong enough to bring the soul into subjection and to debase and pollute it. Composite human nature may thus fall into a condition of anarchy and that part which was intended to rule becomes the slave of the other part, which was intended for service. Not a few of the temptations which rack the soul and are called spiritual conflicts, have a physical origin and can be removed by physical remedies. Even a change of diet may relieve the pressure of temptation and lead the way to spiritual victory. The apostle Paul declared that he had found it necessary to bring under his body and keep it in subjection, lest even he should fall and become a castaway. He realized, as many have done since his day, that the soul is liable to attack through the body and may suffer irreparable injury through the privacies of its fleshly tabernacle. By precept and example he inculcated perpetual vigilance and he who would rise from the brute to the human and the divine can succeed in no other way.

THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN INDIA.

An interesting celebration took place in the Deccan District of India just before the last mail left. It was the first anniversary of the Epworth League of Chadarghat. The League, it appears, has had seventy active and thirteen associate members registered during the year. The Blue Ribbon Gospel Temperance Union which had been in useful existence there since October, 1889, has been placed under the immediate charge of the department of mercy and help which has carried on its work by public meetings and private effort. This department is active also in looking after the rich and poor and in tract distribution. At the anniversary meeting the President of the League, Rev. G. K. Gilder, had requested each member to bring a curiosity, relic or other object of interest and give a five minutes' descriptive talk. A table was covered with a small museum and twelve members gave interesting descriptions. Among the objects were cinchona bark, agates from the Godaver, an old coin, a locust from the Red Sea, a tailor bird's nest, a foot warmer from Italy, a bow and arrow and an axe from Bastar, etc. Those present entered into the spirit of the occasion and made the meeting a varied and delightful time. It was stated that the weekly Bible classes and devotional meetings were well attended, and the League is doing a very active and useful work at the station.

PENNSYLVANIA C. E. CONVENTION.

Nearly fifty thousand Pennsylvania young people are looking with interest towards the great Christian Endeavor Convention to be held at York, Pa., October 17th to 19th. Three thousand delegates are expected, and elaborate preparations are being made for their reception.

The Auditorium, in which the convention will be held, a picture of which appears on this page, is an ideal building for the purpose. It is a brick structure located within two blocks of the centre of the city, and is readily reached by all street car lines. The acoustic properties can hardly be excelled; a low tone of voice can be heard distinctly in any part of the building. The facilities for lighting are all that can be desired; many windows admit the sunlight by day, and electric lights will be used at night. The ventilation is excellent and there are seven entrances and exits, so that the building can be quickly filled and emptied of the 4,500 people which it will comfortably seat.

Overflow meetings will be provided for in neighboring churches; a sub-Post and Telegraph office will be established in a side room within the Auditorium, for the convenience of delegates.

A most attractive programme has been arranged. Rev. J. A. Rondthaler, D. D., of Indiana; Mr. S. L. Mershon of Chicago; Rev. J. F. Cowan and many other noted speakers will address the meetings. A choir of three hundred voices under the direction of Prot. Lowe of Philadelphia, and Prof. Rice of York will lead the singing.

Among the features of the convention will be a parade of the Juniors on Friday afternoon, and five simultaneous meetings on the same afternoon. Sunrise prayer-meetings in four churches every morning, and a series of Evangelistic meetings conducted by a band of Endeavorers in the mills and factories of York each day at noon.

This Entertainment and Hotel Committees are making thorough preparations for the entertainment of the delegates. Accommodations will be provided in boarding houses and in private families, at a rate not exceeding $1.50 per day. The Entertainment Committee expects to send out scouts to meet the incoming delegates, who will be recognized by the white yachting cap.

This will be the eighth annual Convention of the Pennsylvania State Christian Endeavor Union. The organization was formed at Easton on December 15, 1887. The State Convention at York are in every respect as complete as the Convention at Cleveland."

The object of the Convention is for the general good of the work, and also for the yearly election of officers and such other business as may seem necessary to the advancement of the cause.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Sioux City, Ia., is celebrating the extinction of the debt on its new building.

A King's Daughters' Circle in San Francisco is composed of eight Chinese women, two Japanese, two Syrians, and their two American teachers.

India has now 72 Christian Endeavor Societies, Japan, 59; the West Indies, 44; Turkey, 38; China, 23; and Madagascar, 30. In missionary lands there are in all 2,740 societies.

The great Auditorium at Round Lake, N. Y., was occupied on August 21st with a summer convention of the Baptist Young People's Union. The meetings were enthusiastic and very largely attended.

A Christian Endeavor Society at Paola, Kan., has added a seat to those in the City Park, and keeps upon it a notice of the time and place of its meetings. There is also attached to it a receptacle for newspapers and periodicals which the Society distributes in the hospitals.

There are now thirty-eight Christian Endeavor Societies in China with an aggregate membership of 1,000. At the recent national Convention one hundred delegates were present and the sessions continued three days. One of the delegates was Mr. Ling, of Foochoo, who signed the Christian Endeavor pledge nine years ago.

The Baptist Young People's Society of Westminster, Mass., on receiving the news that its delegates to the Toronto Convention had given a pledge on behalf of the Society to the Founding Fund, not only ratified the action of the delegates, but doubled the amount promised, and added thereto another $25 contributed by the young people in the Sunday School.

The Epworth Leagues of New Jersey have decided to hold a great State Convention at Elizabeth, N. J. The date has been fixed for May 21-23, 1895, in order to give time for extensive and thorough preparation.

A young local preacher organized an Epworth League not long ago at Snokomo, Kans., where there was no Methodist church. The League prospered and did aggressive work, there has been a revival and a Methodist church is now established there.

The Founding Fund of the Baptist Union amounts according to the latest published report to $21,102.61, of which $1,400.55 was given at the Toronto Convention. Illinois has given $10,065.82, which is more than one-half of the whole sum subscribed. Pledges and conditional pledges to the amount of $6,719 have also been given.

An emphatic expression of opinion on a question now agitating many Baptist Christian Endeavor Societies, is contained in an editorial in a recent issue of "The Examiner," the leading Baptist journal. The writer says: "Our own opinion is now, as it has always been, that the ideal organization of Baptist young people is a local society of Christian Endeavor, affiliated with association, State and national organizations of B. Y. P. U. When a local society of Christian Endeavor reorganizes, it loses much and gains nothing."

The Convention City, York, has a very strong Endeavor Union, with twenty-one Senior and ten Junior Societies, and a membership of sixteen hundred. The President is Rev. Chas. A. Oliver.

The York County Union is presided over by the Rev. D. M. Metzger, of Wrightsville. There are sixty Senior and fifteen Junior Societies in the county, with a membership of about four thousand.

The Convention Committee, appointed by the York City Union, is General Chairman, Otis L. Jacobs; Secretary and Chairman of Hotel Committee, J. Webber Yeats; Finance, Henry Small; Music, Prof. E. A. Rise; Halls, Reinhardt Dempwolf; Usher, F. W. Porter; Social, E. E. Curtis; Press, William T. Ellis; Reception, Dr. J. F. Klinedinst and Miss Mary Anstadt.

President Charles Roads said recently: "The preparations and arrangements for the Home Life in New Mexico.

The Mysterious Pueblo Indians and their Adobe Villages—Houses and Customs Unchanged during Centuries.

ALTHOUGH the law of change seems to be resistless and universal in our own rapidly-moving and progressive land, there are places almost at our very doors, where life goes on pretty much as it did in the days before Columbus set foot on American soil or Cortes and Coronado made their brilliant conquests in the southern half of our western hemisphere. This seeming unchangeableness in the order of things social is strangely impressed upon the traveler in New Mexico, which has of late years become a centre of archaeological interest. While the more important cities, including Santa Fe, have adopted many modern devices and improvements, the smaller settlements and villages still have the same general appearance they presented to explorers and travelers who visited them hundreds of years ago. Pueblos, they are still called, the old Indian word signifying "town" being retained just as the adobe houses themselves, the manner of dress of the people, their social customs and general surroundings are unchanged since aboriginal days.

There are in New Mexico nineteen pueblos, of which that shown in the photograph on this page is a fair type. They vary in size only, there being practically no difference in architecture. Each pueblo was originally designed to accommodate several hundred persons, who dwelt together in community, as communism in its simplest form was and still is an essential part of the Pueblo belief. Instead of being built of one or two stories, like the old Spanish adobes in Mexico, they were almost all of a single story, built upon each other in the form of terraces, sometimes as many as five or six houses overlying each other, and the highest being accessible by ladders only. The most celebrated of these pueblos are Taos, Laguna, Santa Clara, and Zuni.

To one who has lived in a modern dwelling-house, a visit to a pueblo home is full of strange interest. Its walls are very thick, and the entrance is gained, not by a door, but by a window or an aperture in the roof which is reached with the aid of ladders. Within, the place is dimly lighted by the small, deep-set windows, that serve also for ventilation, for they are guiltless of glass. Some of the houses are constructed of stone laid in mortar, but the majority are of adobe or sun-dried brick. It is quite evident, from the general plan of the structures, that in former ages, the principal object must have been that of defence against enemies. With this view, entrance was made as difficult as possible, and the houses are often ranged in the form of a hollow square, or built up against the face of a bluff or steep mountain side difficult of approach. There are no stairways in these queer-looking structures, all the climbing being done by ladders. Each community has one or more large apartments devoted to the purposes of council assemblies, tribal dancing rooms, or chambers in which religious rites are performed.

They are a simple people, these Pueblos, quiet, honest and law-abiding; mainly agriculturists and herdsmen. A few skins, baskets and pieces of pottery constitute the furniture of a Pueblo home. The clay-baked oven in which the family cooking is done is outside the house. The women are expert spinners and weavers and make their own belts, blankets and cloth, and the men are skilled in the mysteries of pottery manufacture. But although the government has that is what kills ministers. Hot waffles, fresh biscuit, oysters, and cold tongue at seven o'clock in the evening, have given many a 'man of God' dyspepsia, a dull brain, poor sermons, short pastorate, and an early decease. Rich and late suppers are doing a bad work for some of our best clergymen. We know of ministerial clubs where the members assemble Saturday afternoon to discuss religious topics, tarrying until evening, when a sumptuous table is provided for them. As a consequence they do not sleep well on Saturday night, and the congregations on Sabbath see what they suppose is a heavenly pallor on their pastor's cheek, when his wife knows it was hot biscuit at tea the evening before that did the business. If you invite your minister out to eat, better have him at noon or thereabouts; or, if calling him to tea, then let it be in the early part of the week, giving him time to get over his gustatory indulgences. The most of ministers have a powerful appetite for good food, and capacity to resist temptation in that direction may not be one of their strong points.

Mother's "No."

Long before the baby lips have learned to lisped their first intelligible words, says a paratively easy to teach it that when that article is refused it is no use desiring it any longer. This can be done very firmly, though very lovingly; the lesson once learned will never be forgotten.

THE LIGHT OF HOME.

A TENDER child of summers three,
Seeking her little bed at night,
Paused on the dark stairs timidly.
"O, mother, take my hand," said she,
"And then the dark will all be light."

We older children grope our way
From dark behind and dark before;
And only when our hands we lay,
Dear Lord, in thine, the night is day,
And there is darkness nevermore.

Reach downward to the sunless days,
Wherein our guides are blind as we,
And faith is small, and hope delays;
Take thou the hands of prayer we raise
And let us feel the light of thee.

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

DON'T EXAGGERATE.

A GOOD many girls — girls who mean to be truthful — drift into a little habit of exaggeration that in time will become something more, remarks a philosophical writer. A girl with a vivid imagination hears a story told, and seized with a desire to outdo her companion, tells a marvelous one, which is absolutely without existence except in her own brain. It is fiction that will hurt nobody, she thinks. That's where she is mistaken. Every time she does this sort of thing she hurts herself. She makes her conscience weaker, and almost before she is conscious of it she will be telling things that will cause mischief. She will ruin herself morally, and mentally, and people will speak of her as one who is not to be trusted, and who is undesirable as a friend. She becomes the sort of a woman about whom in time people will say: "I prefer her enmity to her friendship, because when she is my enemy she doesn't know about my private affairs and can't exaggerate them and tell them to everybody; whereas while she is my friend she may, without meaning to do it, tell in detail all of my life, and make me very uncomfortable." Fancy having made yourself so undesirable that your enmity is preferred to your friendship—it is possible. Now, stop in time. With the first inclination to give the history of two thousand rather than two cats, put a memory ribbon in your frock, and whenever you feel the inclination to enlarge upon stories already told, that little ribbon will flutter a warning and remind you to stop in time.

The Boy and the Light.

A little boy walked with his father at night through the country and carried the lantern. The black silence made him shiver, and he said: "Father, I am afraid, for the light reaches a very little way." His father said: "True, my boy, but if you will walk on, the light will shine to the end of your journey." There is night time as well as day time in Christian experience. Not always do the rays of God's providence illuminate the horizon; there are times, as well, when God gives his followers only enough light to enable them to take the next step. But that is all that is needed. Of one thing we may be sure—that light will never go out. If we walk on, it will shine to the end of our journey.

I count this thing to be grandly true.
That a noble deed is a step toward God—
Lifting the soul from a common sod,
To a clearer air and a broader view supplied them with modern implements of husbandry and educational facilities, their progress is almost imperceptible, and since they were first visited by Nunez about 1530, their habits and habitations have remained practically unchanged. They are believed to be the descendants of the ancient Aztecs, and their degeneracy is an illustration of the deterioration of a once proud and powerful people. Christianity has made but little progress among them thus far, for it has to contend with a long inheritance of ignorance and gross superstition. Many of the customs of the Pueblos may be clearly referred to a barbarous period. Their religious festivals, "knife" dances, and self-mutilations, are not unlike some of the rites still observed among the Sioux Indians, while others resemble the peculiar ceremonies to be witnessed among the idolatrous fanatics of Hindustan.

Ministers at Tea.

"What is more delicious for a minister than to accept an invitation to a parishioner's house," writes Dr. Talmage, "and sit an hour or two in the evening at the table with a collection of pleasant people? But Canadian writer, the baby mind will have discovered the difference between "Yes" and "No," as those all important monosyllables fall from its mother's lips. Make up your mind from the very first never to say "No" unless you mean it and having said it let nothing persuade you to alter it. Attracted by the shining blade of a knife, the glitter of a bright pair of scissors or some other article, the little one reaches out its hand to possess the dangerous toy. You say, "No, no, baby mustn't have that," knowing that the desired object is dangerous, or, it may be, too fragile to be entrusted to the wee hands. Then the little lips go down, and disappointment is very naturally followed by an outburst of grief.

Too often does the mistaken mother yield to the pleading tears; the coveted thing is given over to quiet the cries, and baby learns two important things: First, that mother's "No" does not mean "No;" secondly, that if it wants a thing very badly the best plan is to cry for it. Now, I admit that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to teach an infant that the article it longs to play with is not fit for a toy; but it is com-

Helpful Discourses for the People.

THE TWO GREAT NECESSITIES.

A Sermon Preached in Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, by Pastor

A. J. Gordon, D.D. Text: John 3: 7: "Marvel not that I said unto you ye must be born again." John 3: 14: "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up."

HERE are two great "must bes" in the third chapter of John, which we do well seriously to consider—a divine and a human must be. Jesus did not say to us, "Ye must be lifted up on the cross." He did not say, "We must be born again;" thus purposely excluding himself from the company of those who needed regeneration; and in the same discourse he said, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up," thus purposely excluding us from the great transaction of the cross. Christ could not from the nature of the case, be included in our "must be;" we could not be included in his "must be." On the other hand he could not be excused from his "must be;" we could not be excused from ours. I wish this morning to speak to you on the two great necessities.

The Divine Necessity.

"The Son of Man must be lifted up." Did not Jesus Christ choose to die—freely? Voluntarily choose to give his life a ransom for many? How then can it be said that he must die? Because with a divine being, freedom and necessity are entirely compatible. Even God who is the author of law, is under law; I say it reverently. He made the commandment, "Thou shalt not lie," and he is under that commandment, for we are told that "God cannot lie." Thus authority and obedience belong to the same Almighty Being. So Christ was absolutely free with respect to his life: "I have power to lay down my life," he says, "and I have power to take it again: no man taketh it from me." But, he adds, "this commandment I have received of my Father." It was the necessity of filial obedience, then, first of all, which he was under. God speaking from heaven said: "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased," and Christ looking up to heaven said, "I do always those things which please thee." Thus the divine Father and the divine Son are perfectly agreed upon this point—the faultless obedience of Jesus Christ. The Son of God could die but he could not disobey: he could surrender his life, but he could not surrender his loyalty. As the needle is free to move upon its pivot, in response to the slightest influence, and yet, however swayed or deflected, always turns loyally to the pole, so Christ's will, while absolutely free, turned irresistibly to the Father's commandment. The "may be" of choice surrendered to the "must be" of authority; the liberty of will yielded to the loyalty of love. Christ could not turn from the cross when his Father called him to the cross. He must be lifted up for the sins of the world.

Pity and Love.

Consider what this means. Looking to God what do I hear? "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish but have everlasting life." Excess of love conquered by excess of pity; the yearnings of a Father's heart overcome by a Father's compassion! God so pitied this poor world that he poured out the very "heart of his heart," and flung it among the rabble of Calvary, to be trampled on and crushed by sacrilegious feet, that thereby he might win back a lost race to himself. And looking to Christ what do I hear? "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straightened till it can be accomplished." The hunger of compassion absolutely craving the sharpness of the cross; love embracing the crucifixion as a mother embraces her infant child! Truly "God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were sinners, Christ died for us."

And the necessity of law was behind this necessity of love. It is written in the Scriptures, that "without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins;" and I know not but that this law is just as inexorable as the law of mathematics, that two and two make four. It is a great mystery I confess; and I do not pretend to justify or demonstrate it. But I do know that Christ recognized it, otherwise he never would have said: "Even so must the Son of Man be lifted up" or "The Son of Man must be delivered into the hands of sinners, and crucified and raised again the third day."

Therefore I beg you to consider what a gratuitous insult it is to say that the blood of Christ is not of sins, when Christ himself said that it was necessary—said it before he came to the cross, and held fast to the saying amid the bloody sweat of Gethsemane, amid the taunting and reviling of the Jewish priests and Roman soldiers, and amid the thirst and darkness of his passion and vicarious anguish. There are theological questions about which we may differ, but here is a bleeding fact before which we must shut our mouths. O! sinner, if you do not wish to be saved by the blood of Christ, turn your back on his cross and close your lips, and march sullenly and silently to death and doom. But I beg you do not discuss with him the question whether you might not be saved without the shedding of blood. This is simply saying that he made a mistake in dying: that the cup of his anguish was a needless draught: that the work of his crucifixion was one of supererogation. The Scriptures declare that "he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." To say that his death is not necessary for our salvation, is to say that he did more than he need have done in dying on Calvary; that he overwrought his obedience and exaggerated the work of the cross.

And men have said it and do say it. The amiable Dr. Channing lost his patience at the insistence of evangelical Christians on the doctrine of the atonement, and is reported as saying, in a memorable phrase, that "they had set up a gallows in the centre of the universe." Nay, they did not set up that gallows. Christ did not set it up, God did not set it up.

Christ found the Gallows already standing when he came into the world, and beneath that gallows the whole race under the death sentence from a violated law. And he gave himself to suffer in their stead, "the just for the unjust that he might bring us to God." I know that to many this last saying sounds strange and paradoxical. But the paradoxes are not all in the Gospel. Yonder a murderer was executed the other day; and on the scaffold two men stood, one on either side of the criminal; on the right hand the executioner, on the left hand the chaplain; the one to enforce the death sentence, the other to pronounce the absolution of the church. Could anything be more absurd—hanging a man and pardoning him in the same act? "If he must be punished, let him be punished," one might say; "if he can be forgiven, let him be forgiven, but do not undertake both in one transaction." Yet this is substantially what is done at every execution. We bring the Gospel with its offer of pardon, and the law with its penalty of death.

It is a paradox it is also a parable. In the death of Christ we see condemnation and forgiveness in the same act. The nails cry out with every stroke of the hammer which drives them through the quivering flesh: "The wages of sin is death." He who on the cross was made sin for us endured the righteous penalty of sin. But when he cries out with his dying breath, "Father, forgive them," we see that another was there also. Love pronounces absolu-tion while justice pronounces sentence, and so in the paradox we behold the atonement. "Mercy and truth have met together, righteousness and peace have kissed each other."

The Human Necessity:

"Ye must be born again." It is a necessity first of all in ourselves. For our Lord adds by way of explanation: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." There is a great gulf not only in the life to come, but in the present life between the natural man and the spiritual man. No process of refinement or clarification can ever turn oil into water. No enrichment or improvement can ever turn water into oil. The two do not mix or coalesce; water remains water, oil remains oil to the end. "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God," said Nicodemus to Christ. "A teacher," answers Jesus, "it is not teaching that is needed. Think you that human nature can be cultured and improved to such a point that one shall be qualified for heaven? Nay, that which is born of the flesh is flesh. Marvel not that I say unto you, ye must be born again." God's life must be communicated to you before you can be fitted for God's presence. Only "that which is born of Spirit is Spirit." Does this seem like a harsh accusation of human nature? But it is the Lord who makes it, not I. Hear what Christ says in the 6th of John. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing." "Lord, that is very severe." My morality and my uprightness; my charity and my benevolence; my self-denial and humility—all profiteth nothing? Not as a ground of acceptance with God? American money will not pass current in England, however good it may be in this country, because it is not the coin of the realm. "Holiness, without which no man can see the Lord," says the Scripture. This is the currency of heaven, and holiness is something of God; it is the gold of his nature, it bears the image and superscription of his person. You must have holiness in order to see God, which is but saying, you must have the divine life implanted within you. "Ye must" is Christ's own word. There is but one way of entering the kingdom of God, and that is God's way; and there is only one life which can live in the kingdom of God, and that is God's life.

The Necessity in Nature.

Let me illustrate this from nature. There are two worlds on this globe of ours, each with its own kind of inhabitants. There is the world of air and the world of water. Can the inhabitants of one of these worlds pass to the other? Take a man or beast from the world of air and put him into the world of water and death by drowning ensues at once. Take a fish from the world of water and introduce it into the world of air and it dies immediately of suffocation. Now these two worlds are not more widely separated from one another than the natural world which we call earth and the spiritual world which we call heaven. Put an unregenerated man into heaven and he could not live there, because he could not breathe the air of heaven; for he has not the organs to inhale the atmosphere which is the very life of the very God. Therefore one must be born again in order to see the kingdom of God.

To bring the truth down to actual experience—Do you know why it is that a thoroughly worldly man is ill at ease and wretched when introduced into a fervent and spiritual prayer-meeting? Because he has not the organs of faith and love and hope with which to breathe the atmosphere of the prayer-meeting. He is a fish out of water and is miserable. Do you know why a thoroughly consecrated Christian is unhappy in a ball-room or a card party? Because he is out of his element. As the saying is among the scientific men:—everything must be adapted to its environment. Therefore Christ's great demand is reasonable enough. You must be born again in order to be fitted for the heavenly country. If you delight supremely in the pleasures and vanities of the world, how can you be happy in heaven were you transplanted thither? If your highest joy is the service of Christ how can you be happy in the vanities of this world? Here you have the test whether you would be ready for heaven if called to-day.

Now how can this new birth be attained? Hear Jesus' Words which immediately follow this announcement of the doctrine of the new birth. "No man hath ascended into heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man who is in heaven." What is this but saying that the stream of life can rise no higher than its source! Christ brought the life of heaven down to us, that by it we might be able to attain to heaven. What a strange sight it is on this earth where everything tends to fall downward to see a balloon rising upward. Like a war-horse eager for the fray, it sways and pulls at the ropes which fasten it till suddenly, being released, it bounds away to the clouds, leaving the earth in the far distance behind. What gives it this buoyancy? Some of the higher and lighter atmosphere of the heavens has been caught and imprisoned in it, and now it simply seeks its own. Jesus Christ came down from heaven, saying as he arrived, "I am come that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly." "He that believeth on me hath eternal life," he says.

That is Regeneration:

the life of God communicated to men. Now we have that within us which being derived from God tends to God. Now we can ascend up to heaven because we have within us that which came down from heaven. And see how simple is the requirement on our part. We are not told that we must accomplish the new birth for ourselves. That were impossible. New birth is new creation, and only God can accomplish that. As well think of creating sun or moon or stars, as to create in ourselves a new heart. Here we are absolutely helpless. But the requirement on our part is faith. "Believe on the Son of God and you shall have life."

And now my hearer let me press home the question upon your heart—"Have you been born again?" If not I have no promise of heaven within my reach for you. No person since Adam, ever came into this world by any other way than by the gate of natural birth. The lowly door of weak and helpless infancy is the only door by which a human being ever entered this life. And you do not complain of that: for it is a natural and universal law. Well, just as natural and universal is the law that through the new birth we must enter the new life, the life of heaven. Now is the time for this great change. Now is the day for this great transaction. To you I appeal, O men and women, this morning. Receive Christ, for it is written, that "as many as received him, to them gave he power to become sons of God, even to them which believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man but of God."

A FLOAT IN CHINA.

From a letter to "The Baptist Missionary Magazine" from Miss Emma Inveen, who is laboring for Christ in Inland China, we extract the following description of her return up the Yangtze River:

It was my pleasure and privilege to be in Shanghai on the arrival of our friends on the nineteenth day of last month. Ten days were spent in Shanghai in changing from American to Chinese dress and in making preparations for a long journey still before us. It was pleasant to find that no one had objections to adopting the native costume, which experience in inland China has proved to be more convenient for ourselves, and less offensive to the people we desire to reach—not that any of us try to look like Chinamen or for a moment imagine we do. The last day of the year we sailed for Hankow by the steamer "Teh-shing"—"Virtuous Prosperity." As European rates were very high, we decided to take first-class Chinese fare. Although this necessitated eating Chinese food for a few days, the saving in money to the Missionary Union would be so much, that all gladly fell in with the plan. The discomforts, if any, were more than counterbalanced by the novelty of the experience, the handling of chopsticks, and the amusement afforded by occasional surprising discoveries which were fished up by the chopsticks out of the bowl of "chai."

Late Tuesday afternoon we set sail from Ichang, turning our backs upon that last gunboat, and the last vestige of Western civilization and set our faces toward the region beyond. It seemed like a plunge into the great unknown. But we were strong in the strength of him whose messengers we are, and who goeth before and is even now and always with us. Thank God, it is our blessed portion to walk by faith; we have joys unknown to others; we know that he will lead us step by step; his Spirit will guide us now, even as he led his servants in apostolic times.

Mont Lawn's Red-Letter Day.

erty pole; the picture and block games indoors and the thrice-wonderful phonograph, with its hidden voices and its unseen musicians. Besides, had she not her own locker where she kept the few little things she possessed, and didn't she get one of the "very bestest" seats at table, right beside the missionary, and wasn't her little white iron cot just "too sweet?" How nice it was to join her faint treble with the others in singing of Jesus, and to say "Amen" when the house-mother prayed to God to protect and bless the children. How different it all was from Cherry street where her greatest pleasure was a ride in her father's peddling cart, or a skip on the narrow pavement. She felt that it was all unreal, like some pretty dream, and must soon fade away and leave her just as she was before. She half dreaded lest, if she should shut her eyes and open them suddenly, the trees, flowers, and children would vanish and she, no longer "Number 1000," would look around on the dingy walls of the two bare rooms in the old tenement.

But, by and by, Lillie got accustomed to her surroundings. A hint of the late roses crept into her pale cheeks and the pure, sweet, hillside air gave her strength to run and play all day long. She will carry back with her to Cherry Hill the memory of the brightest days of her young life, and of an experience that may influence her eternal welfare. Dear little "Number 1,000!" May kindness and love brighten your lot and the lives of all the children of the poor.

Ingratitude has hardly a place in the child-nature, and among the hundreds of little ones who have been housed, fed and cared for at Mont Lawn, we have yet to learn of one boy or girl who, at the end of the ten days' vacation, has not gone home with a heart full of the kindest remembrances. Many of them write us loving letters, recalling the happy hours they spent at the Home. Lack of space forbids more than a mere reference to these letters. A father and mother write under date, Aug. 27:

With our hearts streaming over with joy and gratitude, we send our thanks to you for your kindness in taking two of our little ones to your delightful place in the country and making us all glad and happy. It was a refreshing to them both for soul and body. Our prayer is for you, that the blessing of God will rest upon you and your labor of love. May God continue to make you a blessing to many little children.

Thankfully yours in Christ, H. T. and S. O. T.

Here is a letter sent from the Home by one of our little girls to her mother:

THURSDAY, AUG. 23, 1894.

DEAR MAMMA:—I arrived safely at THE CHRISTIAN HOME, NYACK, Wednesday, 6.30 p.m. Nellie and I went to the Bible House to be examined by a lady doctor. We had a nice sail on the boat and a ride in the stage-coach. There were a great many children at the Home, brought from different Sun Day Schools, cheering us when we arrived. We were called into supper, and had apple-sauce, milk, bread, and crackers; for our breakfast, this morning we had milk and H.O., and for our dinner we had pork and beans, tomatoes, potatoes, pudding, and bread. Nellie and I have a bed to ourselves, and it is lovely. It is an iron bed, a lovely spring, two sheets, a double quilt and a white spread; and we have everything to ourselves.

Your loving daughter, SADIE.

The arrival and departure of the mail is always an event at Mont Lawn. It is amusing to watch the interest many of our little folks take in the letters sent or received by their playmates. Any boy or girl who gets a letter is a person of importance among their own little circle.

"I got a letter to-day," said a bright little black-eyed maid of seven to another girl.

"Did ver? Wish't I had a letter."

"Oh, I guess your folks don't know how to write."

Tears sprang to the eyes of the other child and her lips trembled.

"Poor thing!" explained one of the missionaries, "I suppose that other didn't know it, but Susy's father and mother are both deaf and dumb. That's why she felt hurt at what her mate said just now."

"Indeed; how strange! Yet she seems to have all her faculties perfect."

"Oh, yes; she can talk well enough and so can her brother, but the parents and her uncles and aunts are nearly all deaf and dumb."

The average number of children at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home during the summer has been 125, the largest number at any time being 149. The largest party taken up in any one day was 34, the average being 25. The average cost of conducting the Home has been $50 per day. It will probably be closed for the season sometime during the latter part of the current month.

A GREAT WESTERN CALAMITY!

Many Hundreds Dead and Thousands Rendered Destitute by Forest Fires in Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin—Whole Towns Obliterated—Terrible Scenes in the Lumber District Towns—A Relief Movement Already begun and Help Needed.

ONE of the saddest calamities that has ever visited the Western States is reported from Minnesota, Michigan and Wisconsin, where several towns and a number of villages in the lumber districts have been destroyed by terrible forest fires in which hundreds of men, women and children have perished. It is probable that the total number of those who perished may be very near one thousand.

The worst disaster befel in Minnesota. Between Kettle River and Cross Lake, lies a great valley, which was occupied by a considerable population engaged mainly in the lumber industry and this tract has been swept bare by conflagrations so fierce and swift that nothing could stand before them and people had no time to escape. Three towns—Hinckley, Mission Creek and Pokegama—are in ashes, and in and around Hinckley alone, 447 poor, charred and blackened bodies have been found, while hundreds of other incinerated victims lie scattered around among the different villages and settlements. Whole families are known to have been cremated. In some of the settlements, a few of the stronger men escaped death by flight, or by hiding in small lakes or swampy places, but the fire seems to have penetrated everywhere.

Meanwhile, the survivors who escaped death at Hinckley and Mission Creek, and those whose homes were consumed in the other Minnesota towns and villages of the burned lumber district are destitute, without either homes or food. The city of St. Paul has sent them a supply of provisions for temporary relief, the State is preparing to help them and from United States Army headquarters in St. Paul, tents and hospital supplies have been sent for the treatment of the very large number of injured. Not since the great Chicago fire have so many people suffered in this country through conflagration as are now suffering in those States. Relief Committees have been organized and the entire country will be invited to aid in the Christian work of helping and comforting these afflicted ones until they are again able to do something for themselves.

Rev. Mr. Knudson, a Presbyterian pastor in Hinckley, relates a most thrilling experience during the fire. He says it swept down on the town like an avalanche. Many who perished might have been saved had they kept away from the river. The people lost their heads and stampeded, trying to escape by teams and saddle-horses. Mr. Knudson went to a hilltop, and when the fire passed over, found himself in a charred desert, surrounded by hundreds of dead, while those who survived were far from help and with nothing to eat or drink.

At Pine City there are over 600 homeless, at Hinckley, where 450 perished, almost the entire remaining population is destitute, with no clothing, food or shelter; Sandstone has 50 dead, and 225 homeless, and Sandstone Junction is in a like plight. Pokegama, Cromwell and Miller have also suffered greatly, but the loss of life and the number of homeless is not yet accurately known.

Many narrow escapes from the fire are recorded, and there were numerous instances of heroism. Hinckley is 75 miles from St. Paul, lying between that city and Duluth. A limited express train with a plucky engineer, named James Root, and carrying eighty passengers, ran into the fire at Hinckley. It seemed certain death to attempt to stop at the depot there, but Root did so and in a moment the cars caught fire. Two hundred frightened fugitives from Hinckley soon filled the train which resumed its backward journey southward, the wind fanning the flames and the cars soon being a moving mass of fire. Many of the passengers were driven temporarily insane by the terrible situation and rushed out upon the car platforms, moaning, shouting and praying loudly in their agony and distress. Some leaped from the cars, preferring to risk death in the smoking forest to incarceration in the blazing train. Others tumbled blindly off the train to the track not a few being killed by the fall.

The clothing of the engineer and firemen was ablaze repeatedly and the face and hands of the former were literally baked; but Root bravely clung to his post, knowing that to leave it or to stop his engine would mean certain death to all on the train. His helper frequently dipped water from the tank and threw it over him to cool the bursting skin, and thus he was enabled to pull through the last dreadful six miles of fire with his burning train, and when Skunk Lake was reached, the remaining passengers rushed out of the cars and into the water. There were many who had to be carried, being utterly unable to help themselves. Brave Engineer Root was found to be frightfully and perhaps mortally injured by the exposure to the flames, while Sullivan, the conductor of the train, who had been cool and resolute throughout the dreadful journey, became a raving maniac and had to be conveyed to an asylum. Scores of other instances of noble courage and self-denial are recorded,—faithful telegraph operators perishing at their posts, mothers dying in the effort to save their little ones, fathers perishing while fighting off the flames from wives and babes. All over the Minnesota burned district, charred and unrecognizable bodies were found after the fire, their poor, mutilated frames looking more like blackened tree-stumps than human remains. In the fields, and in streets, lanes, woods and ditches they were found lying where they had fled for shelter. Along the railroad-track were the corpses of many who had tried in vain to escape by the train. Three men who walked back to Hinckley after the fire were almost suffocated by the smoke and fell over a dead body at every few yards. Most of the dead seemed to have perished of suffocation. Some had run their heads into sand heaps in their desperate efforts to escape the furnace-like atmosphere. At one place they found a mother who had lain down over her three little children in the vain effort to shelter them from the fierce heat, and all four had died together.

One of the most distressing features of the calamity was the search that was conducted by parents for missing children and by sons and daughters for their aged relatives. Bodies were piled up in rude coffins in the graveyards and at railway depots for identification, but only a small proportion could be positively recognized before burial.

Weeks may elapse before the number who perished can be accurately ascertained. It may be that in Minnesota alone the death-roll will very nearly reach 1,000. In Wisconsin, the towns partially destroyed by the forest fires are Benoit, Poplar, Marengo, Spencer, High Bridge, Ashland, Bayfield, Washburn, Baronette, Granite Lake, Bashan, Shell Lake and Comstock, and in Michigan the town of South Rubicon, besides several others that have not been heard from, having apparently been isolated by the fire, if not destroyed. The loss to property will run up into the millions. Not only lumber lands but rich dairy farms were swept away, and many hundreds of valuable cattle perished.

Relief measures have already been taken by the merchants of St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth, by the Minnesota State Board of Charities, and by the authorities of different cities in Wisconsin and Michigan for the purpose of aiding the thousands of destitute and homeless. In Minnesota, where the suffering is greatest, help is urgently needed, and any of our readers who desire to send a mite for the relief of these poor, homeless, bereft ones, may do so by forwarding their contribution to this journal. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sent a representative to the scene of the suffering in Minnesota, and has appropriated funds which he will apply to the relief of the most needy cases, either in the form of food, clothing, medicines, or otherwise. His communications from the stricken district will appear from time to time. Meanwhile, all who desire in these columns to aid in this work can do so by co-operating with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

MONEY RECEIVED.

Since our last acknowledgment, the following sums have been received and applied to the purpose indicated by the senders:

From Mrs. Madge Nesbitt, $2 for the support of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary; from John Blair, Philadelphia, $10 for Foreign Missions; from Mrs. E. F. Cobb, $1 for Bella Cooke's Work; from Friend, Springfield, O., $4 for the Bethesda Home; from H. L. and Mrs. Lunt, $1 for Mrs. Jamal's schools in Palestine; from Mrs. J. W. Crane, $10 for Dr. Faust's Mission to the Jews.

After Vacation

People often feel as tired as before. This is because their blood is poor, their nerve-strength gone, their vitality exhausted. Hood's Sarsaparilla is needed. It will purify and vitalize the blood, create an appetite, and give health and strength in place of weariness, weakness and irritability. It will build up the whole system.

Hood's Sarsaparilla Cures

"I suffered with catarrh and stomach trouble and was in a run down condition. I was very weak and had a tired feeling and suffered with throat trouble. I read about Hood's Sarsaparilla and thought I would try it. After using three bottles I found myself cured. Hood's Sarsaparilla did the work." T. MEYER, Dublin, Pa.

Hood's Pills are purely vegetable, hand made, perfect in proportion and appearance.

THE BOOK SHELF

TWO YOUTHFUL MARTYRS.*

THESE two were only boys, and had not the steadfast courage which sometimes comes to riper years. They had known some trials; yet life, love, friendship, and the beautiful world around them were very dear to their young hearts. Yet they were Christians, and it they were about to be called upon to die, strength would be vouchsafed to them as it was needed. It has been said that dying grace comes with the dying hour. The perspiration broke forth under the yellow curls on Karl's forehead, and the cold hand of Frederic trembled in his own.

The silence was suddenly broken by the man who held the sword. He was a dark-browed, stolid-faced individual, whose countenance betokened no nice regard for justice, far less a sentiment of tenderness; yet his words might have put to the blush the men who, claiming to be shepherds over God's flock, were enacting the part of wolves.

"I like not this," he said grimly. "How can I do this thing? The boys have had no trial!"

"Better obey thine orders and ask no questions," responded the other.

There was a pause, and then the executioner spoke again, more emphatically than before:

"I tell thee I like it not. Go thou and inform the archbishop for me, that I misdoubt the right of a proceeding like this, and ask him plainly for me, if the lads should not first be brought to trial. And see that you give careful heed to his reply. Begone."

His companion said no more, but turned back at once toward the town. The dark-browed executioner stood with drawn sword, as if guarding the prisoners whom he had dared to reprieve.

The youths, knowing well that supplications would be vain, and that an attempt to escape would be worse than useless, awaited in silence the return of the messenger, whose words would bring a further respite or a death-warrant for them both.

The time, burdened as it was with awful suspense, went by. The sun looked over the mountain tops, and lighted up the spot where they were standing.

The brothers, facing their guard, saw that he was watching keenly for the man whom he had had the temerity to send for instructions, in the face of explicit orders. They wondered if something might not prevent his return; if the archbishop might not be too much engaged to receive him; if he might not be absent, and so a final order fall to be issued.

The minutes seemed to drag, and yet to fly. They followed the messenger in imagination, back to the town, along the streets which they had lately traversed, and to the place of their late imprisonment. They tried to calculate the time that would be required for his journey and return. They began to hope that he was not coming back. They watched the guard. He kept his eyes fixed steadily on a distant point beyond them, and his countenance indicated no variation of thought or feeling.

They waited and waited still without turning their heads. They heard no footsteps on the sword behind them, but suddenly they heard, as those who hear a clap of thunder from a cloudless sky:

"The archbishop says: 'Do what I command you, and leave the responsibility to the prince.'"

"Does that mean that we must die?" asked Frederic. The man with the sword nodded.

"Wilt thou give us time to pray, first?" asked the boy.

Again the executioner gave a silent affirmative. The two boys knelt down, clasped in each other's arms. They prayed simultaneously, in slightly varying language, for their widowed mother and other friends. They prayed for the spread of the Gospel light and truth, and then they prayed for strength to die, and exclaimed together: "Lord Jesus, receive our spirits!"

Their voices ceased. They bowed their heads, still kneeling. The cruel blade descended once and again!

Aghast, we drop the veil upon this deed, committed in the light of the sun, not far from Salzburg, in the sixteenth century, under the authority of Rome!

MISS BASCOM'S THIEF.*

"Why, Mr. Kennedy!"

"I should say so, Miss Bascom! I just caught this young rascal lugging off your rug from the front railing, and I'm bringing him to justice," giving the specimen under his grasp a mock-savage shake as he spoke; "what had we better do with him? I might get my gatling gun, and take him for a target, or you could feed him pie-meal to Tiger."

At these fearful suggestions the captive, a forlorn and ragged mite of a boy, broke into a howl of dismay, and made a desperate effort to relieve himself from the clutch upon his collar.

"Oh, now, Mr. Kennedy!" remonstrated his landlady, "what's the use of scaring the poor little thing to death? There, don't cry Bubby, Tiger's only a cat, and wouldn't hurt a flea; and as to guns, there isn't one in the house, to my knowledge. But don't you know it's dreadful bad of you to steal?"

"Folks can't starve!" blubbered the boy. "Starve? You young cannibal, would you eat the rug?" thundered Kennedy in tragic tones.

"Dud Hanks sold his'n fur a dollar," explained the captive.

"Oh, he did, dud he? Well, it's about time some of you 'Juds' were made an example of, I should think! Isn't there any dark, dank, and dismal dungeon down in that old basement, Miss Bascom? We might—"

But she caught one word only. "Starve?" she cried, aghast, "who's starving Bub—are you?"

"Yes'm; me an' ma an' the twins. Pa's gone off to get work, an' ma's sick, an' ther' ain't but half a scuttle o' coal left, an' three praties," he managed to sob out.

"That's it, my blossom!" Kennedy nodded encouragingly. "You have it pat, only didn't you get in one too many potatoes? And where's the ham-bone you've lived on for a week? You must have a ham-bone, you know."

"Oh, stop your nonsense, now, and let go of the child, please! I'll tend to him. Come, sonny, I can find enough for you to eat, anyhow, and we'll see about the coal later. Come, there's something left from breakfast, I know."

"Probably," observed Kennedy with a pathetic air, "as I wasn't down to get my share—but wait, Miss Bascom! Do you realize that you are cheating the law of its just dues when you take a villain, re-handled from his crime, and begin stuffing him with eggs and bacon—especially your eggs and bacon, Miss Bascom?"

"Villain! A mite like that? And what has the law got to do with such a baby, anyhow, I'd like to know? But, there! One can't reason on an empty stomach. Come on, Bubby!"

Evidently Miss Thirza intended to appropriate the "villain," stomach and all; and she was hurrying him away, leaving Kennedy shaking with silent laughter, when he recovered voice enough to call out—

"Hold on, then, my dear madam! If you insist on being 'particeps criminis,' so do I—we'll fall together! Catch, Muggins!" flinging a half-dollar over the balustrade.

He Tells about the Noble Maoris and their Characteristics, Past and Present — The Terrible Law of Tapu — A Paradise for Lecturers.

DUNEDIN, NEW ZEALAND, July 28, '94.

WHAT the Indians are to America the Maoris are to New Zealand. These aborigines are dying out very rapidly, but you see them in all the upper portions of New Zealand. All this country was once theirs, and they would have kept it, but from whaling ships the foreigners alighted to furnish enough rum and vices of all sorts to kill the Maoris. They are said to be a superior race of savages, but the nobility of them I fail to see. Their faces are ploughed up, not with age but by a tattooing which they suppose pictorializes and beautifies. Sharp shells scooped out these furrows of the countenance. Their greatest fun was massacre. When some of them adopted Christianity they received the old Testament but rejected the New Testament. They liked the war scenes of the old but not the Peace of the New. On occasions they made cartridges of the New Testament. When they could not eat all their enemies they preserved them in tin cans and sent them as delicate presents to their friends. The ship "Boyd," bound for England put in at one of the New Zealand harbors, and all on board were slain and eaten except a woman and three children, who hid away, the only survivors to tell the story. Of course all ships knew that if they were wrecked on these shores they would become a part of the diet of the people. Two of their chiefs taken to London in 1820 aroused much interest and they were loaded with presents of all sorts; but before starting for home these recipients exchanged the presents for muskets with which they drove back and destroyed the neighboring tribes who could not afford muskets. Some of these savages went so far as to lend clubs and powder and knives to their enemies that lively fighting might be kept up. On one occasion they refused to capture the trains carrying food and ammunition to the opposing forces, and when the chief of the Maoris was asked the cause of this, he replied, "Why, you fool, if we had captured their ammunition and food how could they have fought?" One of the missionaries says that he held a religious service at a place between two fighting tribes, and from both tribes the audience was made up on Sunday, but on Monday they resumed their old fight. If they had had plainly put to them the first question of the Catechism, "What is the chief end of man?" their reply, if frankly made, would have been, "The chief end of man is to make an end of him."

De Quincy wrote an essay on "Murder as a Fine Art," but to the Maoris murder was a pastime. Assassination was for ages their gladdest recreation. Massacre was their sport. It was to them what the tennis court and croquet ground and base-ball are to many moderns. No hunter ever enjoyed shooting reed birds, or fetching down a roebuck; no fisherman better liked throwing a fly and watching a spotted trout rise and snap it, than did these Maoris the slaughter of a man. Give beef or mutton to others, but the appetite of the Maori wanted something human in the bill of fare. Many of the Maoris may be good, and kind, and noble, but their ancestors were without nobility of nature, unless laziness and heartlessness, and revenge and malevolence be noble. What an appetite they must have had for soup of human bones! for white man on toast! and for spare rib of missionary! We search New Zealand in vain from top of the North Island to foot of South Island to find among the Maoris anything more noble than seen in the American Indian seated by a bridle path of the Rocky Mountains, wrapped in filthy blanket, hair combed once in forty years, waiting for a cowboy to toss him a rusty cent.

They tell the most enormous stories of the bravery of their ancestors. These ancestors, they say, killed the two great warriors at Waterloo, Wellington and Napoleon, and the tribe believe it, too. Within a few days one of their chiefs was buried amid wild scenes of lamentation, and after the body was put in the ground, the chief's hat and blanket and umbrella were thrown in after him, and then many of the tribe leaped upon the grave with howls and dancing. Not satisfied with deeds of cruelty while living, these noble Maoris in olden time, expected their wives to strangle themselves, and while twisting the flax for the rope, the sister of the dead chief is reported by a recent writer as looking up at the moon and saying:

It is well with thee, oh moon! You return from death, Spreading your light on the little waves. Men say, "Behold, the moon reappears!" But the dead of this world return no more. [tain, Grief and pain spring up in my heart as from a fountain. I hasten to death for relief.

Oh! that all might eat those numerous soothsayers, Who could not foretell his death, Oh! that I might eat the Governor, For his was the war!

One of the most terrible things in all the country of the Maoris is their law of Tapu. If any one breaks that he must die. When a thing is said to be Tapu, no one must use or employ it. For instance, a man gave a slave a knife, forthwith that knife became Tapu, yet some one dared with that knife to cut the bread for the chief's mother, and the man who used the knife for that purpose was butchered. That whimsicality of Tapu has left its victims all up and down New Zealand. The fact is, that barbarisms are so repulsive in every form, that there is nothing admirable about them, and the only thing to do, is by the influence of Christian civilization to extirpate them, and they are going, and for the most part have already gone. Cannibalism in New Zealand is dead. The funeral pyres in India have been extinguished. The Juggernaut has been put aside as a curiosity for travelers to look at. Instead of the cruelties that once cursed these lands, I find our glorious Christianity dominant. All over New Zealand, the highest culture, the grandest churches, the best schools, and a citizenship than which the world holds nothing nobler.

I hereby report to the American lecturers that New Zealand is a grand place for their useful work. Only two or three English and one American lecturer have ever trod these platforms. But the opportunity here is illimitable. Not in all the round earth are there more alert, responsive, or electric audiences. They are quicker than American or European assemblages to take everything said on platform or in pulpit. They call out all there is in a speaker of instruction or entertainment. And the Church and the World have yet to find out that audiences for the most part decide whether sermons or lectures shall be good or poor. Stolid and unresponsive audiences, make stolid and stupid speakers.

Let all the nations reconstruct their notions of New Zealand. I write this at Dunedin, imposing in its architecture, picturesque, in its surroundings, unbounded in its hospitality and another Edinburgh, after which I understand, it is named, Dun-Edin, being the Gaelic for the Northern capital of intelligence. The Scotch founded it and what the Scotch do they do well. They believe in something, and it is almost always something good that they believe in. High-toned morality characterizes everything that they do or touch; solidity, breadth, massiveness, and religiosity are the types of the men and cities and nations they build. No country is well started that has not felt the influence of the Scotch, with their bravery arm and high cheek bones. The sea port of this place is called Chalmers Port, named after, I have no doubt, Thomas Chalmers, the greatest of Scotchmen, unless it was John Knox; and the largest church in this place, where I preached last night, is Knox Church, called I have no doubt, after the man who, at Hollywood, made a queen tremble. Here I am in the mid-winter of this Colony, for July here corresponds with our American January; but there are no such severities of frost or snow as we are familiar with in New York latitudes. The grass is at this moment a bright emerald, the gardens are in glorious flower. From the top of the North Island of New Zealand to the foot of the South Island, the Colony is a bewitchment of interest. For 120 miles ever and anon geysers send up their steam curling on the air. The glaciers, the romantic lakes, the drives, the wooded summits, the mountain peaks, the escarpment of the hills, the fertile fields, the falling waters, the hot springs, the flora with its infinitude of camellias, and its small heaven of ferns, the sunrises and sunsets, and above all the people with cordiality and heartiness, independent of all weather and circumstances, make New Zealand 500 miles of invitation to the inhabitant of other zones to come here whether for health or pleasure, or livelihood or worship.

What uplifted altars of basalt! What blue domes of sky! What bright layers of river! What baptism of gentle shower! What incense of morning mist! What doxology of sea on both beaches! What a temple of beauty, and glory, and joy, and divine aspiration, is New Zealand!

A YOUNG JEWISH EVANGELIST.

What Hermann Warszawiak is Doing to Bring his Jewish Brethren in New York to Christ.—The Sabbath School Choir and his Adult Bible Class of Jewish Enquirers.

IN a small church on the East side of New York City an audience gathers every Saturday which, once seen by any Christian visitor, is not soon forgotten. In contour and feature the people resemble those in any synagogue of the city. They are Hebrew in type and there is in their expression the same quick, alert intelligence and the same intensity of purpose that marks the Jewish countenance in all lands. But there is a difference. In the synagogue there is the calm, dignified look of people who are engaged in a sacred, time-honored service, hallowed by the observance of an ancient race for many centuries; while in the church the observer notices on each face an eagerness and concentration of thought that denotes mental conflict. The speaker, like his hearers, has the Jewish face with its marks of intellectual activity and keen penetration. He is small of stature and slight in build, but evidently a man of vigorous mental power, a veritable, logical athlete. He speaks in German with the Hebrew accent and the Hebrew dialect, which the pure German denominates "jargon." The attention he receives, and the occasional interruptions and pertinent questions show that his words are fully understood, if not approved by his hearers. His replies are courteous but pointed, often disconcerting and they usually silence, if not convince the questioner. The speaker is Hermann Warszawiak, the famous Jewish missionary to the Jews.

For more than four years these meetings have been held every week under Mr. Warszawiak's leadership. He has not faltered in the face of opposition, or become discouraged by meagre results. Progress in mission work among Jews is necessarily slow and difficult. None know that better than Mr. Warszawiak and the other Jewish missionaries who are now engaged in the work. They know by painful experience how strong are the prejudices that have to be overcome before the Jew can be led to recognize in Jesus of Nazareth the long-expected Messiah. They know, too, how heavy is the cost to the Jew of making open confession of Christ. Many of them have had to bear loss of fortune, and that social ostracism which to a sensitive man is like martyrdom, as the penalty for declaring themselves Christians. Knowing these things, they labor patiently and cheerfully in Christ's cause. It is not easy work, nor work that is without reproach, but it is work to which the love of Christ and of their brethren constrains them. The converted Jew cannot be silent. The joy that fills his heart and satisfies the longing of his soul must be communicated to others who still have the veil over their hearts. Like the great Apostle their hearts' desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved, and they labor and pray continually for that end. In New York alone we have five such missions besides Mr. Warszawiak's, at the head of each of which is a Jewish teacher of that spirit. Dr. Faust's work, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church, has already been described in these columns. Then, there is Dr. Gabelein, whom the Methodist Church is supporting; Dr. Lichtenstein, who has the help of the Baptist ject of discourse are identical—to convince God's chosen people that Jesus is "He of whom Moses and the Prophets did write."

To the large number of Russian Jews whom recent troubles in their own country have driven to our shores, Mr. Warszawiak is by birth and family a teacher with special claims. He was born in Warsaw, Poland, twenty-nine years ago. On his mother's side he belongs to the famous Rabbinical family of Gurah, and his uncle is, by inheritance, the head of the Chassidim, the modern representatives of the ancient order his nephew, but earnestly strove to train him in the fear of God.

His invariable morning salutation was "Prepare to meet thy God," and the same words were the last the boy heard from the lips of his revered instructor when he parted from him in the evening. The way of preparation of course was obedience to the six hundred and thirteen precepts contained in the Pentateuch and to the almost innumerable number in the Talmud. The boy was ambitious and longed to be holy like his distinguished uncle and without blame before God. He was conscious of shortcoming, and even in his early youth lamented that no sacrifice was or could be offered to atone for the sins he committed. This need of sacrifice and the conviction that only by sacrifice could atonement be made, occupied his mind with increasing persistence, and was to be ultimately the means of leading him to Christ.

The boy wrestling with these spiritual problems and ardently longing after holiness, continued his studies, in the hope of becoming a great Rabbi. Two brothers had already entered that calling and were preaching in Polish cities. In his fifteenth year his parents arranged with a wealthy Jewish banker of the city of Lodz for a marriage between Hermann Warszawiak and the banker's daughter who was fourteen years old at that time. The two young people, according to the prevailing custom, were not permitted to see each other or communicate with each other until the day of the wedding, a year later. The banker evident-

Church; Dr. Landeman, whom the Lutherans are aiding, and Dr. Leberman, who is working under the auspices of the Protestant Episcopal Church. In all these missions, although the sponsors are of different denominations, the object and aim and subject which supported Judas Macabæus in his heroic struggles. Under the tuition of his uncle, Hermann Warszawiak attained a thorough knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures and the Talmud. The Rabbi was not content with imparting book knowledge to tween Hermann Warszawiak and the banker's daughter who was fourteen years old at that time. The two young people, according to the prevailing custom, were not permitted to see each other or communicate with each other until the day of the wedding, a year later. The banker evident-

HOLY COMPULSION.

A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Talmage. Text: Luke 14: 23, "And compel them to come in."

THE plainest people in our day have luxuries which the kings and queens of olden times never imagined. I walked up and down the stairs of Holyrood Palace—a palace that was considered one of the wonders of the world—and I said, "Can it be possible that this is all there was of this reputed wonderful place?" And this is the case in many other instances. There are fruits in Westchester County and on Long Island farms far better than the pomegranates and apricots of Bible times. Through all the ages there have been scenes of festivity, and the wealthy man of my text plans a great entertainment, and invites his friends. If one builds a beautiful home, he wants his acquaintances to come and enjoy it. If one buys an exquisite picture, he wants his friends to come and appreciate it; and it was a laudable thing when the wealthy man of my text, happy himself, wanted to make other people happy. And so the invitations went out; but something went very much wrong. You can imagine the embarrassment of any one who has provided a grand feast when he finds out that the guests invited do not intend to come. There is nothing that so provokes the master of the feast as that.

Well, these people invited to this great banquet of the text made most frivolous excuses. The fact was, I suppose, that some of them were offended that this man had succeeded so much better in the world than they had. There are people in all occupations and professions who consider it a wrong to them that anybody else is advanced. I suppose these people invited to the feast said among themselves, "We are not going to administer to that man's vanity, he is proud enough now; we won't go; beside that, we could all give parties if we made our money the way that man makes his."

So when the messengers went out with the invitations there was a unanimous refusal. One man said, "Oh, I have bought a farm, and I must go and look at it!" He was a land speculator, and had no business to buy land until he knew about it. A frivolous excuse. Another man said, "I have bought five yoke of oxen." The probability is he was a speculator in live stock. He ought to have known about the oxen before he bought them. Beside that, if he had been very anxious to get to the feast, he could have hooked them up and driven them on the road there. Another frivolous excuse. Another man said, "Oh, I have married a wife, and I can't come;" when if he had said to his wife, "I have an invitation to a splendid dinner; it is highly complimentary to me; I should very much like to go; will you go along with me?" she would have said, "To be sure I will go." Another frivolous excuse. The fact was that they did not want to go.

"Now," said the great man of the feast, "I will not be defeated in this matter; I have with an honest purpose provided a banquet, and there are scores of people who would like to come if they were only invited. Here, my man, here, you go out, and when you find a blind man, give him your arm and fetch him in; and when you find a lame man, give him a crutch and fetch him in; and when you find a poor man, tell him that there is a plate for him in my mansion; and when you find some one who is so ragged and wretched that he has never been invited anywhere, then, by the kindest tenderness and the most loving invitation any one ever had, compel him to come in."

Oh, my friends, it requires no acuteness on my part, or on your part, to see in all this affair that religion is a banquet. The table was set in Palestine a good many years ago, and the disciples gathered around it, and they thought they would have a good time all by themselves, but while they sat by this table the leaves began to grow and spread, and one leaf went to the east and another leaf went to the west, until the whole earth was covered up with them, and the clusters from the heavenly vineyard were piled up on the board, and the trumpets and harps of eternity made up the orchestra, and as this wine of God is pressed to the lips of a sinning, bleeding, suffering, dying, groaning world, a voice breaks from the heavens, saying, "Drink, O friends; yea, drink, O beloved!" O blessed Lord Jesus, the best Friend I ever had, the best friend any man ever had, was there ever such a table? Was there ever such a banquet?

From the Cross uplifted high,
Where the Saviour deigns to die,
What melodious sounds I hear
Bursting on the ravished ear!
Heaven's redeeming work is done,
Come, and welcome; sinners, come.

Religion is a joyous thing. I do not want to hear anybody talk about religion as though it were a funeral. I do not want anybody to whine in the prayer-meeting about the kingdom of God. I do not want any man to roll up his eyes, giving in that way evidence of his sanctity. The men and women of God whom I happen to know, for the most part, find religion a great joy. It is exhilaration to the body. It is invigoration to the mind. It is rapture to the soul. It is balm for all wounds. It is light for all darkness. It is harbor from all storms, and though God knows that some of them have trouble enough now, they rejoice because they are on their way to the congratulations eternal.

I stopped one nightfall, years ago, at Freyburg, Switzerland, to hear the organ of world-wide celebrity in that place. I went into the cathedral at nightfall. All the accessories were favorable. There was only one light in all the cathedral, and that a faint taper on the altar. I looked up into the venerable arches, and saw the shadows of centuries, and when the organ awoke, the cathedral awoke, and all the arches seemed to lift and quiver as the music came under them. That instrument did not seem to be made out of wood and metal, but out of human hearts, so wonderfully did it pulsate with every emotion; now laughing like a child, now sobbing like a tempest. At one moment the music would die away until you could hear the cricket chirp outside the wall, and then it would roll up until it seemed as if the surge of the sea and the crash of an avalanche had struck the organ-pipes at the same moment. At one time that night it seemed as if a squadron of spirits weeping up from earth had met a squadron of descending angels whose glory beat back the woe. Standing there and looking at the dim taper on the altar of the cathedral, I said, "How much like many a Christian's life! Shadows hover, and sometimes his hope is dim, and faint, and flickering, like a taper on the altar. But at what time God wills, the heavens break forth with music upon his soul, and the air becomes resonant as the angels of God beat it with their shining sceptres."

Oh, the Lord God has many fair and beautiful daughters; but the fairest of them all is she whose ways are pleasantness and whose paths are peace! Now, my brothers and sisters—for I have a right to call you all so—I know some people look back on their ancestral line, and they see they are descended from the Puritans or Huguenots, and they rejoice in that; but I look back on my ancestral line, and I see therein such a mingling and mixture of the blood of all nationalities that I feel akin to all the world, and by the blood of the Son of God, who died for all people, I address you in the bonds of universal brotherhood. I come out as only a servant, bringing an invitation to a party, and I put it into your hand, saying, "Come, for all things are now ready," and I urge it upon you and continue to urge it, and, before I get through, I hope, by the blessing of God, to compel you to come in.

We must take care how we give the invitation. My Christian friends, I think sometimes we have just gone opposite to Christ's command, and we have compelled people to stay out. Sometimes our elaborated instructions have been the hindrance. We graduate from our theological seminaries on stilts, and it takes five or six years before we can come down and stand right beside the great masses of the people, learning their joys, sorrows, victories, defeats. We get our heads so brimful of theological wisdom that we have to stand very straight lest they spill over. Now, what do the great masses of the people care about the technicalities of religion? What do they care about the hypostatic union or the difference between sub-lapsarian and supra-lapsarian? What do they care for your profound explanations, clear as a London fog? When a man is drowning he does not want you to stand by the dock and describe the nature of the water into which he has fallen, and tell him there are two parts hydrogen gas and one of oxygen gas, with a common density of thirty-nine Fahrenheit, turning to steam under a common atmospheric pressure of two hundred and twelve. He does not want a chemical lecture on water; he wants a rope.

O my friends, the curse of God on the Church, it seems to me, in this day, is metaphysics. We speak in an unknown tongue in our Sabbath Schools, and in our religious assemblages, and in our pulpits, and how can people be saved unless they can understand us? We put on our official gowns, and we think the two silk balloons flapping at the elbows of a preacher give him great sanctity. The river of God's truth flows down before us pure and clear as crystal; but we take our theological stick and stir it up, and stir it up, until you cannot see the bottom. Oh, for the simplicity of Christ in all our instructions—the simplicity he practised when standing among the people, he took a lily, and said, "There is a lesson of the manner I will clothe you;" and, pointing to a raven, said, "There is a lesson of the way I will feed you; consider the lilies—behold the fowls."

I think often in our religious instructions we compel the people to stay out by our church architecture. People come in and they find things angular, and cold, and stiff, and they go away never again to come; when the church ought to be a great home-circle, everybody having a hymn-book, giving half of it to the one next him, every one who has a hand to shake hands, shaking hands—the church architecture and the church surroundings saying to the people, "Come in and be at home." Instead of that, I think all these surroundings often compel the people to stay out. Now, let us all repent of our sins and begin on the other track, and by our heartiness of affection, and warmth of manner, and imploration of the Spirit of God, compel the people to come in. How shall we lead sinners to accept the Lord's invitation? I think we must certainly begin by a holy life. We must be better men, better women, before we can compel the people to come into the kingdom of Jesus Christ. There are fine essays being written in this day about science and religion. I tell you the best argument in behalf of our holy Christianity: it is a good man, a good woman, a life all consecrated to Christ. No infidel can answer it. Oh, let us by a holy example compel the people to come in!

I read of a minister of the Gospel who was very fond of climbing among the Swiss mountains. One day he was climbing among very dangerous places, and thought himself all alone, when he heard a voice beneath him say, "Father, look out for the safe path, I am following," and he looked back and he saw that he was climbing not only for himself, but climbing for his boy. Oh, let us be sure and take the safe path! Our children are following, our partners in business are following, our neighbors are following, a great multitude stepping right on in our steps. Oh, be sure and take the right path! Exhibit a Christian example, and so by your godly walk compel the people to come in.

I think there is work also in the way of kindly admonition. I do not believe there is a person in this house who, if approached in a kindly and brotherly manner, would refuse to listen. If you are rebuffed, it is because you lack in tact and common-sense. But oh, how much effective work there is in the way of kindly admonition! There are thousands of men all round about you who have never had one personal invitation to the cross. Give that one invitation, and you would be surprised at the alacrity with which they would accept it.

I have a friend, a Christian physician, who one day became very anxious about the salvation of a brother physician, and so he left his office, went down to this man's office, and said, "Is the doctor in?" "No," replied the young man waiting; "the doctor is not in." "Well," said this physician, "when he comes in tell him I called, and give him my Christian love." This worldly doctor came home after a while, and the message was given to him, and he said within himself, "What does he mean by leaving his Christian love for me?" And he became very much awakened and stirred in spirit, and he said after a while, "Why, that man must mean my soul," and he went into his back office, knelt down, and began to pray. Then he took his hat and went out to the office of this Christian physician, and said, "What can I do to be saved?" and the two doctors knelt in the office and commended their souls to God. All the means used in that case was only the voice of one good man, saying, "Give my Christian love to the doctor." The voice of kindly admonition. Have you uttered it to-day? Will you utter it to-morrow? Will you utter it now? Compel them to come in.

I think there is a great work also to be done in the way of prayer. If we had faith enough to-day, we could go before God and ask for the salvation of all the people in our churches, and they would all be saved, there and then, without a single exception. There might be professional men there, political men there, worldly men there, men who had not heard the Gospel for twenty years, men who are prejudiced against the preachers, men who are prejudiced against the music, men who are prejudiced against the Church, men who are prejudiced against God—I do not care—they might be brought in by fervent prayer—you would compel them to come in.

Oh, for such an earnest prayer! People of God, lay hold of the horns of the altar now, and supplicate the salvation of all those who sit in the same pew with you—yea, the redemption of all who sit in your churches. What a momentous hour! God help!

At the close of a religious service, and when the people had nearly all left the building, a pastor saw a little girl with her head bowed on the back of the pew, and, passing down the aisle, he said to himself, "The little child has fallen asleep." So he tapped her on the shoulder and said, "The service is over." She said, "I know it is over; I am praying, sir, I am praying." "Well," said he, minister, "whatsoever ye ask of God, believing, ye will receive." She said, "Is that in the Bible?" "Yes," he said, "there is a promise of that kind in the Bible." "Well," she said, "let me see it." So he turned over the Bible until he came to the promise, and she said, "That's so, is it? Now, O Lord, bring my father to this church to-night."

While she was praying her father passed to the door of the church, and came down to his child and said, "What do you want of me?" When that child had begun to pray one hour before for her father, he was three miles away; but by some strange impulse that he could not understand, he hastened to the church, and there the twain met, the father's arm around the child's neck, the child's arm around the father's neck, and there he entered on the road to heaven. "Whatsoever ye ask of God, believing, ye will receive." That was an answer to the child's prayer. What did she do? She compelled him to come in. "I tell you to-day, my friends, of great salvation. Do you understand what it is to have a Saviour? He took your place. He bore your sins. He wept your sorrows. He is here now to save your soul. A soldier, worn out in his country's service, took to the violin as a mode of earning his living. He was found in the streets of Vienna, playing his violin; but after a while his hand became feeble and tremulous, and he could no more make music. One day, while he sat there weeping, an angel passed along and said, 'My friend, you are too old and too feeble; give me your violin;' and he took the man's violin, and began to discourse most exquisite music, and the people gathered round in larger and larger multitudes, and the aged man held his hat, and the coin poured in and poured in until the hat was full. 'Now,' said the man who was playing the violin, 'put that coin in your pockets.' The coin was put in the old man's pockets. Then he held his hat again, and the violinist played more sweetly than ever, and played until some of the people wept and some shouted. And again the hat was filled with coin. Then the violinist dropped the instrument and passed off, and the whisper went, 'Who is he? who is it?' and some one just entering the crowd said, 'Why, that is Bucher, the great violinist, known all through the realm; yes, that is the great violinist.' The fact was, he had just taken that man's place, and assumed his poverty, and borne his burden, and played his music, and earned his livelihood, and made sacrifice for the poor old man. So the Lord Jesus Christ comes down, and he find us in our spiritual misery, and across the broken strings of his own broken heart he strikes a strain of infinite music, which wins the attention of earth and heaven. He takes our poverty. He plays our music. He weeps our sorrow. He dies our death. A sacrifice for you. A sacrifice for me.

"Oh, will you accept this sacrifice now? I do not single out this and that man, and this and that woman. But I say all may come. The sacrifice is so great, all may be saved. Does it not seem to you as if heaven was very near? I can feel its breath on my cheek. God is near. Christ is near. The Holy Spirit is near. Ministering angels are near. Your glorified kindred in heaven are near. Your Christian father near. Your glorified mother near. Your departed children near. Your redemption is near.

A Young Jewish Evangelist.

ly considered the alliance of his daughter with a scion of the Gurah family a high honor, for he received him into his household and supplied him with every luxury. He built a synagogue in connection with his own house in which his young son-in-law preached on the Sabbath and lectured once or twice during the week. Mrs. Warszawiak tells the story of those days in which she saw much of her husband's spiritual conflicts. The idea of the necessity of atonement still clung to him and he was in the habit of practising prolonged fasts in the hope that God would accept the self-denial as sacrifice. It was during this period that his course of study brought him to the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah where he read of one by whose "stripes we are healed." What those words meant to the soul conscious of sin, convinced that atonement was required and knowing no way of atonement, may be imagined. His sermons took a new tone, and some of his hearers declared that he was preaching Christian doctrine in a Jewish synagogue. The preacher was not aware that it was Christian doctrine; but he believed it to be the true teaching of the prophet. A division him the love of his family, the respect of the community, all his prospects of wealth and honor and possibly even his wife and children. The struggle caused him a serious illness, but on his bed of sickness he made his resolve. As soon as he had sufficiently recovered he went to Mr. Edward and was baptized. The news soon reached Warsaw and Lodz and as the Jews did in Christ's time with the converts, they publicly cast him out of the synagogue. If his parents could have succeeded in regaining possession of him, he would probably have fared badly at their hands; but Mr. Edward, finding that they were plotting to get him, sent him to Scotland and subsequently to this country.

Mr. Warszawiak landed in New York on March 28, 1890, and commenced mission work almost immediately. His arrival was most opportune. Thousands of Jews had within two or three years come from Russia, Poland and Germany and filled the tenement houses on the East side of the city. Their presence created a new problem for the City Mission, whose workers have done excellent service in that neighborhood. The Mission secured Mr. Warszawiak's aid and he was thus enabled to begin evangelistic work among his own people almost immediately on his arrival.

Mission. Rev. Jacob Freshman decided to hand over to the Mission his Hebrew Christian Church in St. Mark's Place, which he had just cleared of debt after the arduous labor of twelve years. The Mission gladly accepted the building, which afforded a convenient place of meeting when the Rivington Street Church was being used for the regular Mission services. It also provides a place of residence for the missionary, who had previously been compelled to frequently change his boarding place. He was never regarded as a desirable boarder, owing to the numbers of Jews who called upon him for religious conversation at all hours of the day and night.

Another institution connected with the Mission, is the Home for persecuted Jewish converts, which was opened about two years ago in Avenue D. Mr. Warszawiak discovered the need of such a home early in his work. No sooner was a Jew known to be attending the services than his situation, if he worked for a Jewish employer, became precarious, and when the convert was baptized he soon learned that his services in the store or shop were no longer required. A temporary refuge for such men was urgently needed, that their profession of Christianity should not involve their utter homelessness. By the liberality of Mr.

Warszawiak's friends in Scotland, a house was rented and furnished and there the missionary provides a shelter for the converts until they can secure other employment.

One of the most delightful features of the services is the singing of the children's choir. Some fifteen months ago the difficulty of obtaining good music at the services became a serious problem. A conference between the organist and the missionary led to a solution. The organist, Mr. Charles Crump, found in the Jewish colony about twenty children with good voices. These he succeeded in training, after a few weeks' practice, and now, clad in their pretty surplices, they appear at all the Saturday services and sing the hymns and anthems with singular sweetness and harmony. A picture of the choir reproduced from a photograph appears on the first page.

About two years ago Mr. Warszawiak had the happiness of being re-united with his wife. After her husband was driven from the synagogue and home, she never heard his name mentioned except in scorn and detestation. She was surprised that she received no word from him, but as she afterward learned, that was not his fault. He wrote repeatedly, but his letters were intercepted by her parents. In relating her story, she said that, having known her husband's life, and having witnessed his earnest efforts to find the truth and obey it, she could not but believe him sincere. She was convinced that he was acting from pure motives, and with a strong conviction that he was doing right. Natural affection drew her toward him, and when she learned that he was going to London from New York, and that his mother proposed to visit him there, she determined to go, too. She knew that her parents would never consent to her going, so she secretly packed a few necessities and with her two little girls left her home in Lodz to rejoin her husband in London. Her parents, however, discovered her flight before the train left the city and followed her to the railroad station. A stormy interview took place, but the wife was firm in her determination to go. Her parents, as a last effort, took possession of the children, believing that she would not leave them, but the wife was proof even under that trying ordeal. On meeting her husband she heard how he had been led to Christ, and under his teaching she, too, made profession of her faith in Jesus. She accompanied her husband to New York, and has rendered him valuable assistance in his work.

The meetings at the Rivington Street Church on Saturdays are now much larger than the church will comfortably hold and large numbers go away disappointed. Mr. Warszawiak hopes to raise enough money ultimately to erect a building in the Jewish quarter in which his work may be done.

MR. WARSZAWIAK'S BIBLE CLASS OF JEWISH BELIEVERS AND INQUIRERS.

arose among the people, and the young preacher's opponents grew in number with every new sermon or lecture. Finally his wife's parents declared against him and bade him leave their home. They regarded him as already an apostate, and refused to allow his wife and their two infant children to accompany him. He was to go to his father's home in Warsaw, and engage in business for a time, and they hoped that he would soon abandon his heretical notions and return to them. Their hope was doomed to disappointment, for in a few months the news reached them that he had been publicly baptized.

When Warszawiak left Lodz he had no idea of becoming a Christian. He had been simply following the truth as he found it in the Hebrew Scriptures but it led him to a state of mind in which the truth as it is in Christ found ready acceptance, when it was presented to him. It was during a visit that he paid to Breslau that the great change came. He was walking on the public promenade there one Sunday when the sound of singing attracted him. He entered the building whence it proceeded and remained to the preaching that followed. The preacher was Rev. Daniel Edward the Scotch missionary to the Jews. The sermon was provisionally one that specially met his case, showing how fully Jesus fulfilled the prophecies and had become the Sacrifice once offered for all. Warszawiak spoke to Mr. Edward after the service and there commenced a friendship which led to his full acceptance of Christ. The young convert was fully aware of the consequences of his change of faith. He knew that it would cost

At his first service, in the chapel attached to the De Witt Memorial Church, only sixteen Jews were present: but the following Saturday the room was crowded, and on the next Saturday the service was held in the Church which was well filled. Among the audience were several who had belonged to the synagogue of which Mr. Warszawiak's uncle was Rabbi, and who therefore knew the young Christian preacher. The service was in every case followed by a free discussion, in which any one present was allowed to question the missionary. Many of the questioners who were most prominent in preparing difficult questions as to the Trinity and other Christian doctrines, and who denounced the teaching as false, have since been led through their own questions to accept Jesus as their Saviour.

Eloquent and convincing as are the sermons preached in the Rivington Street Church, both in the Hebra-German language and in English, the most effective work is that which Mr. Warszawiak denominates "hand to hand work." With a single inquirer, or with a class of inquirers, with the Old Testament in hand, the various passages of Messianic prophecy are examined singly and the inquirer learns how each prophecy and type find their fulfillment in Jesus of Nazareth. "These are your own Scriptures," Mr. Warszawiak says to them, "they are all you have; if you do not believe them, what do you believe?" A photograph of one of these classes was taken recently, and we print a reproduction of it on this page.

At the beginning of the present year new facilities were placed at the disposal of the

A PERFECT MAN.

S.S. Lesson for Sept. 30.* Eph. 4:1-16. Golden Text, Eph. 4:13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A PERFECT MAN (Eph. 4:13) made up of those whom the Father has given to his Son, and who are "made perfect in one" (R.V., "perfected into one," John 17:23), made in himself "one new man," composed of Jew and Gentile (Eph. 2:15); one "chaste virgin" (2. Cor. 11:2), to be presented to Christ: one "man child," (Rev. 12:5), the result of the Church's travail through all the ages of Christendom, who shall be "caught up to God, and to his throne," as he overcame and is set down with the Father upon his throne (Rev. 27): who shall rule the nation with a rod of iron, as he himself does (Rev. 12:5; Ps. 2:9); such is God's "inheritance in the saints" (Eph. 1:18): his "own possession" (Eph. 1:14; Titus 1:14, R.V.) "to the praise of his glory."

Throughout the dispensation of the Church, and in some measure even before, there have been men and women of God who have heard and understood God's call to be holy; and have, at a cost to themselves, followed an unpopular, misunderstood path, contrary to the spirit and customs of the age in which they lived. Thus Enoch and Noah "walked with God;" thus Abraham counted it worth while to leave his country, his kindred, and his father's house, to lead a life of dependence on, and obedience to, God alone. Joseph, Job, Moses, Elijah, were men separated unto God, unlike other men, seeing everything from above, understanding all things in their relation to him, not in relation to their own experience, or their own interests, nor yet those of other people. But these were scattered throughout the ages; men of mark, specially called of God; they were indeed in all their lives "for his name." But when Christ came on earth, in his life and by his death he made the way possible for not only one especial instrument here and there, but that there should be brought out from among the Gentiles "a people for his name." Having chosen Israel so that "the Lord's portion is his pledge, and Jacob the lot of his inheritance" (Deut. 32:9), he was yet obliged to testify against them: "My people would not hearken to my voice, and Israel would none of me," and he withdrew, into "a remnant." That remnant, in this dispensation, is absorbed in the Church of Christ where "there can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female: for ye all are one man in Christ Jesus." And, the Church of Christ, too, has failed; but that very failure works together for good to the accomplishment of his unchanging purpose, which he carries out with the overcomers in the churches.

In order to carry out this great purpose, our blessed Lord and Saviour must come, and, in his own person, identify himself with our sin and with the curse which was due to it; and not only so, but, in taking upon him the seed of Abraham, he must also learn obedience by that which he suffered and, being made perfect, become the Author of eternal salvation to all them which obey him. He could not bring the "many sons unto glory" until the Captain of their salvation was made "perfect through sufferings," until he had proved in a human life, that God could succeed in making man like himself. By his yielded will, we are "sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." He has broken through and become a new and bying way by which fallen, redeemed, restored man can escape "the corruption which is in the world through lust," and can become in very deed partakers of the divine nature.

In all ages, since Christ ascended into heaven, there have been individuals who have seen God's high purpose, and their high calling. But the larger number have taken, personally or individually, that which God has designed for his chosen, his one "perfect man," made out of many. In all holy reverence would we speak of our adorable, Triune God. Each of the holy Persons of the Trinity is indeed holy and perfect, but there is a wondrous, ineffable perfection in the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost—one God. And the wondrous glory of our high calling is the design of God to make, of those whom he perfects, a perfection in unity, a company of conquered selves, purified and perfected into one. Just as God the Father manifests his holiness of perfection in his relation to God the Son and God the Holy Ghost, so he would have us perfected individually, but much more fully, perfected into one. How many children of God are perfect or seem to be so away from their own homes, or apart from their own homes, or apart from their fellow-workers, or in circumstances where the self life is not aroused, but once put into circumstances where their holiness of heart is put to the test, where others, whom they have considered inferior in knowledge and in spiritual development seem to be more blest and used of God than they, they break down, and find that, after all, they are not as they had thought, partakers of the divine nature where comparisons are impossible; just where things cut the closest, just where unity and disunion can most be manifested, there is failure.

Paul was filled with the greatness of this vocation as he wrote his letter to the Ephesians. He could see that if once such a phenomenon could be manifested on earth as a number of God's children so conquered so dead to themselves, that they should be a manifestation of unity on earth, as God is in heaven, Christ's victory would be indeed complete, and sin and death could no longer have a claim upon man, over whose nature God had gained such a victory. He sees it himself; he prays that God will open the eyes of those to whom he writes it and seems not to know how to find terms which will adequately express the magnitude of what he sees. He speaks of Christ breaking down the enmity of Jew and Gentile as a preparation for it, and then, a second time, he prays. That wondrous prayer of Eph. 3:14: 21, was a preparation for that which is to follow, and which, having spoken of in his first chapter as God's purpose, he now calls our vocation—"I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthily of the vocation wherewith ye are called."

God's Purpose becomes our Calling

as soon as it is made known to us. God wills that we should be one, as he and his Father are one. It is our part to manifest "all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Lowliness unites us to others, but self-esteem even in our innermost thoughts, always brings about division. When in lowliness of mind we each esteem others better than ourselves, they will not contend with us for the lowest place; there is nothing to rouse the flesh in them, and if they too are learning of the Lord, they will instinctively be ashamed by our humility, and seek, on the next occasion, the last place for themselves. But there are some who will readily take the last place in every other way, but when it comes to taking a lower place than they have been used to, in the confidence and esteem of an honored servant of the Lord, it is an opportunity of putting to the proof, whether, in such a way as this, they are really dead to themselves, and whether God is really nearer to them than his most chosen and blessed children. Again there are some who will gladly take the lowest place in every way except where it touches the work of God in their hands; but to see others increase, and themselves decrease in blessing upon the work, is intolerable to some who still have enough of self-life in them to be able to compare themselves one with another. The true unity which is our vocation is above all possibility of comparison. We cannot compare our hand with our foot; the members of our bodies serve one another; the eye and the ear are interdependent, and so it is with those who understand aright, and enter into this high vocation of divine oneness, "to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." It is our vocation to manifest to the world that which is written in the Scriptures, as it was our Lord's vocation to manifest that which had been written concerning him. It is ours to prove by the grace of God that "there is one body and one Spirit," by the corporate oneness which shows that we are members one of another.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

SELDOM has the teacher more urgent need of Review Sunday than at the close of this quarter. The separate lessons need like gems to be placed in their proper setting and a general view of the whole to be given to the class. All our theology is unimportant compared with the person and life of our Lord. Everything in religion centres in him and, apart from him, Christianity is a lifeless husk. He is its life and life still comes from him to everyone who seeks it at his hands. The world never tires of hearing of him when they who speak of him truly represent him. His character serves as a model to men of every class and of classes most widely separated from his. Kings, statesmen, soldiers, sailors, physicians, lawyers, even slaves have found in his life and character a model for themselves and though manly in deed and word, he has been the model for innumerable women in every station of life. Why is it that One who lived nineteen centuries ago still exerts so mighty and extensive an influence? How is it that among the millions who were his contemporaries and the millions who have lived since, he alone, a simple Galilean peasant, with no extraneous circumstances to make him conspicuous, should be even at this time of critical analysis and cold disparagement of past ideals, the most eminent and illustrious figure of all time. Men live for him, exile themselves for his sake, go to pestilential lands and into all kinds of danger for love of him and die with his name on their lips. Why is it? The answer is in his life, the opening chapters of which we have been studying during the past three months. The phenomenon and its explanation need to be impressed on the mind of every child. The ground covered so far shows his divine origin, his humble birth, his peril as an infant and his youthful promise. Then, after the long interval of eighteen years, his baptism, his temptation, his first followers, his first miracle, his returning zeal, and his two private conversations with the learned doctor and the dissolute woman. They are the opening scenes of the wonderful life that was to have so tragic a close, and so marvellous a triumph over man's worst enemy. One session may well be given to grouping the incidents into one story and presenting it vividly to the youthful mind.

The devil leaveth him. (Matt. 4:11.) He went away defeated. Christ was invulnerable to his shafts. It is not often so. There is in every nature some place peculiarly open to attack, and the tempter knows where it is. In some it is the love of money, in others of pleasure. Robertson says there is a deep truth contained in the tabled story of old where a mother wishing to render her son invulnerable, plunged him into the Styx, but forgot to plunge in his heel, by which she held him. We are baptized in the blood and fire of sorrow, that temptation may make us invulnerable; but temptation assails us always and in some vulnerable part be it the head or the heart. When the devil leaves us it is too often as a conqueror.

Believed . . . the word which Jesus had said. (John 2:22.) During the Crimean war a dead soldier was found on the field of Inkerman with a book under him. He was laying on his face and one of his fingers was on the open page of the book. He had apparently half raised himself but could not turn on his side. He had opened the book to read and when life became extinct had fallen forward. Looking at the book they found it was a Bible. His finger rested on the passage, "I am the resurrection and the life he that believeth on me, though he were dead yet shall he live." Doubtless they were the last words he had read for there was a smile on his face. Blood had dripped on the book and his finger was glued by it to the page and when they went to remove it a piece of the paper clung to the finger. He was buried with the promise so attached to his finger.

The Lamb of God. (John 1:29.) On the top of a beautiful chateau in France is the sculptured figure of a lamb. The same figure appears in bas-relief on the walls. A story is told in explanation of it. It is said that the marquis who built the chateau was inspecting the progress of the work and had climbed to the highest pinnacle when he became dizzy and fell. The builders ran to the place to pick up what they expected would be his dead body. But he was living. A pet lamb happened to be grazing on the lawn near the walls and the man fell upon the animal killing it instantly. But it broke his fall and his life was saved. To commemorate the incident he caused the figure of a lamb to be placed on the summit and the walls of his house where it remains to this day. Christ was the Lamb of God because of his sacrifice by whom all who believe in him may be saved.

Born of the Spirit. (John 3:8.) Dr. Sanford, dwelling on the irrepressible power of the Spirit in the heart and on the life, says: There was a boy in the State where I live, whose mother was very nervous and could not bear to have the slightest noise made in her presence. One day the little boy was whistling, and she said, "Really you must stop whistling." The boy at once obeyed, but it was not long before he began to whistle again. Again he was checked, and again he heroically stopped. A third time he began, and the mother said, "Now then you are at it again." "Why, mother," said the little fellow, "I cannot help it; it whistled itself." That I say to you. Be filled with the Holy Spirit to overflowing, and you will speak for Jesus, not because you think it is a duty, but because you cannot possibly help it; the Spirit will speak for itself.

Ye must be born again. (John 3:7.) That is, a change of nature is necessary. Pastor Spurgeon used to tell the story of a man who took his gun to a gunsmith for repairs. The smith examined it and put it down in despair. The customer asked him if he could not repair it, and the man said he could not, and proceeded to point out its defects. "Well, I can have a new barrel," he said. "But," said the smith, "the lock is worn out." The man said he would have a new lock. "But the stock is split and worm-eaten." The man said he would have a new stock. "Stock, lock and barrel!" exclaimed the smith; "Why not have new gun at once?" "I never thought of that," said the customer. "That is what I will do." So the man who tries to reform himself discovers that his nature needs so much repairing that the best thing he can do is to take it to God and get a new one altogether.

As Moses lifted up the serpent. (John 3:14.) An earnest Christian woman lay upon her death-bed in a Boston hospital. She had devoted herself to an unselfish life, and contracted the disease that caused her death in spending her life for others. The night she died she said to her attendants: "Please raise the curtain." There, on a great church opposite the hospital, flooded by moonlight stood Thorvaldsen's statue of the Master. Long and silently she gazed upon it. "Don't drop the curtain," she pleaded. "I want to look at Christ." Our doubts, our sins, our troubles, our perplexities, are all curtains that fall between us and the true meaning of a simple Christian life. Raise them and look at him; the one Teacher whose wisdom none can question; the one Saviour by whom immortality is assured.

*The International Subject for next year is Review of the Quarter's Lessons, Golden Text, Mark 1:1. Mrs. M. Baxter would like to see a large class to take her in which the session is not closed to review.

TO AID THE EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS.

America to Join with Europe in Succoring the Constantinople Sufferers—A Turkish Relief Fund Begun—An International Charity in which all may Assist.

WHEN the first detailed reports of the terrible Constantinople earthquakes reached this country, there was a general expression of sympathy for the thousands of sufferers who had been suddenly bereft by the great disaster, of friends and property. Later news only serves to confirm the impression of the extensive character of the calamity and the misery it has brought to thousands of the wretched survivors, both Moslems and Christians. Following the example of Europe and with a desire not to be outdone in deeds of Christian charity, America has resolved to do its share toward helping those unfortunate, and the first steps were taken last week for organizing a Turkish Relief Committee. At a meeting held in the Bible House, New York City, there were present a number of gentlemen active in philanthropic and charitable enterprises and also several prominent natives of Turkey, now resident here and some of them naturalized American citizens. These included Ismail Assim Bey, the Turkish Vice Consul in New York, who attended the meeting in his unofficial capacity, Robert Levy Esq. of Constantinople, ex-Turkish Representative at the World's Fair, Chicago, Dr. Theodorian, Dr. Nevdon M. Boyajian, Dr. A. Ayzavian, G. Gulbenkian, a leading merchant, and John S. Dionian, M. Kelekian, M. Nergarian, also merchants, Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, G. H. Sandison, Dr. Lewi and several others. An informal discussion took place at which several of the gentlemen present explained the distressing condition of the earthquake sufferers, the efforts of the Sultan's government to relieve them and the generous movement undertaken in different European cities for the same purpose. The letter of Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, ex-Congressman and ex-Mayor of New York, was referred to with approval, in which he eloquently urged that Christian America should take up its share of this Samaritan burden and simultaneously afford evidence of its practical claim to be regarded as a humane nation and as being mindful of the prompt generosity with which the Sultan personally hastened to contribute to the relief of the Conemaugh Valley flood sufferers in this country several years ago, when his name led all the list of foreign contributors with a princely donation. Dr. Klopsch was appointed as President of the Committee by a unanimous vote and Dr. Boyajian, Secretary. Hon. A. S. Hewitt, Vice Consul Assim Bey and Hon. Whitelaw Reid were proposed as honorary members of the Fund. It was resolved to appeal to the American people generally through the public press, and to ask all contributors to send their offerings through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, every contribution to be duly acknowledged in its columns. Before the meeting adjourned, the following contributions to the Fund were announced:

Dr. Louis Klopsch, N. Y.	$100.00
P. B. Bromfield, Hempstead, L. I.	25.00
Ismail Assim Bey, Turkish Vice-Counsel, N. Y.	25.00
Robt. Levy, New York	100.00
Mr. G. Gulbenkian "	100.00
Mr. Caliahis Bey "	100.00
Mr. Kelekian "	25.00
Mr. Nergarian "	50.00
Mr. Telhan "	25.00
Mr. Costikian "	25.00
L. P. Shuman, Chicago, Ill.	25.00

Usually one of the most beautiful of old-world cities, Constantinople at this moment presents in many places the appearance of having undergone a military siege. Not only have its gardens, its cypresses, mosques, minarets and towers been shaken and shattered as though by bombardment, but whole streets are closed by the debris of demolished stores and dwellings, which the ruined proprietors have neither the energy nor the means to rebuild. Old residents, who recall the great fires of 1865, 1866 and 1870, declare that the present desolation far exceeds all that was caused by these visitations. Hundreds of stores, bazaars, workshops and dwellings are levelled with the ground, and the other and even more gloomy side of the picture is seen in the many groups of destitute, who are compelled of necessity to camp outside where ever they can. In a letter from Con-and every kind of imaginable shelter which they have been able to put up for their families and children. The sight of all this is indescribably pitiful, even to the most indifferent passer-by, and the misery and want of most of the unfortunate victims is beyond all description. All government offices have been vacated, and business is carried on in tents and temporary buildings. Many tents have been provided for the most needy, and bread is being given to the hungry by the order of the Sultan, who on hearing of the calamity, had at first granted 1,000 Turkish Liras for himself, and 500 Liras for the Prince, and a few days after had increased his donation to 5,000 Turkish Liras ($22,000) in aid to the sufferers. Contributions are solicited by benevolent societies to help the thousands of the sufferers whose only hope for their daily bread now remains in the hands of their more fortunate neighbors. Committees have been appointed in England, France and other parts of Europe to solicit aid for the sufferers of Stamboul, and the first list of contributors in London, headed by the Mayor of the city of London, was $113, and only six names are in the list."

Mr. Shishimian urges that Americans should embrace this opportunity of showing their sympathy by extending practical help. He adds further: "There are yet a fulfil the Master's wishes follow his example and help in this work of assisting these earthquake sufferers, remembering that he that gives quickly gives twice, and that every offering given in the right spirit, will return a thrice-fold blessing to the giver.

The Western Sufferers.

"The Christian Herald" Missionary Visiting and Distributing Relief in the Minnesota Burned District—Governor Nelson's Approval.

WHEN the news of the great forest fires in Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan, involving the loss of hundreds of lives and the desolation of many homes, was received in the East, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, foreseeing the suffering that must naturally ensue, decided to send a representative to the scene of the greatest distress—the burned pine-lands of Minnesota. When last week's issue of this journal went to press, Rev. George W. Sharp, our Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest, had already arrived in St. Paul, having been directed by telegraph to proceed thither where he was to receive funds, and then without delay, travel over the entire district between that city and Duluth, relieving distress wherever found, either with money, medicine or food. He will visit in turn the burned towns of Hinckley, Mission Creek and Pokegama, as well as the ill-fated villages that lie in the fire-swept timber belt. Mr. Sharp has been supplied with funds appropriated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the work. In leading eastern cities considerable sums have been raised for the sufferers. Mayor Gilroy of New York last week received from Mavroyeni Bey, the Turkish Minister in Washington, information that a cablegram had been received at the Embassy from the Turkish Foreign Office in Constantinople, stating that the Sultan had forwarded three hundred Turkish pounds to be distributed among the forest fire sufferers in America. The value of a Turkish pound is about $4.38.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary, on his arrival upon the field, found many local philanthropic agencies at work, notably the Minnesota State Board of Charities and Corrections, and from Rev. H. H. Hart, a leading member of the Executive Committee specially appointed by the Governor, he secured much information that proved valuable as a guide to his own efforts. Governor Nelson furnished Mr. Sharp with the following letter, approving his mission:

ST. PAUL, MINN., Sept. 9, 1894.
To whom it may concern:—The bearer, Rev. George W. Sharp, of Kirkville, Mo., CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary of The American Sunday School Union, having been sent among us to distribute a fund generously provided by Mr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the relief of forest fire sufferers, I request for Mr. Sharp the hearty co-operation of all who may be in a position to assist him in his benevolent mission.
Signed, KUTE NELSON, Governor.
Besides the material assistance Mr. Sharp may afford, this good man, whose whole life has been spent in Christian work, will be able to carry to many desolate and afflicted forest homes the consoling message of the Gospel of Jesus.

AMONG THE BAZAARS.

A STREET IN THE POORER SECTION OF CONSTANTINOPLE BEFORE THE EARTHQUAKES.

stantinople, on the effects of the recent earthquakes, Rev. G. N. Shishimian, American Missionary, writes: "The great bazaars of ages are in a heap of ruins. Many khans and Turkish baths have also wholly or partly fallen in. Almost every mosque church and public building is damaged (in one side of the city) and every private building injured, many beyond repairing. Innumerable houses have become uninhabitable, and a large force of workmen is engaged by the government tearing down shattered walls and buildings in danger of falling. The inhabitants are camping out in the open lots within the city and along the railroad line by the seashore as far as the Seven Towers, under tents, awnings few poor families sheltered within the walls of our mission lot. The bread distributed by the government to the poor, I am told, is 400 loaves to 5,000 Christian sufferers. One loaf weighs about two pounds." Clothing, shelter and food are urgently needed for these destitute ones. It must not be forgotten that all are not Moslems. But in a work of humanity, creeds and beliefs should count for little. The Samaritan did not stop to question the poor bleeding wayfarer before binding up his wounds, nor did the Saviour of the world withhold his human pity and his rich divine mercy from the Syro-phenician woman. Human sufferings makes brothers and sisters of all mankind. Let every one, therefore, who would

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

IN the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will appear the opening chapters of a new and fascinating serial, entitled:

"A NEW-FASHIONED WOMAN."

written expressly for this journal by Mrs. M. Jeanie Mallary, a well-known and brilliant American authoress and a daughter of the "Sunny South." Mrs. Mallary, who has already won an enviable fame in the literary world, has produced a story that must prove a delightful surprise to the lovers of Christian literature everywhere and to all who are interested in the gradual development of spiritual character, in the face of worldly allurements and temptations.

We commend "A New-Fashioned Woman" to our readers and their friends as one of the grandest and most helpful and attractive stories that has ever appeared in these pages, and which will furnish forth besides a rare literary feast that we wish all to enjoy. Those who are introduced to "A New-Fashioned Woman" at the outset will like her amazingly, and will need no persuasion of ours to continue the acquaintance to the end.

CHILLS.

THE doctors, thank God, are on the track of the microbes which cause the most of the disorders that for thousands of years have assailed the human race. It took six thousand years to find that the physical disorders were caused by parasites. This discovery having been made, the next step will be to invent a medical artillery with which to bombard these destructive infinitesimals. God help the doctors in their magnificent work; more like that of our blessed Lord than that of any other profession. Instead of belittling or harshly criticising their attempts at cure, let us cheer them on. For the leaves are now somewhere growing, or the bark is somewhere standing, or the powders are somewhere now being compounded which will emancipate the human race from invalidism. Because such a catholicon has not yet been found, despair not. The world rolled around at least five thousand years before the Countess of Chincon, the wife of a ruler, had the chills and fever in Peru, and by chewing some of the bark of a tree warmed the chill and cured the fever and exasperated her illness and so discovered quinine, that beneficent drug that has blessed all nations, making many parts of the earth inhabitable that otherwise would have been without population. And here's a medicine that prolonged human life and disappointed cemeteries, and wrought such wonders of pharmacopœia that the British rule in India is said to have been practically founded on cinchona bark.

If more than five millenniums were exhausted with search for quinine, be not sure that the world has a long search for antidotes and specifics yet to be found. Some of these young or old doctors will after a while rush out from their laboratories or dispensaries or hospitals shouting, "Eureka! I have found it!" Found what? The complete cure for all styles of human malady? If this is not true, then the Bible is not true, for it promises over and over and over again that all wrongs shall be righted and all maladies cured, and that as the world started with a garden so it will close with a garden. I do not believe that the world is to be a failure, or that the human race is going to succumb. Human life must be prolonged. The cradle and the grave must be set further apart. Some of our descendants in their 150th year will yet read without spectacles. Dentistry has improved the world's mastication, and the old fashioned turnkey that did its horrible work in our boyhood has been put away amid the torture instruments of the Spanish inquisition, and the prospect is that the average of human life, instead of being as now thirty-seven years, will be fifty, and after awhile seventy and then one hundred.

UNCLE SAM'S HOMESTEAD.

WE have as yet cultivated only a small patch of Uncle Sam's homestead. Our rivers, capable of turning wheels and spindles, have only been half harnessed. We have hooked up only the traces, and fastened one buckle. The wire will have on it a bridle and two traces, and stout breeching strap, and enterprise such as we have never seen will mount the driver's box, and crack the whip for a progress that will astound all nations while we rejoice at the prospect of a great immigration of industrious Europeans to this country. I wish we could send out of this country as large an emigration of eternal croakers who act as though all this country wants is a wet blanket. Commerce and mechanism never lift their heads in this country five minutes, but those evil prophets try to smite them down. I would like to trade off every man who does not like our American institutions, for an Englishman, or Scotchman, or Irishman who does. If you do not like the country, get out of it. But let all foreigners who want to see great waterfalls, come and look at our Niagara; or mighty rivers, take a week's voyage on our Mississippi; or boundless farms, ride for three days across Illinois, Ohio, and Wisconsin prairies. Welcome all nations that want to sit down at our breakfast table. We are all ready for company. The table reaches across the continent, and the Rocky Mountains are one leg and the Alleghany Mountains another leg of the table; the bread of the whitest St. Louis flour, the milk from Orange County dairy, the forks made of Nevada silver, the furnace heaped high with Pennsylvania coal, the buckwheat cakes from New Jersey—the only place where they know how to make them—and let the best bell from Troy foundry ring the people into the table.

Her free latching never was drawn in
Against the poorest child of Adam's kin.

THE PARDONING POWER.

THE pardoning power is sometimes abused and it is oftener neglected. Governors who do not exercise this power are unfit for their position. The framers of our laws, foreseeing that the machinery for jury trial would like everything else human be imperfect, provided this mode of escape for those unjustly incarcerated. There have been so many cases in which it was demonstrated beyond a doubt that the innocent suffered and the guilty went free that the Governor who resolves upon abstinence from the exercise of the pardoning power becomes himself the criminal. Sometimes men become the victims of circumstances, and after a life of integrity do just one wrong thing. Punished they must be, but after a while there comes a time for leniency and release. Sometimes good men are found in suspicious circumstances, for which they are in nowise responsible, and are flung into prison, and after awhile the real author of the crime, under pang of conscience or on a sick or dying bed, makes confession. Sometimes after a crime is committed the community is so hot with excitement that the jury lose their balance and are incompetent for a just verdict, and they pronounce those guilty who are not guilty. Sometimes a judge of the court, gouty or dyspeptic, inflicts too long an imprisonment for an offender. Sometimes there are conspiracies against some unfortunate man which do not develop as conspiracies until after the trial. There is probably not a large penitentiary in the land which does not to-day hold in iron embrace those who deserve the full liberty of good citizenship. What a grand thing when a magistrate is willing to put his ear to the wicket of the dungeon and listen to the plaint and examine the testimony, and finding innocence in bonds, does the work of the angel of God that opened the door of apostolic imprisonment and set Peter free. A Governor of Kentucky, entering upon his office at Frankfort, the State capital, found a great mass of convicts huddled together in ill-ventilated dungeons. Four persons in a room where there ought to have been only one. Old villains and young boys in the same bunk. No opportunity for ablation. Filthy and rotting alive. Those who were as a result of the terrible place in the last stages of consumption he sent home to die. Those who had been unjustly committed he set free. Light poured into the earthly pandemonium, and while the Governor did all that the law would allow him to do in the reformation of those who ought to go, his accomplished and Christian wife carried the Gospel of Christ through all the prison corridors and gathered the convicts Sabbath by Sabbath into the chapel, where she put them under the influence of prayer and song and religious exhortation. He who pardons the most is most like God, who abundantly pardons.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A. H. Mullins. Is Dr. Talmage justified in travelling on the Sabbath Day, when he speaks so strongly on its holy observance?

He does not travel on the Sabbath, except in a case of necessity or on a mission of mercy.

R. M. S., Philadelphia. Can I still procure one of those Oxford Teachers' Bibles and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, as I saw in the MAIL-BAG a few weeks ago, by sending two dollars?

Yes; you are still in time. The Bible will be sent immediately on receipt of your subscription.

"A Reader" writes as follows:

Many thanks for the piece from Margaret Sangster in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 4th, on "Folly of Overwork." It has been my sentiment for so long about the altering of one's dress when it is neat and wearable just to suit the latest fashion. As the writer states, "Why not be independent enough to adopt our own styles, to a certain extent?" Hold to that which is most becoming to the individual.

Friend of Korea. Will you please publish Minister Ye Sung Soo's address in Washington?

His address was Korean Legation, Washington, D. C., but he has gone to Korea. As stated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week, our investigations have disclosed the fact that the rumors circulated by the Legation of a famine in Korea were unfounded, and consequently no money or other contributions are needed.

J. Culherson, Ashland, O. I desire to make a collection of food and articles of need, to be sent to you for furnishing Korea? Would articles of clothing be of any use? Would it be better to have the flour bolted, or send it as graham flour?

See our answer to "Friend of Korea," in this column. U. S. Minister Sill has advised us that there is no famine there. Your energies might be applied profitably in aiding the thousands made destitute by the Constantinople earthquake.

Rev. F. H. Mullineaux, Bay View, Md. 1. What is the nature of the Parisian Sabbath? 2. In what countries is the Sabbath most desecrated? 3. Are there any known people or races in the world without any religion at all? 4. Is there any instance in history of the suffering mental anguish similar to that of Jesus, when his sweat drops were as blood? 5. Are there instances of friendship, like that of David and Jonathan, to be found in history? 6. Is there any proof that St. Paul was ever married? 7. Is the Coliseum of ancient Rome entirely destroyed? 8. In how many different languages and dialects is the Bible now printed?

A day of open licence: wineries, theatres, race-courses, opera, cafes, concert halls and dives in full operation. The pleasure day of the week; a day of amusement, carousal and indulgence. 2. Among so-called Christian countries, France is the worst offender. 3. The belief in unseen or spiritual agencies is universal, but there have been several races who seemed to have no idea of what we know as religion or of the existence of a Supreme Being. These people were to be found among the Brazilian Indians, the Gran Chaco Indians, and in Central and South Africa, the Caroline Islands, Papua and elsewhere. 4. Yes; several cases are cited by old medical writers, (see McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia on the subject); 5. Probably few so potent in some respects, although we may cite the friendships of Schiller and Goethe, of Socrates and Plato, of Plato and Anniceris (who ransomed the philosopher and would take no repayment) Damon and Pythias, Luther and Melancthon, or the more picturesque friendships of Mohammed and Abon-Bekr Roland and Oliver, and Epaminondas and Pelopidas. 6. None; see answer to New Subscriber, Howard, Ill., in Mail-Bag of last week. 7. Only the ruined shell of the edifice remains. 8. The American Bible Society now prints the Gospels in whole or in separate parts in nearly 150 different languages and dialects. We have not the statistics at hand concerning the number printed by British Societies.

Mrs. Lucy Fauble, Emington, Ill., writes:

Where can I get a little girl from eight to ten years, to adopt? We have no children of our own, and should like to adopt one. We can give her a comfortable home.

R. M. L., Woodstock, N. B. Is there a school of design or art for women in New York? I saw a notice in a paper nearly two years ago that such a school was to be opened?

Write to the Academy of Design, Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, New York, for all information on the subject.

E. K. B., Kansas. I want to tell you that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been the direct means of bringing two families to God. I had no peace of mind from the time I read in it of Christ's second coming, till I accepted Jesus about one month later. I thought of nothing else for weeks, only how I might gain this everlasting life and reign with Christ forever. I am surprised that so few believers know so little about His coming. I don't wonder so many fall away; having accepted Jesus, they let that end the matter, and in a few years fall away, never having the blessed hope of His coming.

Ed. Martin, Valley Falls, Kan. Do you think it right for a Christian man to play croquet on Sunday?

We hardly think you can be in earnest in asking the question. Sunday should be devoted to spiritual duties, and Christians should refrain from all worldly avocations and amusements on that day.

L. Roebert, Austin, Tex. I am greatly interested in the notes on foreign missionary work published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and in the Japanese idols pictured in your recent issue. What are the dimensions of the great Buddha at Kamakura?

The Dai Butsu at Kamakura, said to have been built 1,200 years ago, by Mikado Shoum, is sixty-four feet high, the face being sixteen feet long, eyes three feet, nine inches long, middle finger five feet long, ears eight and one-half feet long. These are the figures furnished by an American who has recently traveled in Japan, and we believe them to be fairly accurate.

J. R. Clark, Egremont Plain, Mass. I see in THE MAIL-BAG, "Subscriber" says a friend recollects hearing the following lines sixty or more years ago:

"Look stern on your way,
See your end, mark it well!"

I have an old book entitled, "Selected Hymns," published about 1816, containing the words. They differ a little from those lines, but were familiar and sung often when I was a boy. I am now seventy-four.

Subscriber will receive the verses forwarded by Mr. Clark, on sending his address to this office.

D. A. Stewart, Nairn, Ont. Write to Biglow and Main, Publishers, Ninth Street, New York.—W. H. Brown, Chester, Pa. The badge proposition is now under consideration.—Mrs. S. Mooney, Basine, Kan. We don't believe it was ever finished.—Old copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be sent to Clinton Wheeler, Care Mr. J. H. Patterson, Trenton, New Jersey, for prison distribution.—Mrs. H. M. Wilson. We don't know where they can be obtained here. The notice referred to was from England, we believe.—W. A. Leonard, Tarrytown, N. THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

CHINA'S NAVY BUSY.

CHINA is being forced against her will to prepare for warfare at sea. Her enemy who has a better navy, heavier guns, and better trained crews relying on her superior strength at sea is threatening China's ports. These are, for the greater part practically defenceless, the antiquated forts which are supposed to protect them being incapable of resisting the Japanese guns. A recent dispatch from Hong Kong shows that in preparing to meet the Japanese fleet China has betrayed her consciousness of the chief element of her weakness. She is trying to attract Europeans into her navy and has offered a bounty of $100 and a promise of $3000 in the event of death to any European who has served in a foreign fleet. A large number of Englishmen who have been employed in the customs at Hong Kong have resigned their positions to enter the Chinese navy, and many of them were formerly gunners or torpedo experts in the British navy. That such men are badly needed by China is evident from the descriptions of the naval arrangements being sent here by newspaper correspondents. As a specimen of the antiquated methods prevailing in the naval department, the illustration on this page of the coaling of a Chinese war-ship is significant. Labor is cheap in China, but this method of getting fuel on board must be costly, as well as slow. This and other antiquated methods will doubtless be soon changed if Europeans in any considerable number enter the navy. The Chinese cling to their old customs, and are averse to change, as the missionaries know by experience; but, with the perversity of human nature in all lands, they may be expected to adopt innovations that tend to the destruction of life, even while they reject the message that will save the soul. (Matt. 16: 2, 3.)

Naturalization Refused.

An Irishman's application for naturalization papers was rejected in a Court in Jersey City, N. J., a few days ago, on evidence that he produced. He produced his first papers, which were in due form, and made the required declaration. The Commissioner told him that the full papers would be granted if he would bring a citizen who could testify that he had remained in the United States during the interval between that time and the date of the first papers. The man went away, and a day or two afterwards renewed his application. He had been unable to find a witness as required by the Commissioner. He said, however, that he could furnish documentary evidence as to three years of the period. The evidence, when put in, was found to consist of a certificate, signed by the warden of Sing Sing prison, that the man had served a three year's sentence in that prison, for burglary committed about six months before his sentence was pronounced. The Commissioner looked at the man in surprise. "Do you expect," he asked, "to get papers on such evidence as this?" The man replied that he understood that all the Commissioner required was proof of his being in the country the time required and the document proved the fact. "Yes," was the reply; "it proves that and more. It proves your unfitness to become a citizen," and the application was accordingly rejected. The man was quite surprised that residence was not sufficient and could not understand character entering into the question. Similar surprise will be felt at the last by some who will seek entrance into Christ's kingdom on the ground of church membership. They will learn that although they have eaten and drunk in his presence, and he has taught in their streets he will not receive them if they have been "workers of iniquity." (Luke 12: 26.)

All this he might bear cheerfully if he had the Christian's hope of eternal reward. The despot for whom he fought and bled could not reward him, but he who suffers in the cause of Christ is sure of abundant recompense. (Mark 10: 30.)

Severe Marital Discipline.

A sentence, which has caused some surprise in the community, was pronounced a few days ago by a Connecticut justice, on a husband who was convicted of ill-treating his wife. The wife testified that her husband had tied her ankles together and had lowered her, head downward into a well. Her head had been submerged for a few moments and then raised to enable her to get breath. She was held an inch or two above the water and ducked again and again until she was almost suffocated. After torturing her in this way for some time, the husband drew her up to the surface and released her. He did not deny her statement, but pleaded that he was justified in inflicting the punishment. He said, she neglected her home and her four children several districts in Minnesota, Colorado and Nebraska. The Botanical division of the Department calls the attention of the farmers of those States to the fact that it is almost impossible to get rid of the pest even by burning, but adds that it may be eradicated by cutting it down before it seeds. It is harmless at that time, but if the seed makes its appearance it will be too late to do anything this season, as the seed may be disseminated for miles and next year the work of extirpating it will be much greater and more difficult. A similar warning is given in the Bible as to sin. If it is not eradicated in the heart, it will bear seed in the life and will do mischief to the sinner and to others that can never be undone. (James 1: 15.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Last Year in Response to a Request made by the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, many of our readers were kind enough to furnish him with the names of twenty-five church members or adult Sunday School workers, in return for which they received a beautiful section of Olive Wood, cut from the Mount of Olives and polished in Jerusalem by workmen from Bethlehem. We have all these names now on file in our office, but would like to increase the list. We, therefore, make the same liberal offer namely, a section of genuine Olive Wood for every twenty-five new names, not repetition—but names which have not been already sent in, and hope that as many of our subscribers as can supply such names will avail themselves of this generous proposal. The Olive Wood is sent either by mail or express, all charges prepaid. Do not enclose communication of any other character in the application. Address your letter Premium Department, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has received a cable message from its missionaries in Korea saying that all are well, and there is good order, and the presence of the United States marines insures safety.

The Central Union Mission, of Washington, D. C., is using temporarily a Gospel wagon obtained from Baltimore instead of the one unfortunately destroyed by fire at Knox's stables. There was a small insurance on the wagon, and with this and some new subscriptions for the purpose, a new and better wagon will be built ready for next season.

Rev. James Allan Wylie, the missionary at Liayang, north of Newchwang, who, as recently announced by cable, died of injuries received from Chinese soldiers on their march to Korea, was born in Hamilton in 1853; he was licensed by that presbytery in 1886, and sailed for Manchuria in January, 1888.

A brilliant Oxford student who went to Africa and died after a year's work, said before starting to a friend who urged him not to risk his life: "I think it is with African missions as with the building of a great bridge. You know how many stones have to be buried in the earth, all unseen, for a foundation. If Christ wants me to be one of the unseen stones, lying in an African grave, I am content."

A Remarkable Revival in the Immanuel Baptist Church of Denver, Colo., has followed the preaching of Rev. C. H. Stull, an eloquent evangelist not yet twenty years old. He is described as having a thorough knowledge of the Bible and as a preacher of strong originality. He is now preaching at Victor whence he will go through the Cripple Creek District.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions informs us that in our article on the Rev. Satori Kato's Mission in this journal on Aug. 29th, we gave the Presbyterian Mission in Japan credit for a larger work than that mission has. The statistics given are those of the Church of Christ in Japan which includes beside the Presbyterian Mission, the Reformed Church, the Cumberland Presbyterian Mission, the Woman's Union Missionary Society, and other societies. The Board also desires it to be understood that it encourages independent evangelistic effort on the part of native Japanese, but that it declined to endorse Mr. Kato's work for personal reasons, which were all the more cogent because Mr. Kato had not the confidence of his native brethren.

A Six Days' Convention for the Study of Holiness will be held Sept. 25-30, at St. Bartholomew's Mission, 42d St., near Third avenue, New York. Among the subjects included in the programme are: "Bible Holiness"; "The Second Blessing"; "The Work of the Holy Spirit"; and "The Internal Mission of the Holy Ghost." Many eminent clergymen are expected to take part in the proceedings. Among them are: Rev. Stephen Merritt; Rev. A. B. Simpson; Rev. Henry Wilson, D.D.; Rev. E. I. D. Pepper, D.D.; Rev. I. Simmons, D.D.; Rev. Joseph Smith, D.D.; and Rev. Benjamin Adams, D.D. Special terms can be arranged for the accommodation of persons from a distance, if application is made at once to Col. H. H. He said he was a native of Switzerland and was in his hundredth year. As corroborative evidence of the fact, he showed a badge for marksmanship which he had won and which bore the date of 1816. Before he was twenty years old, he had served a campaign in the army of the first Napoleon. He remained with the army until after the downfall of Napoleon, when he returned to Switzerland and resumed farming. Fifty years ago he came to America with his wife and obtained work on a farm. He afterward got a living as an expert gardener. Still later he and his wife plaited baskets and peddled them about the country. His wife died some fifteen years ago and the old man married again, the woman being as poor as himself. The couple finally became too old to work and the people of the town where they were, gave them some food and railroad tickets to a town in New Jersey. That town sent them to Paterson, N. J., where some one gave them their fare to New York. The old man's body was covered with wounds received in battle. A scar crossed his face where he had been struck by a sabre; both his arms had been perforated with bullets and he had a gunshot wound in his shoulder and a bayonet wound in the leg. Yet in and spent her time in frivolous pleasure with idle, worthless young men. She had paid no attention to his warnings, so he had found it necessary to punish her. It was expected that the husband would receive a severe sentence for his offence, but the Justice said that, taking into account the provocation the man had received, he thought the justice of the case would be met by inflicting a fine of five dollars. It is generally regarded as a grossly inadequate sentence for such an offense, but the judge appears to have thought that the woman's conduct called for discipline. Unhappily, such discipline would be more likely to exasperate her than to reclaim her. If it were to lead her to abandon the courses which must end in her temporal and eternal ruin, then she would have cause to be grateful to her husband for administering it. The doom of the wicked, as described in the Bible, is so dreadful that whatever interposes to save a thoughtless person from it is a blessing, even though it involves pain or humiliation. SERMONS WORTH READING

Helpful Discourses for the People.

A JUST MAN.

A Sermon delivered in the First Baptist Church, Richmond, Va., by Rev. Dr. J. B. Hawthorne, of Atlanta, Ga. Text: Proverbs 9: 9. "A just man."

No man is absolutely just in himself. The best man in the world is defective somewhere. At some point he defects from the straight line of rectitude. No one has ever excelled the apostle Paul in purity and nobility of character, but even Paul was full of weaknesses. He says, "When I would do good, evil is present with me." Profoundly conscious of his natural depravity he exclaimed, "Oh! wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" While no man is absolutely just in himself, he may become legally just by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ. Here we have God's merciful plan of redemption. Christ is "the end of the Law for righteousness to every one that believeth." "There is therefore no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." A man whom divine law does not condemn is just in the sight of God. "Being justified by faith we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." The Christian believer is just, not in the sense that he has been in all things obedient to divine law, but because Christ has taken his place and obeyed the law for him. The believer shall be saved, not for what he is in himself, nor for what he has done that was good, but for what Christ is and for what Christ has done for him.

Honest Effort.

A man may be comparatively just in himself—he may in some degree become personally righteous. In everything that constitutes virtue he may be so far in advance of the generality of men as to warrant us in calling him a just man. Every true believer in the Son of God bears some resemblance to him who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners. The inevitable fruit of his union with Christ is a life of honest effort to be like Christ. To say that a true Christian is destitute of the qualities which make up the character of the just man is to deny that union with Christ is helpful to human life and conduct. Every sincere believer in the Lord Jesus Christ is a just man—not absolutely just, —but comparatively so.

A just man is one who understands, approves, admires, loves, and conscientiously endeavors to obey the ethical principles laid down in the Bible for the regulation of human conduct. The character of the just man is a combination of many elements, every one of which is indispensable. The absence of any one of them renders character weak and unsightly. I will go further and say that the character of the just man is a combination of many elements in right proportions. A man may have enough of one quality, and too little of another. That makes a defective, distorted and repulsive character. Or he may have one essential element complete, and be totally deficient in another that is equally essential. Just here many a man makes his Fatal Mistake.

A man's intellectual perceptions of morality may be almost perfect, while in practice he may be very immoral. The castist is not necessarily a just man. He may be a very bad man. While his discriminations between right and wrong may be correct; while he may be able to define any duty and any deflection from rectitude with the utmost precision, his own life and character may be almost destitute of virtue. Look at Lord Bacon. How sublimely he taught, but how miserably he practiced. Who could surpass him in a definition of honesty, and who could excel him in violating a deep and sacred conviction in the presence of the meanest temptation? Verily he was the wisest, the greatest, and the meanest of mankind.

A man may be sentimentally just, but practically very unjust. Hold up before him an example of unswerving integrity in the commercial world: tell him of a merchant who failed in business, and who, rather than have his creditors suffer, gave up his home, and furniture, and jewels, and then lived on half rations until he had paid the last farthing, and no words can express the depth and intensity of his admiration for such an exhibition of honor. And yet, perhaps, that man, so appreciative of honesty in others, is of his own financial obligations. There are some of us who if we had less faith in these sentimental moralists, would have now more comfort for our families and more money for the Lord's cause. One of the most exceptional and prodigious liars that I ever encountered, would become almost frantic with admiration when confronted by a man who was brave enough to swear to his own hurt, and to speak the truth in the face of any peril to his own property and person. Who had a loftier conception of moral purity and integrity than Daniel Webster? Who among the great orators of the world, living or dead, has surpassed the eloquence of some of his tributes to men prominent for their moral worth? But every one familiar with the life of Webster knows that it was stained by some of the meanest and most disgusting vices. A man may be profoundly learned, and grandly eloquent, but if he be the slave of some earth-born passion there is not much of true manhood in him.

We find in every community what may be called the spasmodic moralist—the man who deems himself just because he occasionally surprises the public by some unusually honorable and useful act. Five years ago, perhaps, he startled the community by a fierce denunciation of some obscene theatrical exhibition. With righteous indignation he depicted the harvest of debauchery that must follow the toleration of such iniquities. To-day, in response to some fervid and pathetic appeal, he gives a thousand dollars for the support of a public charity. This looks well, but the five years intervening between these two commendable acts, were filled with words and deeds indicative of a character selfish, grovelling, and mean almost to the last degree. Sad indeed it is when a man's good acts are dictated by a momentary impulse, and his bad ones proceed from a fixed and steady-working principle.

Spasmodic Benevolence.

Once, in closing a sermon on Thanksgiving, I spoke of the destitution of a poor family I had visited a few days before. As I was going down the church steps after the service, an old gambler approached me, upon whose face the darkest histories were written, put a five dollar bank bill in my hand, and requested me to use it in relieving the wants of the family to which I had made allusion in my sermon. I doubt not that the impulse which prompted him to make that contribution was philanthropic. I doubt not that his heart was touched with real pity for the poor. How should I judge the character of that man? By that one isolated act, the product of a momentary impulse? Or by the whole career of dishonesty and knavery which preceded it? A few years after the occasion referred to I met that man on a railway train. I sat down beside him and depicted to his mind's eye the dark doom that awaited him if he should fail to repent of his wickedness. He trembled, he wept, he admitted the truth and force of all I said, but he was joined to his idol, and died as he lived, a miserable and despised gambler. Shall we say that a man is just because at intervals in a life of great corruption we see a virtuous deed? No; it is not what a man does once a year, but what he does every day that reveals his real character. Let no man delude himself with the thought that he is truth-loving and God-fearing, because he gives a few hundred dollars every year to the support of the Gospel. Over against that one act of benevolence, there may be a thousand acts which indicate that he loves money, and pleasure, and self, more than the truth of God.

Do you claim to be a just man? Why should I believe you to be just? Because you pay your pew-rent and come to the Lord's house on Sunday? That does not prove it. Let me see that in the six days between the Sundays you live a life of loyalty to God's law, and that God's cause is nearer and dearer to your heart than business, or politics, or friends, or pleasure, and then I will stand here by the authority of high heaven and pronounce you righteous and meet for the kingdom of glory.

Conscientious But Unjust.

A man must not deem himself just merely because he is conscientious. Some of the most extremely conscientious men I have ever met were notoriously unjust. A man is not an artist because he has hands. He is not a linguist because he has a tongue. He is not a philosopher because he has a mind, neither is he just because he has a conscience. The artist has educated hands, the linguist has an educated tongue, the philosopher an educated mind, and the just man has an educated conscience. An ignorant conscience may lead a man to do many foolish and unwarranted things. It may incite him to deeds unjust, cruel and inhuman. It may prompt him to lead a riot, burn a house, wreck a railroad train, or to plunge his dagger into the breast of an innocent person. It was such a conscience that inspired Prendergast to assassinate Carter Harrison, Guiteau to take the life of President Garfield. An ignorant conscience may tell you to join some underground, dark-lanterned, oath-bound combination of men, whose purpose is to persecute every man who differs from them in religious belief. An educated conscience will tell you that it is unjust and ungodly to proscribe any man for his religious opinions and practices, and that any form of religious intolerance is un-Christian, unbrotherly, unpatriotic, un-American, unmanly and disgraceful. An ignorant conscience makes the religious crank—the man who is adjustable to no circumstances, and whose religious zeal expends itself in contending for such distinctions as exist between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee. There is no end to the chapter of mistakes which men make in judging others.

There is a man who cultivates a certain class of virtues, and on that account imagines himself just, and exceptionally just, though he wilfully equally if not more important. With an air of supreme self-complacency he is going up and down the earth saying, "I pay my debts. I owe no man anything." He imagines that debt-paying is queen of all the virtues, and that having that, he can afford to be destitute of every virtue. Yes, he pays his debts, but that is not conclusive proof of his honesty. He may pay his debts, not because it is right in the sight of God, but because the preservation of his commercial credit depends upon it. If he could go on and do business successfully without paying his debts, he might not be so eager and prompt to pay them. I know many an old curmudgeon drawing in and hiding away, as if God's universe were nothing but a raking-ground, who, while he is notably punctilious in meeting his financial obligations, would swindle the poorest hoddie-carrier or needle-woman in America.

But you may pay your debts as a matter of principle—you may pay them because it is right and honorable, and still be unworthy of the grand and glorious title of just men. The just is a character infinitely transcending such narrow limits. It is a character which combines virtues of all classes—a character in whose presence every divine ordinance and every human interest and right is sacred and inviolate. The just man is not afraid to have the transactions of his life exposed to the light of day. He does not shrink from an honest investigation of his conduct and character. If employers were always the just men they claim to be, they would never oppose the submission of the controversy between them and their employees to the arbitrament of impartial and fair-minded men.

It is when they know their conduct to be unjust and oppressive that they oppose arbitration. If the Labor Unions and their leaders were the lovers of the Golden Rule of the Gospel that they profess to be, they would not inflict such terrible injuries as they sometimes do upon millions of innocent people for the sake of punishing the man who has wronged them.

The Just Politician.

I need not go beyond the limits of this ancient commonwealth to find bad politicians—some of them your representatives in legislative councils, and others candidates for your suffrages—who while they pride themselves on being just, and are treated with the respect which none but the just deserve, live as though the moral law of God were a mere convenience to be honored or dishonored, obeyed or disobeyed, as their selfishness may dictate. Such men are worthy only of your reprobation. The moral law is as high and holy as the Adorable Being who gave it, and it is nothing less than infamy to despise it as some of your office-seekers are wont to do.

If one of these aspiring politicians should be convicted of a private lie, perhaps it would be fatal to his political prospects; but if he invents a campaign lie—a roaring, thundering, rousing lie, which misleads the people and helps his party, it only adds lustre to his name and strength to his cause. You can scarcely look into the columns of certain political newspapers without finding some partisan editorial which contains statements that the writer knows to be false, and knows, moreover, that most of his readers believe them to be false; but because they are written for campaign purposes, and in the interest of his party, he is treated as if there were no wrong, no dishonor, no disgrace, no damnation in lying about such matters.

A just man is he who chooses all the virtues, combines them in right proportions, and preserves them in harmonious action. He is honest—honest every where and in every thing. He is conscientious, and just as conscientious in his business and in his politics, as he is at the prayer-meeting and at the communion-table. He is benevolent, and not in one direction only, but in every direction. He gives what he solemnly believes God requires him to give, and would give it just as cheerfully in secret as in public. He has the courage to seek and to know the truth, and to proclaim it from the house-tops. He to God, and observes them at home and abroad. If Sunday finds him in gay and Godless Paris, he is the same devout and consistent Christian there that he was a few Sundays ago in Richmond. He has a living and abiding principle of loyalty to God within him, which keeps him from anything wrong and ignoble, whether it be open or secret, great or small. Such men are pillars of truth, temples of the living God, and the light of the world. May God multiply their seed until they possess the earth.

The glory of the just man is from within. It is a radiation. Put him where you will and he will shine, because the Lord God has filled him with the light of life. They cast Paul into prison, but the light that was in him as he slept in the Mamertine dungeon, was just as visible as that which flashed from him when he stood upon Mars Hill and reasoned with the philosophers of Greece. The Roman tyrant supposed that he had quenched the light of the Apostle John when he banished him to a desolate rock in the midst of the ocean; but the grand old servant of God had not long been there when the isles of the Aegean Sea, and all the coasts around, kindled with sunset visions too gorgeous to be described. The ecclesiastical despots of England thrust John Bunyan into Bedford Jail, hoping thereby to get rid of the influence of his piety and genius; but he had not long been there before the murky horizon of Britain began to flame with fiery symbols, delectable mountains, celestial mansions, and white pilgrims grouped on golden hills.

A just man is a God-made king, and you cannot dethrone him. The newspapers cannot write him down, the mob cannot silence his voice, and the hired instruments of moral assassination cannot destroy the power of his name. God be praised that a few such men still linger on the earth. These are the mountains of our moral scenery. Through them we have hope of a purer civilization and a happier world.

CHINA'S IDOLS FALLING.

Rev. Dr. Wooley Tells How Hundreds of Young Men and Women Have Been Brought to Christ.

FROM AN OCCASIONAL CORRESPONDENT

ALL will rejoice to know of the awakening which is sweeping over this part of China. We are having a continuous revival within and without the church. Many who have abandoned their idols and united with the church and were merely nominal Christians with a knowledge only of the cardinal truths of the Bible, are now learning by experience what repentance, faith and salvation mean, and are bringing forth the fruits of righteousness in Christ-like lives. Our native ministers have received a fresh baptism of power, and the Holy Spirit gives unction to the preached Word, and hundreds of heathen are inquiring the way of life.

Last winter I called my native preachers and helpers together for a week of Bible study, prayer and consecration. From the first it was evident they had come longing to be filled with all the fullness of God. Some of them had received a baptism at the last conference and now sought new strength for the year's work. We were all conscious of a great need, and "continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, waiting for the promise of the Father;" and our prayers were not in vain, for the Spirit came upon us with mighty power. How those stolid Chinese rejoiced and shed tears of joy in the new-found experience! And the fire there kindled has been burning ever since throughout the whole district.

Soon afterwards I began a revival in our principal church, where several hundred students worship. In these meetings also the Holy Spirit was present, and over a hundred were saved, most of whom are young men and women expecting to devote their lives to church work among their own people.

In fact, everybody seems to have caught the spirit of victory. The preachers and helpers went forth from those meetings with burning zeal, and already the success attending their labors far exceeds our highest expectations. God is teaching us many lessons, and now more plainly that it is not by might nor by power, but by his Spirit; and that our faith heretofore has failed to appropriate his great and precious promises for the salvation of the heathen world. Every station has been blessed with a gracious revival; many new fields have been opened, and for a long time hardly a week has passed without an invitation to begin preaching and establish a Christian school in some town or village. During the last six months fourteen such stations have been opened with most encouraging prospects. In order to meet these providential openings, fourteen students from the Theological Seminary have been appointed pastor-teachers, and every Sunday several more are sent to hold services in other new fields.

Guoh-tah, a village of nearly ten thousand, was the first place opened this year. The common people received us gladly, but the literati opposed, and for a time, by threats to property owners, prevented us from renting. However, at last we succeeded, and ere long both school-room and chapel proved too small. Every night the chapel is filled with attentive, eager listeners, and fifty-four bright boys are studying Christian books in our school. Already several families have given up their idols and openly professed faith in Christ. Only a few days since, a silver-smith in this town, very different from Demetrius with whom Paul contended in Ephesus, brought me two large baskets full of his household gods, knowing I wanted to send them to friends in America. Some people have a great many gods; in case one is angry, and gives unfavorable answers to their prayers, they can consult another.

That there is a wide-spread and constantly increasing distrust of idolatry, gives hope for the speedy triumph of Christianity. Many people are on the verge of turning from idols of wood and stone to the True and Living God. Recently I was talking to a man about the folly of trusting in gods which could not even protect themselves, and he acknowledged he often thought the same, but he had heard we only wanted them to believe in our religion in order to get their eyes and brains for medicine and their blood for opium, and he was afraid of us and the doctrine.

Teng Kan is another large village with a population of eight thousand. For over thirty years the people have rejected the truth and refused us admission to the town. Last year a young man was brought to Christ, and soon all his relatives were interested in the doctrine. They invited us to send them a preacher, which we did, and now over a hundred people are seeking Christ. About forty have forsaken their idols and joined the church. We have one large boys' school and two girls' schools. Some of the leading literary men have been converted, and they confidently expect hundreds of people to be saved in the very near future. The whole town is astir on the subject of the new religion. I never visit the place without preaching to an audience of from two to five hundred, who will stand in the open air for hours to hear the good news. Recently after the native preacher and I had preached till we were hoarse, proposing to dismiss informally, the people requested us to sing and pray as we did at the beginning, so they could learn how we worship. These are only samples of fourteen places opened this year and a promise of what may be expected in hundreds of villages if we are ready to "go up and possess the land."

In Foochow City there are nearly a million souls and in the two counties adjoining are two millions more. In all this region we have only six chapels, with seating capacity for less than two thousand. Most of the people are very poor, especially those among whom the Gospel is gaining its richest trophies. I fear if I should describe their condition some will be inclined to doubt my veracity. Indeed, one who has never lived in the Orient hardly knows the meaning of the word poverty. Artisans, farmers and all laboring classes earn from eighteen to thirty dollars a year. After feeding and clothing themselves and families out of this, they have very little left, and yet many of them give liberally for the support of the Gospel. But it is almost impossible for such people to erect suitable houses of worship; and to rent is out of the question, for there are no rooms large enough to accommodate the congregations. The members will subscribe, work and give what money they can, but they must have some help. In most places, with fifty dollars aid, they could build a church with seating capacity for seventy-five, and with one hundred dollars, seating capacity for one hundred and fifty, and so on up. We ought to build a dozen or more chapels in the next twelve months, but cannot without assistance.

ISRAEL AND THE NATIONS.

BY REV. H. M. PARSONS, D.D.*

THE messianic kingdom was and is the special object of Jewish hope. It was the kingdom which Christ presented to the Jews in his first proclamation: "Repent, for the kingdom of the heavens is at hand." By that phrase, "Kingdom of the heavens," was and is meant, the rule in manifested form on the earth of the principles and government which obtain in the heavenly places, and in all parts of the universe inhabited by holy beings.

Its intention is to release the earth from the usurped sway of Satan, and restore the rightful allegiance of all nations to Jehovah as the coming King. Its purpose is the material blessing of the earth, and prosperity and glory of the nations and Israel dwelling upon the globe in mortal bodies. This distinction of the calling of Israel and of the church, is marked in every Scripture promise made to them respectively.

The church's hope is the return of the Lord to bring them into his glory, and to their mansions prepared in the heavens. Its bond is the mystical union in Christ the head of the body, which is not applied to any other members of the kingdom of God.

The great necessity for observing this plain distinction in the dispensations of the Bible, is manifest from the utter confusion now existing among intelligent Christians. In the interpretation of the phrase, the "Kingdom of the heavens,"

The church is regarded by many faithful and devoted believers, as commissioned to bring the nations into subjection to the righteous rule of Messiah; and therefore that the Jews are to be counted as individuals, and become part of the church, but that they will have no national restoration.

A close attention to the words of Scripture must dispel this illusion from honest minds. Israel was appointed to bring the nations to God, and therefore is the "everlasting nation." The church is in the parenthesis of time, in which, under the sway of the Gentiles, Israel, the "peculiar treasure," is hid in the earth. The mission of the church is to the individual sinner of all nations, to form one nation, who as co-rulers with Messiah, shall in glorified bodies like his, judge angels and the world. The mission of Israel is as a nation to the nations, to bring them en masse to Christ. Our hope is heavenly; the Jew's hope is earthly; the church is Christ's heavenly bride, Israel the earthly bride.

First, in accordance with this plan, let us observe this contrast of Israel as to its position in the earth. This is plainly evident in the promise to Abraham: In his call to separation, the Lord said (Gen. 12: 3): "In thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed." In consultation as the friend of God, before the destruction of Sodom (Gen. 18: 8), the Lord said: "And all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him." Again to Abraham at the sacrifice of Isaac, because of his obedience (Gen. 22: 18): "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." To Isaac as the heir to the same promise (Gen. 26: 4), and because of his father Abraham, "and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." In this fourfold promise, repeated at intervals, that were crises in the patriarchal history, the emphasis is upon Israel's relation to the nations on the earth. The dealings of Jehovah with that nation in all their dispensational life, reveal the same purpose and place. Obedience and loyalty to God as their King, were followed in every instance by temporal prosperity and advancement. Denial and rebellion in every case by the reverse—disaster and subjection.

The position and place of the church in the New Testament is in marked contrast. Her hope an heavenly one. Her abode in the heavens. Her glory in the union to Christ to reign with him over the earth. Israel's glory is to reign over the nations under Christ, and his bride the church. The messianic kingdom on the earth is therefore the object of promise, and the subject of prophecy. The nations with Israel at their head, will be under the righteous and just government of Messiah.

He is the king's son of the seventy-second Psalm, under whom the earth shall enjoy millennial glory. "Men shall be blessed in him," "All nations shall call him blessed."

CONSECRATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning Sept. 30.
Romans 12: 1-21.

FEW people live entirely to themselves. In nearly every life there is some inspiration, some motive compelling force outside. A man may seem hard and cold in his business or profession, may seem to have little sympathy or gentleness in his nature, and to be given up to the attainment of power or wealth; yet when we know him more intimately we find that he is toiling not for himself but for his wife, or child, or sister, or some loved one who is dependent on him. The man is not the cold, selfish being we thought him, but is sacrificing himself for some one dearer to him than himself. Every one has seen such lives and the majority have felt such influences. The passage assigned for the Topic recognizes the possibility of lives being so affected and would subject them to one all-pervading power. The Apostle asks his readers to present their bodies as a living sacrifice to God and says it is a reasonable service. His previous line of argument brings him to this practical conclusion. God having redeemed men from the punishment and power of sin is entitled to the sacrifice. It is as if a man afflicted with a loathsome disease lay in prison under sentence of death and some benefactor healed him of his malady and secured him a pardon. The life thus rescued and purified would be a ransomed life on which there would be a moral claim. Ungrateful indeed would he be who refused to admit his obligation to such a benefactor. This fact established, the apostle proceeds to describe what such a saved life would be. It is consecrated, that is made sacred, and must be spent as a faithful steward would administer a trust. "Ye are not your own," he tells another church. It follows that what has been given to God, yet is still under our control must be used with a constant consciousness of its true ownership. Whatever gift the consecrated man has must be used conscientiously in that one service. The daily life is to be characterized by humility, mercy, liberality, love, sympathy, magnanimity, honesty and forbearance. And lastly, living among evil, the evil must not overcome, but be overcome by good. That briefly is the way the consecrated man must live. It is not an easy life. The obligations are far more penetrating than any law. They require a new heart and a new spirit. The natural man cannot live such a life. But the apostle is writing to a people who are supposed to have new hearts and he would have them give expression in their lives to the nature they have received. The act of consecration, therefore, is no trivial matter. It is a bondage, but a bondage more glorious and elevating than the widest liberty. It is to live God's life, because it belongs to him and he who lives it becomes God-like, the highest dignity possible to human nature.

PERSONAL RECORD CARDS.

From Detroit, Mich., comes a suggestion which deserves the consideration of all young people's societies, which have not yet some similar system in operation. In a letter to the "Baptist Union," an officer of the Baptist Young People's Union of the Eighteenth Street Church of that city, gives strong testimony to the value of the "Personal Record Card." The card simply contains a statement of the number of times, during a month or quarter, that a member has been present and has participated in the exercises of the meetings of the Union. It has a blank for the number of meetings held, another blank for the number of times the member was present, and a third for the number of times he took part. Below this record, the pledge is printed so that, as in the deadly parallel column, the person receiving the card can see at a glance to what extent he has been faithful to the pledge. The writer says that it has been found well to intrust to one committee the duty of keeping a record, and that committee fills out the blank cards and sends them to the individual members. No report is made to the Union or to the chairman, but the report is sent to the member concerned and his own conscience does the rest. The results of the system have been found most beneficial and as there is no patent on such devices, the idea is at the service of any society, union, or league in which it may be useful.

THREE KING'S DAUGHTERS.

Every wearer of the little silver cross among our readers will be glad to see the three portraits which, by the courtesy of the

THREE EMINENT KING'S DAUGHTERS.

MRS. STUCKENBERG.

MISS M. BAKER.

MISS MABEL CADY.

Secretaries of the Order, appear on this page. They are the portraits of ladies whose devotion to the Order, and whose energy in promoting its usefulness in their respective spheres, have won for them the respect and admiration of all who know of their work.

Mrs. J. H. W. Stuckenberg is the President of a Circle connected with the American Church in Berlin. She is the wife of the pastor of the church, and organized the Circle in her own home six years ago. Visitors to the German capital know her well, and many have had reason to bless the hour that first brought them into relation with her. One who has had the honor and pleasure of working with her for some time as the Secretary of the Circle, says: "Her charming manner, keen appreciation of the good, the true, and the beautiful, quick insight into human nature, ready sympathy, helpful advice and strong personality, give her a wonderful power with all ages. She knows the besetting temptations, and how they are to be met, and she also knows the way to a young girl's heart. She has been a continual blessing here, and an inspiration to many American girls." Perhaps nowhere so much as in a great European city does a Christian girl, far away from her home, need the loving sympathy and wise counsel of a good woman. She might never be brought into contact with one in the peculiar relations where such help can be given were it not for some such organization as this of the King's Daughters. Mrs. Stuckenberg realized the fact and she formed the Circle and had a notice of its existence and time and place of meeting placed in her husband's church so that American girls visiting the city might be able to avail themselves of its privileges. From Berlin to Hiawatha, Kan., is a far cry, but the Order of King's Daughters finds its principles as capable of application in one place as in the other and the need for work in His Name as urgent. The Heart-ease Circle, as Miss Susan M. Baker describes its work, must be a real blessing to the Kansas town. "We have given away," she says, "a great deal of clothing, provisions to poor families at Easter and at Thanksgiving, paid small coal bills, taxes, interest on mortgages; sent $10 to the Home for the Friendless at Leavenworth; two boxes of magazines to the Indian School at Lawrence, Kan.; a box of clothing to a member of the Circle who is at work in Alabama, and a box of cooking caps and aprons to a friend who has an Indian School in New Mexico." The means to do this work came from dues, from entertainments, and from contributions of sympathetic friends. In emergencies, the Circle has solicited orders for work, and the members have cut and stitched while one of the number has read to the others; so the afternoons have been passed with pleasure to all and with profit to the treasury on which there are so many claims.

Miss Mabel Cady, the third member of the group, is the President of the "In His Name" Circle, of Moline, Ill. This has been a busy year for the Circle, for the wheels in the "City of Mills" have been stationary and the families who look to them for food and clothing have been in sore straits. The Circle of twenty-five members has relieved much of the consequent misery. All the churches of the city are represented in the membership, for Christians of every name can find common Arthur, the leader of the Circle at Edmont, will be on hand to extend hospitality and speak words of encouragement. It reminds one of apostolic days; of Paul, in his journeyings being "brought on his way by the brethren." II Cor. 1: 16.

Miss Thomson is not the first of our members who has devoted herself to mission work in the Northwest, as Miss Mellish, of Chatham, was sent to Mr. Burman's Indian school two years ago by the Quebec W. A. She formed a Circle among the Indian girls there, and says it proved a great benefit to them. Miss Josie Raymond went to a school in Saskatchewan. Three others went to Church of England missions.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A committee appointed by the Endeavor Union of Massillon, O., to protest against Sunday base-ball games secured from the authorities a promise that the law should be enforced.

The St. Louis Young Men's Christian Association is about to hold a series of evangelistic meetings. Mr. Charles Inglis the English Evangelist has been engaged to conduct them for the first two weeks.

Endeavor Thanksgiving week, instituted in Victoria and New South Wales, has been very successful, inspiring and enthusiastic meetings being held, and generous contributions given to aid in extending and carrying on the Endeavor cause.

The advance of Endeavor in Australasia continues. Rev. W. L. Close, writes: "We crossed the thousand line in the number of societies some time ago. The last returns gave 1,118 societies, with 34,870 members. This in six years. Victoria still heads the list with 460 societies, and 15,000 members; South Australia has 270 societies, and 7,000 members; New South Wales 197 societies, and 6,000 members."

The Pennsylvania railroad department of the Young Men's Christian Association at Philadelphia, keeps its building open all night for the accommodation of crews running into the city late. There are beds for fifteen men. The library contains 2,000 volumes. The membership of the Association is now 1,200.

The Baptist Young People's Union of Tulare, Cal., conducts and maintains a Gospel Mission Sunday School, and has organized a rescue work among fallen women. It also has a hotel committee to see that visitors to the city are invited to the churches and the Union's public meetings.

A new departure has been taken by the Wesleyan Guild Chapter of the Epworth League at Ann Arbor, Mich. A field secretary has been engaged at a good salary to work among the students of the University of Michigan in the interest of the League and Methodism generally.

A Christian Endeavor society with forty members, and representing six different denominations, has been formed in the Eighth Regiment of the National Guard of Pennsylvania. Meetings will be held every Sunday, when the regiment is in camp at other times the meeting will be held every quarter, and the members will work in the regular societies to which they already belong.

The English Wesleyan Conference adopted the following resolutions: That a committee be appointed to consider the desirability of instituting a distinct branch of work among our young people, which while devising its own scope of operation should utilize all the best points secured by the Epworth League, the Junior Epworth League, Boys' Brigades, Bands of Hope, Christian Endeavor Societies and Mutual Improvement Societies.

The Christian Endeavor Union of Cleveland, O., has initiated a movement for the moral improvement of the city. Besides operating for the enforcement of the Sunday laws, it has taken up the Temperance work. A united effort has been organized which includes Protestant and Roman Catholic Societies, Endeavor Societies, Good Templars, Women's Christian Temperance Unions and kindred organizations for practical work in the Temperance cause.

ground in charitable deeds. The ingenuity of the ladies has been taxed to keep a balance in the treasury for emergencies, but with busy needles, with entertainments, with social teas at which the barrier that excludes the sterner sex was removed for a pecuniary consideration, with bazaars and by a host of other expedients the needs have been met and the Circle has continued its beneficent work. All honor to such women! They are true followers of Him, who went about doing good, and when they enter the presence of the King they will hear the words of welcome with which he greets those who have relieved want and suffering "In His Name."

MISSIONARY CIRCLES.

How the work of the King's Daughters and the principles which prompt their Christ-like activity develops in them desires for still more heroic service may be seen in the report which the Canadian Secretary of the order sends to the "Silver Cross." She says: The King's Daughters here and there are offering for work in the Foreign and Northwest mission fields.

Dr. Retta Gifford, from Owen Sound, Ont., was sent by the Methodist Woman's Foreign Missionary Society to Chentoo Tze, China, and is the medical superintendent of the hospital there. Miss Jennie Ford is training in the hospital here (London, Ont.), and expects to join Dr. Gifford in the autumn. Both are the King's Daughters. Just lately, Miss Thomson, leader of the Christ Church Circle (London), has gone to Bishop Young's Diocese, Athabasca, as a missionary. In traveling in this distant mission field, she will be met by different members of the Order, who will cheer and wish her God-speed. Mrs. Gibbs, of Port Arab Brides and Grooms.

Ancient Marriage Customs still Observed——A Picturesque Wedding Procession.

FROM patriarchal days down to the present time, there has been very little change or modification in Oriental wedding customs. Today, in many parts of Palestine, the ceremonies and observances connected with the betrothal, the marriage, and the subsequent feast are almost identical with those that prevailed in the time of our Lord's earthly sojourn. Almost since Abraham's day, the mode of selecting a bride, the betrothing and the settlement of the "marriage-price," have remained practically unchanged throughout Syria. In choosing a suitable wife for a son, the duty of making a selection devolves upon the father of the young man, and the proposals are made by him, a violation of this paternal prerogative being very rare indeed; but where there is a difference in rank, the negotiations may proceed from the father of the maiden. Her adult brothers, too, are consulted, and the entire arrangement is usually completed, even up to the point of betrothing and the fixing of the "marriage-price" before the girl is aware that anything affecting her future welfare has taken place. This "marriage-price"—in former times at least—was in no sense a settlement of money or goods upon the bride herself, but a compensation to her parents for the loss of her future services, as well as for the care and trouble they underwent in her education. Where the young man was unable to furnish an adequate "marriage-price" it was not unusual for him to stipulate to pay it in personal service, as Jacob did in the espousal of the daughters of Laban.

Among the Arabs, marriage is not as sacredly regarded as among the Jews. It is not a sacrament but a simple ceremony or contract, without any legal intervention or guarantee. In Moslem countries, for a man who has reached the proper age to abstain from marriage is deemed a disgrace. Many of the girls marry at thirteen and there are few who remain single after sixteen. Before marriage, the maiden is jealously guarded and it is almost impossible for the youth to obtain even a stolen glance at her face, unless she belongs to the very lowest classes of society. All the arrangements are made by proxy, even to the formal betrothing, the payment of two-thirds of the dowry and the terms of the marriage contract, before the youthful bride is informed of the fate that has been chosen for her.

Our illustration on this page presents a scene that is familiar in Arab cities. The wedding ceremony is completed, the Koran has been duly recited by the groom and all the men present, the balance of the dowry paid and the marriage contract duly signed, and now the youthful pair are proceeding to the home of the bridegroom. Among the wealthier Moslem families, there are multiplied observances on the occasion of a wedding, and usually an entire week is passed in processions, music, singing, and feasting. There is a procession with a band of musicians when the bride goes to the bath, and the concert is continued at her home on their return. Simultaneously the bridegroom is feasting and entertaining his friends at his own home. These joyous occasions, and especially the marriage feast, are frequently very elaborate and costly. Yet there are many marriages celebrated without pomp or display, in which the mere sentence: "I give myself up to thee," uttered by the bride, is sufficient to constitute a legal marriage. But even among the humblest, when a young girl is married, her female friends make some demonstration of joy, and if unable to bear the expense of a procession, with camels and musicians and a silken, gilded canopy for the bride, they take her, covered with a shawl (and some-peculiarity of Arab music that each individual seems to be conducting a solo on his own account.

These ceremonies ended, the bride of a Moslem husband has thereafter little share in his public life. Marriage closes the most prominent chapter of her career.

Childish Sympathy.

Let the children feel that they are necessary to mamma and papa as helpers, companions and confidants. See how quickly the little ones will fly to help, if only mamma needs that help. The greatest inducement to be orderly and put things in their places is that it saves mamma's steps. If the mother's head aches, let her rest it against her little girl's shoulder, and see how quickly responsive is the love and sympathy of that wee heart. How, after that, she will tip-toe around and whisper in her play, lest she should make the pain worse. If you have a growing boy, take his arm when you walk with him, and make much of his strength. Unselfish love cannot be widely severed from obedience. And finally, you must be interested in all that interests your children. Never be too busy to listen to long tales of happenings at school. Try to be radiant over the good

ONE HAPPY DAY.

JUST to let the Father do
What he will;
Just to know that he is true,
And be still.
Just to follow hour by hour
As he leadeth;
Just to draw the moment's power
As it needeth.
Just to trust him, that is all!
Then the day will surely be Peaceful, whatsoe'er befall
Bright and blessed, calm and free.
Just to leave in his dear hand,
Little things;
All we cannot understand,
All that stings.
Just to let him take the care
Sorely pressing;
Finding all we let him bear
Changed to blessing.
This is all! and yet the way
Marked by him who loves thee best;
Secret of a happy day,
Secret of his promised rest.

CONSECRATE YOUR VOICES.

WE must consecrate not only our feet unto God, our voice also must be his, writes Rev. J. L. McLaughlin. The human voice is the most powerful mode of expressing the emotions of the soul. With it we pour balm into the wounded heart and with it fresh wounds are made. That voice which thrills us with its sweet melody may not be heard above our heads, while the uncultured voice whose tones grate harshly upon our ears, for aught we know may be singing anthems to our King. It has been suggested that up above the earth all the noise, such as the clatter of the horses' hoofs, the rattle of wagons and the rumble of street cars upon the streets, the ringing of bells and the shrill tones of the whistle, the hum of ponderous machinery, is converged and blended into one harmonious strain.

Why may not this be true? If God can make even the wrath of man to praise him, can he not make music out of all the discordant notes of earth? Then I imagine that above all this may be heard the singing of birds, the running of brooks, the harmony of musical instruments, of choristers and vocalists of the whole round world. This is sweet music; but at still greater altitude may be heard all the kind words spoken to sorrowing hearts, the loving, tender, sympathetic heart-beats for suffering humanity, and the intercessory prayer as it goes to God in behalf of erring loved ones. This is rapturous music. And just by the pearly gates you may hear the heavenly music. It is that which causes joy in the presence of angels; it is the music of a human heart and life in harmony with God.

Look after your Girls' Books.

My gorge rises at the books I hear discussed in modern drawing-rooms, writes Mrs. Burton Harrison. I am told even school girls read these stories, written by women "with a purpose," happily sometimes too veiled to be perceived by their innocent readers. But who knows, if they are to explore all veins of thought, what our girls will not come to knowing or surmising? No, no; the girl of my imagination, like that of every honest and healthy-minded young person, is the old-fashioned Una sitting upon the lion's back, passing unsmirched through the world—the girl who loves and trusts, and accepts with womanly dignity the lot her Creator has set aside for her. As to some of the advisers of young femininity in these days—those who rant and shriek, and torment society without arriving at any result—time will yet settle with them according to their deserts for the mischief they are doing.

AN ARABIAN WEDDING PROCESSION.

times four or five girls mounted on the same camel), to her future home, the shrill joyful cries and the singing of the women affording a quaint substitute for the more imposing instrumental display. If the social standing of the parties permits, the bride is taken home on camel-back, under a handsome canopy, enveloped in white so as to be utterly unrecognizable, while her waiting-women follow, in somewhat similar fashion, on other camels immediately behind. She is always the central figure of the little procession. Sometimes she sits veiled and covered in a cart drawn by oxen, while the girls who have waited upon her, follow, draped in white muslin, riding on donkeys. The wedding music to a European or American ear sounds harsh and discordant; there is in it nothing of the sweetness of that grand "Wedding March," to which a very large proportion of the happy brides and grooms of civilization attune their early marriage steps. In advance of some of these processions are several men whose principal duty seems to be to make as much noise as possible, firing guns, beating gongs, shouting, stamping and gesticulating; behind these come the drums, semi-circular affairs with skins stretched over the cavity, and which, when struck, emit a noise not unlike the discharge of small fire-arms. Other musicians play on a variety of native instruments, and such is the times coming. Half of a child's happiness consists in anticipation. A promised treat next week will keep up a pleasurable excitement that will color with rosy hues the ordinary humdrum life of every day.

The Children that are Gone!

Why do they come, these little ones that enter our homes by the gateway of suffering and linger with us for a few months, uttering no words, smiling in a mysterious silence, yet speaking eloquently all the time of the purity and sweetness of heaven? It is an inestimable blessing to have been the parent of a child that has the stamp of heaven upon its brow, to hold it in one's arms, to minister to it, to gaze fondly down into the little upturned face, and to rejoice in the unsullied beauty of its smiles, and then to give it back to God at his call, with the thought that in heaven, as upon earth, it is still our own child, a member of the household, still to be counted always as one of the children whom God hath given us. Such a love chastens and sanctifies the hearts of the father and mother, carries them out beyond time and sense, and gives them a hold upon the unseen. As things of great value always cost, it is worth all the sorrow to have known this holy affection, and to have this treasure in heaven.

The River Jordan.

Our Traveler Muses by the Sacred Stream —Where Elijah Ascended—The Scene of the Passage of the Israelites.

THE luncheon-tent is pitched upon the very spot from which, says tradition, Elijah ascended to heaven. Stretched luxuriously upon the rugs with which David has carpeted the turf, we, as is our custom, read the story of the event from the original record, and draw conclusions unbiased by popular tales and erudite commentators. The two prophets passed over Jordan between the waters divided hither and thither by the stroke of Elijah's mantle:

"And it came to pass as they still went on and talked, that, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven."

"Elisha took up also the mantle of Elijah that fell from him, and went back, and stood by the bank (or 'lip,' says the margin) of Jordan."

We are within fifty yards of the shelving brink, a distance scarcely worth the mention of a return to the river. It is more likely to our imaginations that the stupendous miracle—second only to the ascension of the King of Glory and the lifting of the celestial gates to let him in—took place much further away toward the interior, perhaps upon the bushy plain back there over which horses and mules have forced a way through thicket and briery tangle to reach the sacred stream.

All visitors agree in pronouncing the Jordan a disappointment at first sight. It is, to put it plainly, a mere creek, by actual measurement one hundred and ten feet wide, and seemingly not more than fifty. So delusive is the apparent width that we cannot credit the dragoman's respectful insistence upon his figures until the picture of the thither bank taken by the kodak shows by the blurred lines that the jungle of bulrushes and willows lining the water's edge is almost beyond range. Nor is there anything dignified in the environment. A fringe of ragged trees, tall flags and flowering reeds is broken in front of our noon encampment by an open space through which we view the Moabitish shore. On that side the ground rises somewhat abruptly and is more heavily wooded. Back of it are the mountains of Moab—mysterious barriers which we long hourly the more intensely to visit. In our immediate foreground, unconscious David, water-jug in hand, has stopped to offer friendly admonition to the younger dragoman of a party of tourists who occupy a conspicuous position in the field of the camera, and are lunching among the willows. In common with many of his guild, the young fellow is exalted above measure by the circumstance that he can speak both English and Arabic, and that the foreigners he has in charge are at his mercy in the matter of topography and bargains. He is sharply authoritative in rebuking a girl of fourteen and a boy of twelve not to cut canes in the bushes up the stream.

"Don't go ten steps away unless I give you permission!" is the tart order that catches Jamal's ear.

"I have told him that he had no right to use that tone in speaking to any of his travelers," David answers our interrogations as to the meaning of the scene. "He is young and fresh. In time he will learn better. No! there is no real danger in wandering off a little way from the party. That is, not now. In the old time, robbers were hidden in the brushwood and canes."

Alcides, accompanied by Serkeese, disappears among the undergrowth lower down the bank, intent upon a literal seven dips in the Jordan. A less number would not rid skin and hair from the smart and stickiness left by the Dead Sea bath. The men of the party under the broken willow-tree, taking the children along, stray off to cut walking-sticks as souvenirs of day and spot. I send one of the many rugs, furnished by the more experienced dragoman, to the one lady of the company under the escort of the "tresh" young Syrian, when I see her lie down upon the sloping turf, and double her arms under her head for a pillow. Then, among my cushions, I look up "Jordan" in the "Biblical Gazetteer," at the back of "the best Baedeker for Palestine."

While reading of the passage of the twelve tribal representatives through the "dry ground" of the river-bed, each with a stone upon his shoulder, "which they took out of Jordan, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there,"—finally, at Joshua's command "pitching them in Gilgal,"—the rush of the muddy, crooked stream in the stillness of high noon takes on solemnity to the ear of my spirit. I close the book upon my finger and look from the shadow of the tent-hood upon the historic current, as one awakened out of sleep. Hereabouts, beyond the shadow of doubt, the host of Israel crossed into the Promised Land. Midway in the stream—perhaps upon the very spot on which I am gazing, the Ark, upborne by the white-robed priests, held back the flow from the far-off source at the foot of Hermon "until all the people were passed clean over Jordan."

Slowly, and as if I had never heard or seen it before—I re-read the wonderful tale:

"And as they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water (for Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest), the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap very far from the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan; and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the Salt Sea, failed and were cut off; and the people passed over right against Jericho."

Muddy, tortuous and neither broad nor long, the Jordan has yet a certain dignity of its own, or so it seems to me, as I watch the swift, steady flow toward the Salt Sea that is to swallow it up and render no account of the flood poured into it. At this point it is nine or ten feet deep, and, as Alcides reports upon his return, icy cold. He had meant to land upon the Moab side fathers into the Canaan of prophecy and prayer. We may have in sight the place from which Joshua issued the command:

"Sanctify yourselves; for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you."

The morrow that was never to dawn for the sleeper

On Nebo's lonely mountain,
On gray Beth-peor's height.

Again, and from the depths of our hearts—"Poor Moses!"

Not far from where we are sitting, John the Baptist preached, and "there went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins."

Above our very heads the "heavens were opened and the Divine Man "saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him." The exact spot cannot be designated with any degree of certainty, although since the fifth century after Christ, and we know not how much earlier, crowds of pilgrim resort yearly to the region round about Jordan to be baptized and to bathe in waters they esteem as holy. We have left no other place in Palestine with more reluctance than we acknowledge as, having seen our bottles of Jordan and of Dead Sea water bestowed in the bottom of the palanquin, and a bundle of walking sticks and feather grasses gathered by David from the edge of the stream, strapped upon Serkeese's luggage, we turn our backs—probably forever—upon the scene that looks so tame but is fraught with so much of supreme and tender interest.

Our little caravan is headed straight for a clump of trees marking the site of Gilgal—Joshua's Gilgal. The oasis of the Jordan dwindles into briars and thorns and such coarse herbage as can thrive in the salty soil, before we reach the few mounds—or rather hillocks—supposed to mark the site of the place where the rite of circumcision was renewed in the temporary lull of hostilities caused by the awe cast upon the people of the land by the news of the miraculous crossing of the Jordan. Where, too, the children of Israel were encamped when they "kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the month at even in the plains of Jericho."

"And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more, but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year."

There were two millions of the chosen people by now. The land to which they had emigrated had need to be all a-flow with milk and honey and stored beyond our power of conception, as we traverse the waste places, with "butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat, and the pure blood of the grape."

We skirt modern Jericho upon our campward way. It is a dismal collection of mud huts, covered with turf and with reeds packed over the earth. A ruin of brick walls, unroofed and crumbling away, is pointed out as the house of Zaccheus. Beyond is a modern hotel, insignificant in size, and mean in architecture. In following the winding, muddy lanes, we have glimpses over a wall, of a garden belonging to a monastic order wherein grow lemon, orange and citron trees; the feathery foliage of the acacia tree brushes our cheeks in the narrowest turnings, and we secure handfuls of the little golden tufts to be used as perfume in handkerchief and glove cases.

It has been a long and an eventful day, and like the flash of lights from the windows of home, falls upon our vision the gleam of color from the peak of a white tent, when the muddy maze has been threaded. A breeze from the hills leading up to the Jerusalem which is almost four thousand feet higher than the plain of the salt sea and plain of Jericho, lifts into distinctness the crescent-and-star of the Turkish star over the dining-tent, and the Stars and Stripes under whose deai tolds we are to sleep to-night. EXCELLENT and superb as are the women of New Zealand, more good women are needed here. In most places where I have lived or traveled women are in blessed majority, and it seems that the Lord likes them better than men, because he has made more of them. There is in most places a surplus of good womanhood, and they therefore do not get full appreciation. But New Zealand is an exception. In this colony there are 50,000 less women than men. This will by circumstances be adjusted. There ought certainly to be as many women as men in every land, for every man is entitled to a good wife and every woman is entitled to a good husband. The difficulty is that war and rum kill so many men that the man intended for the woman's life-time partnership is apt to lie in the soldier's grave trench or in the drunkard's ditch. In the Paradisiacal and perfect state the womanhood equalled the manhood, for there was one of each kind. The women in New Zealand have already done well, for while in the United States and Europe the women are discussing in parlors and on the platforms how they shall get their rights at the ballot-box, that castle has already been stormed and taken by the women here. After awhile the brave sisterhoods in the United States and Great Britain will band together, and from the crowded parlors where so many languish in inanition and inoccupation, they will make a crusade to these parts of the earth, where their presence would be hailed and their opportunities augmented. The theory that men must go into new countries alone and establish themselves in mines, in mechanism or merchandise, and then send for their families to join them, is an overdone theory. The wives and daughters and sisters had better come along with their husbands, fathers, and brothers. Instead of there being a surplus of men in the Colonies there ought to be a surplus of women, out of which to get the supply of maiden aunts—those guardian angels of the community who are at home in the whole circle of kindred, the confidant of the young and the comfort of the old, and the benediction of all.

Not only is there room in New Zealand for more good womanhood, but there is room for more artists and naturalists.

Here are Mountains

nine thousand, ten thousand, eleven thousand, twelve thousand feet high, waiting for some one to take their photographs; and while most of the mountains of the earth stand stolid and statuesque and without varieties of posture, some of these change their shape and altitude under volcanic suggestion, as the man in the photographic gallery, at the artist's suggestion, changes from side-face to full-face, or from frown to smile, and one day a mountain turns clear round, or from standing posture sits down with heavy plunge; or a crevice opens between the cheeks of the hill—a wide-open mouth full of laughter or threat. The changes in the mountains ranges are enough to set a geologist wild with interest, or send him running up and down these altitudes with crowbar to dig or hammer to strike, or tape-line to measure. On a night in June, 1886, the mountains of Tarawera and Rotomahana, New Zealand, had a grand frolic. For many years tourists visited the "Terraces," as they were called—ancient forms of volcanic eruption. On the night of June 9th, 1886, the moon was passing into the second quarter when, ten minutes after two o'clock, the earth shook and the mountains erupted. Standing ten, twelve, fourteen miles off, the people felt the shock and saw the ascent of the steam column and the red hot rocks and the volcanic ash and scoria; and the smoke looking like a vast pine-tree, according to the statements of the poetic, but like an umbrella or mushroom according to the description of the rustic. Those who lived near the base of the hills did not survive to tell the tale of the catastrophe. The lake hissed as with ten thousand serpents when the hot bombs of the mountain dropped into it. The malodors of burning iron oxides and magnesia and chlorine and alumina and sulphur filled all the regions approximate with suffocation, strangulation, and asphyxia. Sixty miles felt the upheaval; and from Auckland, more than 130 miles away, a ship put out for the rescue of a vessel supposed to be burning at sea—the mistaken fire being that of this burning mountain. In the house of Mr. Hazard, a devout Christian man, as the ashes and trees and stone began to drop heavily on the roof, a Christian daughter, believing that they must die, sat down at a cabinet organ to play a piece of sacred music, and the whole of the family joined in the hymn. And all save one of

The Family Perished.

At the hotel, a Mr. Bainbridge who was on a journey round the world, called the inmates of the hotel together for prayer, and he told them they had only a few more minutes to live; and as he was passing out from the hotel the verandah fell upon him and crushed him to death.

That night nine miles of the mountain changed. "The Terraces," which had been the pride of the Colonies, sank out of existence. No one but the Infinite and the Almighty could afford the obliteration of such resources of beauty and glory. The casting down of such altars and the annihilation of such temples would have been an iconoclasm that would have affronted the universe but for the fact that the Lord who made Tarawera and Rotomahana has a right to do what he will with his own; and the Terraces, already beginning to reform, may be richer colored and loftier and more resplendent than their predecessors. The loss to New Zealand of is what would be the loss of the Giant's Causeway to Ireland, or the loss of the Pyramids to Egypt, or the loss of Niagara Falls to America. The exact physical causes of this upsetting and down tearing and mountain splitting I leave to geologists to guess about. Translating their scientific accounts into easier language, it seems that the mountains were stiff in their joints from long standing and went into play. For a great while they had enjoyed no fireworks, and that night they illumined New Zealand with rockets and wheels of fire. The hills went into games of leapfrog and ball playing, and flying kites, and boxing, and general romp. They were exhilarated with a mixture of gases: sulphuric, phosphoric, and carbonic, and forgot all the proprieties that mountains usually observe. But it was not a comedy. It was a tragedy of the mountains, and all the King Lear's, and the Macbeths, and the Hamlets, and the Meg Merrilies of derangement and horror were that night on the stage, of which the belching fires were the footlights, and flames hundreds of feet high were the gorgeous upholstery. Tornadoes of ashes. Furnaces, seven times heated, in which walked the Deity. Grand March of God sounded by the avalanches.

Ornithologists ought also to come to New Zealand. What I never knew before, the native birds are dying out before the foreign birds that have been introduced, and the native flowers are dying out before the foreign flowers. Although now

New Zealand is so abundant in all styles of quadruped, it had not, when discovered, a single quadruped, except the rat, and a foreign rat having been introduced, the aboriginal rat has nearly disappeared. The English grass brought here has killed the native grass. The birds of America, Europe and Asia, imported here, have killed the birds of New Zealand. All the earth has been ransacked and all the botanical and ichthyological and ornithological and zoological worlds have been called upon to make up the present and the future of New Zealand.

Yea, come to this "Wonderland," all who want to see enterprise and advancement. Daily newspapers with scholarly men in editorial chairs, and reporters capable of pumping interviews from the most reticent and cautious and make a Sphinx speak. Two thousand miles of railroad. Over sixteen hundred schools with compulsory education, building up intelligence for the present and affording no opportunity for ignorance in the next century. Baths, thermal and chemical, miles long, and capable of putting an end to rheumatisms and sciaticas and invalidisms that have defied the mineral hydropathics of the Continents. Lake Taupo, so deep that no plummet has ever touched bottom, and occupying the hollow of an extinct volcano, as a bright child might fall to sleep in the bed previously occupied by a grim giant. Yea, come to New Zealand, the naturalists, the artists, and the students of men and things, and come quickly, for nothing remains here as it originally was, except the mountains! and even the mountains, as on the night of June 9th, 1886, when the walls of "The Terraces" fell down at the blowing of the trumpets of terror, proved themselves no longer to be the "everlasting hills."

A Beautiful Baby

Was our boy, plump and healthy, but sores broke out on his neck and his eyes were affected so that he could not see for a number of weeks. For two years he suffered terribly, and seeing Hood's Sarsaparilla advertised we concluded to try a bottle. After the first bottle was gone he began to feel better. The medicine seemed to drive out more of the humor for a short time but it soon began to subside and in a few

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

Helping the Gospel Fund.

Friends in Many States Sending Their Gifts for Extending the Bible Institute's Work of Evangelization.

OFFERINGS still continue to pour in from many quarters for the Moody Gospel Fund, affording evidence that the interest in this great work is nowise abating. Some of the contributors send letters along with their gifts expressing the heartiest sympathy with the movement. Several letters have also been received inquiring as to the terms on which students are received, and all such correspondents we have referred to Rev. Dr. Torrey, at Bible Institute, Chicago, who will furnish the necessary information.

To those whose hearts are in the Master's work and who are laboring daily for the spread of his kingdom on earth, the impetus the work is receiving through the widespread response to Mr. Moody's appeal is most grateful and encouraging. Every contributor to the Gospel Fund has given an added stimulus to the efforts that are being made for the evangelization of the churchless millions in our great cities. But, with hundreds of consecrated young men and women standing ready to devote their entire lives and energies to Christian work and only needing such training as the Bible Institute can supply to make them practical and efficient laborers, there should surely be no hesitation on the part of God's people in extending to them the support they need, both moral and financial. Mr. Moody has explained in his letter to our readers, how valuable and timely has been the aid already rendered in this great emergency and how great the opportunity is that now presents itself for enlisting the hosts of Christian America in a grand and united movement for the spiritual awakening and ingathering of the masses who are at present wholly outside of the influence of the organized churches. To seek out these dwellers in the lanes, alleys and purlieus of the populous centres; to visit them and talk with them in their own homes, and amid the surroundings of vice, poverty and destitution that have helped to make them indifferent to religion; to show them, by kindly word and act, that they are not forgotten by those who call themselves followers of Him who loved to search out the lowly while here on earth—such is the task of the Christian workers who are trained in the Bible Institute. But where a hundred are prepared for this vast field, a thousand are needed.

It is the widest, yet the most accessible of all mission fields, for it deals with our own "home heathen," of whom it may be truthfully said that "they know not God;" who never darken the doors of a church or mission chapel; whose lives are lost in a dulling struggle for existence, and whose apathy concerning the things of eternity is an appalling fact in a Christian land. This is the soul-awakening crusade to which the great evangelist has summoned the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and we trust that all who have the welfare of these neglected brothers and sisters at heart will hearken to the invitation. To help in such a glorious work, to the extent of one's ability as the Lord hath prospered us, is one of the highest privileges the sincere soul can ask. And it is only by such spontaneous and united help that the object is to be accomplished. No matter how small the offering, it will aid, for the work needs the "little things" as well as the larger. Especially does it need the earnest supplications of the Lord's people everywhere that Mr. Moody's hands may be upheld and that his labors at the Institute, and the efforts of those associated with him, may be blessed to the awakening of many souls.

Several letters have been received, accompanied by gifts of quilts, jewelry, shawls and laces, but these articles have been returned to the senders, as they are in every case valued mementos which we do not feel justified in permitting the owners to sacrifice, and which we have no means of disposing of to advantage.

GOSPEL PROGRESS IN CHINA.

In 1842, after over thirty years' missionary work in China, there were only six converts. Now, says the "Review of Missions," the six communicants of 1842 are about 45,000, the native workers are approaching their second thousand, and out of more than 500 native churches, about 100 are self-supporting. About 17,000 pupils are attending mission schools, and thousands every year are laying aside their prejudices and superstitious fears so far as to receive healing of body at the hands of missionary physicians. It has been very properly said that "if Christian missions (in China) advanced in the next thirty-five years in the same ratio as in the past thirty-five years, there will be at the end of that time 26,000,000 communicants and a Christian community of 100,000,000 people, one-fourth of the Chinese nation." And who can say nay? The same Divine Commander will lead the forces in the future as in the past.

TALKS WITH MOTHERS.—No. 2. FEEDING THE BABY.

Much is written at the present day about the care and feeding of infants by people whose only capability for dealing with the subject is a fertile brain, and whose only aim is to appear in print; every mother knows how unsatisfactory and fallacious such advice is when she attempts to follow it. How to feed the baby is the greatest problem met with in the happy state of motherhood, and upon its solution depends the health, the happiness and the life of the child. If the mother is able to nurse her child, the question of feeding is practically settled; if she is not, she should be guided by those who have had successful experience in feeding babies and not allow herself to experiment with different foods. There are scores of artificial foods offered for sale, but the best is none too good for the baby. Eminent authorities who have thoroughly investigated the subject of infant feeding, and scientists who have analyzed infant foods, unite in pronouncing Mellin's Food to be the only perfect substitute for mother's milk. It is palatable, nourishing and strengthening; the weakest stomach will retain and digest it, and the puniest child will thrive upon it beyond the mother's fondest expectations.

For convalescents, consumptives, dyspeptics and the aged, Mellin's Food is also of incalculable value. It is a food, not a medicine, and the system receives the nourishment it demands for its daily needs. For those severely ill Mellin's Food will sustain the failing strength and promote a speedy recovery when convalescence has been established.

Indisputable Evidence

Of the Successful Treatment of Consumption and Chest Diseases by the English Method, as Discovered and Practiced by George Thomas Congreve.

FOURTEENTH INTERVIEW.

By our Special Commissioner

With Mrs. WEEKS, (Mother of Mrs. MILLS,) Holborn Place, Jubilee Street, Plymouth.

The case of Miss H. F. Weeks (now Mrs. Mills) was first published in the Appendix to Mr. Congreve's work on Consumption (page 18), and the subjoined account of it, and a conversation I had recently with her mother, Mrs. Weeks, will serve as a striking illustration of that permanence of cure which usually follows perseverance with the treatment which Mr. Congreve advocates.

Twelve years ago, on the first day of 1882, the patient (having then been ill ten months, and although at different times attended by no less than five medical men, having obtained no benefit) applied to Mr. Congreve.

The statement of the case was as follows: "The expectation consisted of greenish matter with blood; there were great pains in the left side; the breathing was very short; all the secretions were sadly wrong; the heart was subject to severe palpitations; the legs and feet swelled; the body was wasted; the strength had declined; added to which there was great prostration of the nervous system."

"The beginning of her illness was a cold caused through getting wet," said Mrs. Weeks. "It did not seem to matter what advice she had, or what we gave her, nothing seemed to do her good. One doctor told me one lung was gone the other was going. I had a medical man in the house for three months, but she got worse instead of better."

"How came you to apply to Mr. Congreve?" I asked.

"It was her uncle, Mr. Kelley, of 14 Chapel street, Devonport, who sent to Mr. Congreve without saying anything to us about it. I had no hope of her getting better."

"And what was the result, Mrs. Weeks?"

"Well, for the first month there was not much change, but after that Mr. Congreve sent her a special prescription, to be taken in addition to his other medicine. Her appetite improved, and she made rapid progress toward recovery. As the weather got better she was able to go out a little, increasing the length of the walk each day, and so she gradually got well again."

"What I after the doctors here had told you one lung was gone and the other going, and after ten months of an illness such as you have described, she really quite recovered?"

"She did, and she has since been examined by a doctor, who reported that her lungs were healed. The neighbors, who are all acquainted with the circumstances (for we are well known in this part of Plymouth), say she is a wonder. I never heard of so bad a case as hers."

"And will it be correct to say that, after twelve years, she is still keeping well?"

"Quite correct. She is married, and has a fine little girl"—and here true grandmotherly pride made itself very evident—"the finest baby in the neighborhood. She does all her household work. I only wish you could see her. She will be here some time this morning."

The exigencies of the train service, however, would not permit of my remaining longer in Plymouth; but before I bade her good-day, Mrs. Weeks told me of another case—the daughter of the proprietor of a steam laundry near, "who was ill just like my daughter"—also cured by Mr. Congreve's treatment.

Mr. Kelley, whose address is given above, and upon whom I called also corroborated the account here given, and added that his own son, who was at one time very ill with chest affection, recovered under Mr. Congreve's care, and now, strong, healthy, and well, is employed in a large house of business in the City of London.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs or Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had, post free, for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order of $1.00 bottle of my Balsamic Elixir.

CONGREVE'S BALSAMIC ELIXIR can be obtained from many drug stores, but it will take some time before it will be introduced into all of them throughout this vast country. If your druggist has not yet put it in stock, it will be sent you, carriage paid, from my own depot, on receipt of 50 cts., $1.00, $1.75, $3.75, or $7.00, according to the size of the bottle ordered.

Many New Schools Planted.

Our Sunday School Missionary in the Midst of a Busy Season—Sixteen Years Without a Vacation—The Result of Three Months' Spiritual Work.

WELCOME letter, full of spiritual encouragement and teeming with glorious results, has been received from Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School missionary in the Southwest. Our readers, through whose generous co-operation this valiant worker is kept in the field, will peruse it with interest:

KIRKSVILLE, MO., August, 1894. After twenty-five days' absence, I have been home for a few days. I start out again tomorrow or next day. Long tours been the rule with me this season, and now that the heat of summer has driven many people to the shade and repose, I am preparing for hard work, mostly among strangers.

This is the sixteenth year of my missionary service without a vacation. I thank God for excellent health. The Lord has been with me by day and by night, and in many places where I met difficulties and discouragements, there are flourishing Sunday Schools. These figures show the progress of the work:

	Teachers.	Scholars.
New Schools organized in April,	7	19

Total Schools labored with in three months, April,	45	215
" " " " May,	2	13
" " " " June,	45	215

The above shows twenty-three schools giving their life to my recent labors; for, besides the twenty-two new schools, the dead were revived required as much labor, and it was as necessary as if it had been a new one. Several years had passed since I first organized it. In the same three months I have delivered fifty-one addresses and sermons, visits to families, 491 miles traveled, 544. On the 6th of April I left home in my buggy, and it has not been at home since. From that day till the 28th of May—fifty-two days—I was only at home once and then only a few hours, and at the end of the fifty-two days. When I reached home at five P. M., I found a telegram waiting me to come to Howard County the next day by A. M., to preach at the funeral of a beloved member of a family of steadfast friends of our work. By taking the midnight train and travelling all night (in order to make the connections), I got there about seven A. M. From that trip I got home at five P. M., May 30—31st I had to write on my reports, invoices, etc., also June 1st, and on the morning of June 2d, I left for the Grand River County, where I had left my horse and buggy. I was gone twenty-five days, and since my arrival here, have been rushed with making out reports and accumulated office work. From this you will see how little I have been at home, and how fully my time has been occupied while here.

I want you to join me in thanking God for the visible results. I expect to see much more even than that, in the day of the Lord. Personal interviews on the highway, in the fields, in the homes of the people: Gospel books and tracts distributed, etc., these by God's grace will bear their precious fruit in that day.

I thought I would tell you how I was getting along, and give you some idea of God's goodness to me and my family and how he has graciously blessed the work, and to ask your earnest prayers. I have been in the rain in my drives for over an hour, I suppose, sometimes. At another time a high wind drove a very hard rain in my face so that my horse had difficulty in facing it, and the wind blew the rain under my buggy-top till it wet me from my shirt-collar to the toes of my shoes. My watch, which I have carried about fifteen years (plain but a good time-keeper), was so wet in my vest pocket that it rusted and became useless.

I am now enabled to take longer trips and organize more new schools. But whether this work is more important than the revisiting of schools last year, I leave for eternity to reveal. As to support, amidst my trials of patience and faith in these close times, I pray God to provide for this work, if it is his will I should continue in it, as it has undoubtedly seemed to be. The next prayer meeting you are in, if it is suitable, I request you to ask pray that the Lord may sustain us physically, spiritually, and in every way. Your Brother in Christ, GEO. W. SHARP.

MISSIONARY GIFTS IN 1893.

The "Missionary Review of the World" estimates the total missionary gifts of Christendom for 1893 at $14,713,627, besides $1,500,000 raised from the mission field itself. The total missionary force it estimates at 58,148, the greater part of these of course being unordained native helpers. There are in the world 16,602 mission stations, 1,081,708 communicants in foreign lands, and 2,744,955 native Christians.

INDIANS BROUGHT TO CHRIST.

Forty-Five Years' Work of the Moravian Mission in Central America—Faithful Labors on the Mosquito Reserve—A Pentecostal Shower of Blessing.

THE Moravian Church sent its first missionary workers to the Mosquito Indian Reserve, in Central America in 1849. In 1848, two missionaries were sent from the West Indies, to report upon the feasibility of beginning a mission work in Mosquitia. One of these was the late Bishop Amadeus A. Reinke, of New York city, then a young man who had just entered the service of the church as a Jamaica missionary. The Moravian missionaries were the first messengers of the Gospel to these people. No one had cared for their souls up to the time when they came to Bluefields in response to the urgent invitation of the native government. An English catechist was found reading prayers, occasionally, for the handful of whites who lived among the six hundred inhabitants of the town, at that day. But there was no thought of evangelizing the natives.

Since the discovery of this portion of the Central American coast by Columbus, in 1502, the Gospel message had not been brought to these people during the almost three hundred and fifty intervening years. Hence the Moravian Brethren's Church felt a special call to this field of missionary labor. Bluefields is now a town of from 2,500 to 3,000 inhabitants. Within the last seven or eight years its trade with the United States has greatly increased. Every month thirteen steamers leave its wharves, each laden with 10,000 to 12,000 bunches of bananas. Other exports are coconuts, rubber and gold. Upon land willingly granted to the missionaries more than fifty years ago by the Indian authorities, they have erected a large church and school house, and a mission house.

Besides the public services on the Lord's Day, and the daily morning and evening prayer-services, an excellent week-day school is maintained by the Mission, in which normal school graduates do efficient teachers' work. There are two large Sunday Schools in Bluefields, one carried on in connection with the church, the other in a chapel in another quarter of the town. The work of the missionaries, which was begun at Bluefields as a centre, in 1849, has gradually extended over the Reserve. The only means of communication with the other portions of the Reserve is by water, along the shore, in and out of the lagoons which indent the coast-line. In 1865 there were five mission stations besides the one at Bluefields.

From time to time friends in Germany, England and the United States have fur-

In 1881, the Holy Spirit was poured out in Pentecostal measure upon this field of missionary operations among the Indians of the Mosquito Reserve. After more than thirty years of faithful and toilsome labor, the missionaries experienced a wonderful revival amongst these people. From the depths of the forest, the native men and missionaries could scarcely believe what their eyes saw and their ears heard, when the crowds of deeply convicted Indians came to the stations, hungering and thirsting for Gospel truth and comfort. Protracted services were held for months. The churches were overcrowded. The prayers of the convicted seekers were speedily followed by sins. "I could never have believed, unless I had seen it with my own eyes, that such miracles of grace could be wrought in our poor day, as we witnessed amongst these Indians," wrote one of the missionaries. The awful sense of their depravity and sin; the abounding joy of their triumph through grace in Jesus; it was not of man. It was the mighty power of God the Holy Spirit, sealing the faithful witnessing of missionaries during the years since the establishment of the mission. From 1881 to 1887 the number of baptized converts increased threefold.

The work of grace has extended beyond the limits of the Reserve, which covers an area of from 15,000 to 20,000 square miles. The Indians who live in Nicaraguan territory have begged for missionary pastors, and within the last

THE TAX-COLLECTOR'S CONVERSION.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Text: Luke 19: 9, "This day is salvation come to this house."

THE Bible says he "was a sinner"—that is, in the public sense. How many fine men have been ruined by official position! It is an awful thing for any man to seek office under government unless his principles of integrity are deeply fixed. Many a man, upright in an insignificant position, has made shipwreck in a great one. As far as I can tell, in the city of Jericho this Zaccheus belonged to what might be called the "Ring." They had things their own way, successfully avoiding exposure—if by no other way, perhaps by hiring somebody to break in and steal the vouchers. Notwithstanding his bad reputation, there were streaks of good about him, as there is about almost every man. Gold is found in quartz, and sometimes in a very small percentage.

Jesus was coming to town. The people turned out en masse to see him. Here he comes—the Lord of Glory—on foot, dust-covered and road-weary, limping along the way, carrying the griefs and woes of the world. He looks to be sixty years of age when he is only about thirty. Zaccheus was a short man, and could not see over the people's heads while standing on the ground; so he got up into a sycamore tree that swung its arm clear over the road. Jesus advanced amid the wild excitement of the surging crowd. The most honorable and popular men of the city are looking on, and trying to gain his attention. Jesus, instead of regarding them, looks up at the little man in the tree, and says, "Zaccheus, come down. I am going home with you." Everybody was disgusted to think that Christ would go home with so dishonorable a man.

I see Christ entering the front door of the house of Zaccheus. The King of heaven and earth sits down; and as he looks around on the place and the family, he pronounces the benediction of the text: "This day is salvation come to this house."

Zaccheus had mounted the sycamore tree out of mere inquisitiveness. He wanted to see how this stranger looked—the color of his eyes, the length of his hair, the contour of his features, the height of his stature. "Come down," said Christ.

And so, many people, in this day, get up into the tree of curiosity or speculation to see Christ. They ask a thousand queer questions about his divinity, about God's sovereignty, and the eternal decrees. They speculate, and criticize, and hang on to the outside limb of a great sycamore. But they must come down from that if they want to be saved. We cannot be saved as philosophers, but as little children. You cannot go to heaven by way of Athens, but by way of Bethlehem. Why be perplexed about the way sin came into the world, when the great question is how we shall get sin driven out of our hearts? How many spend their time in criticism and religious speculation! They take the Rose of Sharon, or the Lily of the Valley, pull out the anther, scatter the corolla, and say, "Is that the beautiful flower of religion that you are talking about?" No flower is beautiful after you have torn it all to pieces. The path to heaven is so plain that a fool need not make any mistake about it, and yet men stop and cavil. Suppose that, going toward the Pacific slope, I had resolved that I would stop until I could kill all the grizzly bears and the panthers on either side of the way. I would never have got to the Pacific coast. When I went out to hunt the grizzly bear, the grizzly bear would have come out to hunt me. Here is a plain road to heaven. Men say they will not take a step on it until they can make game of all chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty. Zaccheus, come down! come down!"

I notice that this tax-gatherer accompanied his surrender to Christ with the restoration of property that did not belong to him. He says, "If I have taken any thing by false accusation, I restore fourfold." That is, if I have taxed any man for ten thousand dollars when he had only five thousand dollars' worth of property, and put in my own pocket the tax for the last five thousand, I will restore to him fourfold. If I took from him ten dollars, I will give him forty dollars. If I took from him forty dollars, I will give him one hundred and sixty dollars.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been sent to Washington during the past few years as "conscience money." I suppose that money was sent by men who wanted to be Christians, but found they could not until they made restitution. There is no need of our trying to come to Christ as long as we keep fraudulently a dollar or a farthing in our possession that belongs to another. Suppose you have not money enough to pay your debts, and, for the sake of defrauding your creditors, you put your property in your wife's name. You might cry until the day of judgment for pardon, but you would not get it without first making restitution. In times of prosperity it is right, against a rainy day, to assign property to your wife; but if, in time his theft. If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep, he shall restore double. If a man shall cause a field or vineyard to be eaten, and shall put in his beast, and shall feed in another man's field, of the best of his own field and of the best of his own vineyard shall he make restitution."

You say, "I cannot make restitution. The parties whom I swindled are gone." Then I say, "Take the money up to the American Bible Society and consecrate it to God." Zaccheus was wise when he disgorged his unrighteous gains, and it was his first step in the right direction.

The way being clear, Christ walked into the house of Zaccheus. He becomes a different man: his wife a different woman; the children are different. Oh! it makes a great change in any house when Christ comes into it. How many beautiful homes are represented among you! There are pictures on the wall; there is music in the drawing-room; and luxuries in the wardrobe; and a full supply in the pantry. Even if you were half asleep, there is one word with which I could wake you, and thrill you through and through, and that word is "home!" There are also houses of suffering represented, in which there are neither pictures nor wardrobe, nor adornment—only one room, and a plain cot, or a bunk in a corner; yet it is the place where your loved ones dwell, and your whole nature tingles with satisfaction when you think of it and call it home. Though the world may scoff at us, and pursue us, and all the day we be tossed about, at eventide we sail into the harbor of home. Though there be no rest for us in the busy world, and we go trudging about, bearing burdens that well-nigh crush us, there is a refuge, and it hath an easy-chair in which we may sit, and a lounge where we may lie, and a serenity of peace in which we may repose, and that refuge is home. The English soldiers, sitting on the walls around Sebastopol, one night heard a company of musicians playing "Home Sweet Home," and it is said that the whole army broke out in sobs and wailing, so great was their homesickness. God pity the poor, miserable wretch who has no home!

Now suppose Christ should come into your house. First the wife and the mother would feel his presence. Religion almost always begins there. It is easier for women to become Christians than for us men. They do not fight so against God. If woman tempted man originally away from holiness, now she tempts him back. She may not make any fuss about it, but somehow, everybody in the house knows that there is a change in the wife and mother. She chides the children more gently. Her face sometimes lights up with an unearthly glow. She goes into some unoccupied room for a little while, and the husband goes not after her, nor asks her why she was there. He knows without asking that she has been praying. The husband notices that her face is brighter than on the day when, years ago, they stood at the marriage-altar, and he knows that Jesus has been putting upon her brow a wreath sweeter than the orange-blossoms. She puts the children to bed, not satisfied with the formal prayer that they once offered, but she lingers now and tells them of Jesus who blessed little children, and of the good place where they all hope to be at last. And then she kisses them good-night with something that the child feels to be a heavenly benediction—a something that shall hold on to the boy after he has become a man forty or fifty years of age; for there is something in a good, loving Christian mother's kiss that fifty years cannot wipe off the cheek.

Now the husband is distressed and annoyed, and almost vexed. If she would only speak to him, he would "blow her up." He does not like to say anything about it, but he knows that she has a hope that he has not, and a peace that he has not; he knows that, dying as he now is, he cannot go to the same place. He cannot stand it any longer. Some Sunday night, as they sit in church, side by side, the floods of his soul the theories that bark and growl at them from the thickets. They forget the fact that as they go out to hunt the theory, the theory comes out to hunt them, and so they perish. We must receive the kingdom of heaven in simplicity. William Pennington was one of the wisest men of this country—a governor of his own state, and afterward Speaker of the House of Representatives. Yet, when God called him to be a Christian, he went in, and sat down among some children who were applying for church-membership, and he said to his pastor, "Talk to me just as you do to these children, for I know nothing about it." There is no need of bothering ourselves about mysteries when there are so many things that are plain. Dr. Ludlow, my professor in the Theological Seminary, taught me a lesson I have never forgotten. While putting a variety of questions to him that were perplexing, he turned upon me somewhat in sternness, but more in love, and said, "Mr. Talmage, you will have to let God know some things that you don't." We tear our hands on the spines of the cactus instead of feasting our eye on its tropical bloom. A great company of people now sit swinging themselves on the sycamore tree of their pride, and I cry to you, "Zaccheus, come down!" Come down out of your pride, out of your inquisitiveness, out of your speculation. You cannot ride into the gate of heaven with coach and four, postilion ahead, and lackey behind. "Except ye become as little children, ye cannot enter the kingdom of God." God has of perplexity, and for the sake of defrauding your creditors, you make such assignment, you become a culprit before God, and you may as well stop praying until you have made restitution. Or suppose one man loans another money on bond or mortgage, with the understanding that the mortgage can lie quiet for several years, but as soon as the mortgage is given, commences foreclosure—the sheriff mounts the auction-block, and the property is struck down at half price, and the mortgagee buys it in. The mortgagee started to get the property at half price, and is a thief and a robber. Until he makes restitution, there is no mercy for him. Suppose you sell goods by a sample, and then afterward send to your customer an inferior quality of goods. You have committed a fraud, and there is no mercy for you until you have made restitution. Suppose you sell a man a handkerchief for silk, telling him it is all silk, and it is part cotton. No mercy for you until you have made restitution. Suppose you sell a man a horse, saying he is sound, and he afterward turns out to be spavined and balky. No mercy for you until you have made restitution.

Exodus 22: "If a man shall steal an ox or a sheep, and kill it or sell it, he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep. If a thief be found breaking up, and be smitten that he die, there shall no blood be shed for him. If the sun be risen upon him, there shall be blood shed for him, for he should make full restitution; if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for forth. He wants to pray, but does not know how. He hides his face, lest his worldly friends see him; but the Spirit arouses him, melts him, overcomes him. And they go home—husband and wife—in silence, until they get to their room when he cries out, "Oh, pray for me." And they kneel down. They cannot speak. The words will not come. But they do not want any words. He looks at them and answers sob, and groan, and sighing tenderness. That night they do not sleep any for talking of all the things wasted, and of that Saviour who had not to call. Before morning they lay out their plans for a new life. Morn comes. Father and mother descend from the bedroom. The children do not know the matter. They never saw faith in a Bible in his hand before. He says, "Come, children, I want you all to join while we read and pray." The children look at each other, and are almost surprised to laugh; but they see their parents in deep earnest. It is a short chapter that the father reads. He is a good father at other times, but now he does not say much. He sees so much to linger in. His voice trembles. Everything is strangely new to him. They kneel—father, the father and mother do; but the children come down one by one. They do not know that they must. It is some time before they all get down. The sentences are broken. The phrases are a little ungrammatical. The prayer begins abruptly and ends abruptly; but, as far as I can understand what they mean, it is about this: "O Saviour! help us! We do not know how to pray. Teach us. We cannot live longer in the way we have been living. Help us to-day for heaven. Help us to keep these children along with us. Forgive us all the past. Strengthen us for all the future. And when the journey is over, show us where Jesus is, and where the little ones that we lost. Amen!" It ended abruptly; but the angels came out and cleaned so far over to listen, they would have fallen off the battlement but for a pair of their wings, and cried, "Hark! Behold! he prays!"

That night there is a rap at the bedroom door. "Who is there?" cries the father. "The oldest child." "What is the matter. Are you sick?" "No; I want to be alone." Only a little while, and all the children are brought into the kingdom of God. And there is great joy in the house. The telegraph goes click, click. What is the news flying over the wire? "Come home. Father is dying!" The children all gather. Some come in the train. Some, too late for the train, take carriage across the country. They stand by the dying bed of the father. The father son upholds the mother, and says, "Don't cry, mother; I will take care of you." The parting blessing is given. No admonition; for he has, through his life, been saying to his children all he had to say to them. It is a plain "Good-bye" and the remark, "I know you will all go on to your mother," and all is over.

Life's duty done, as sinks the clay,
Light from its load, the spirit flies;
While heaven and earth combine to say,
How bless'd the righteous when he dies.

The whole family saved forever! If the father come, they are all in the ark—father, mother, sons, daughters. Together on earth, together in heaven. What makes it so? The grace of Jesus. Zaccheus one day took Jesus with him. That is all. Salvation came to that house.

What sound is it I hear to-night? It is the knocking at the door of your house. Hold! a stranger at the door: he gently knocks—has knocked before.

You looked out of your window and saw me going up your front steps, you did not wait, but go yourself to open the door. Will you keep Jesus standing on the outside, his locks wet with the dews of night? This day is salvation come to your house. The great want of your house is a new carpet, or costlier pictures, or finer furniture—it is Jesus!

Up to forty years men work for themselves; after that, for their children. Now, what do you propose to leave them. Nothing but dollars! Alas! what an inheritance! It is more likely to be a curse than a blessing. Your own common sense and observation tell you that money, without the divine blessing, is a curse. You must soon leave your children. Your shoulders are not so strong as they were, and you know that they will soon have to carry their own burdens. Your eyesight is not so clear as once; they will soon have to pick out their own way. Your arm is not so mighty as once; they will soon have to fight their own battles. Oh! let it not be told on judgment day that you let your family start without the only safeguard—the religion of Christ. Give yourself no rest until your children are the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Your son does just as you do. He tries to walk like you, and to talk like you. The daughter imitates the mother. Alas! if father and mother miss heaven, the children will. Oh! let Jesus come into your house. Do not bolt the hall door, or the parlor door, or the kitchen door, or the bedroom door against him. Above all, do not bolt your heart.

Build your altar to-night. Take the family Bible lying on the parlor-table. Call together as many of your family as may be awake. Read a chapter, and then, if you can think of nothing else besides the Lord's Prayer, say that. That will do. Heaven will have begun in your house. You can put your head on your pillow feeling that, whether you wake up in this world or the next, all is well. In that great, ponderous Book of the Judgment, where is recorded all the important events of the earth, you will read at last the statement that this was the day when salvation came into your house. Oh, Zaccheus, come down! come down! Jesus is passing by.

SPEAK UP FOR CHRIST.

A successful evangelist tells, in the "Ram's Horn," what great results followed from a simple stand for Christ when he was a commercial traveler. He had made a good sale, and the merchant said, "It is your treat." He knew what that meant. There was a saloon across the street, and he was expected to go across and "set up the drinks" for the whole establishment.

"What is the use?" he said to himself. "This is one of the expedients of the trade. I need not drink anything, I can order the cigars, or a supper or —." "Yes," something said to him, "you can just sell out right here and make a wreck of it all."

"Boys," he said in the new inspiration sent to him from above, "if I should do that I would do the meanest thing in all the world, and if you'll bear with me I'll tell you why. I have just come up from the very gates of death and hell through strong drink, and if I did what you ask, I'd do the meanest thing in all the world both for you and me."

Instantly the cashier leaped down from the desk. "Have you got a pledge? I'll sign it." And the merchant afterward took the commercial traveler aside to say, "I promise you I'll never drink another drop as long as I live." It pays to be outspoken for Christ. Try it.

A PEASANT'S BELIEF.

An honest peasant surprised an infidel one day who was jeering at him for believing in the Bible, by the reply:

"We country people like to have two strings to our bow."

"What do you mean?" inquired the infidel.

"Only this," rejoined the poor man, "that believing in the Bible and acting up to it, is like having two strings to one's bow; for, if it is not true, I shall be a better man for living up to it, and so it will be for my good in this life. That is one string to my bow. And, if it should be true, it will be better for me in the next life. That is another string, and a pretty strong one it is. But, sir, if you do not believe in the Bible, and on that account do not live as it requires, you have but one string to your bow. And, oh, sir, if its tremendous threatenings prove true—oh, think what will become of you!"

Indians Brought to Christ.

two years the Nicaraguan government has permitted to the Moravian missionaries to extend operations into Nicaraguan territory, at a new station, Dakura, in a north-westerly direction from the Reserve. At this time there are eleven stations, besides Bluefields, each with its separate missionary pastor and teacher and native helpers. The entire force of ordained missionaries and their wives, foreign and native, now number eighteen. Day schools have been established at most of the stations, and trained teachers have been appointed. The baptized converts number about 1,200. The missionaries have the direct pastoral oversight of about 5,000 adults and children. The entire native population is upward of 10,000.

Good work, and hard work, has been done by the missionaries in the grammatical reconstruction of the Mosquito Indian tongue, and in the translation of the Scriptures into the vernacular. The Rev. Henry Ziack has prepared a dictionary of the Mosquito Indian language. The Rev. Peter Blair, and the Rev. Wm. Sieborger have completed the translation of the Four Gospels. Mr. Blair is completing the translation of the remainder of the New Testament. The men whom the Moravian Church have sent out to this important field, have been, invariably, men of the highest Christian character, and they have constantly enjoyed the implicit confidence of the people among whom they labor in the Gospel, to the fullest extent. Those resident at Bluefields as Warden and Superintendent of the entire mission, have often been entrusted by the natives with the most important public official responsibilities, and in every such case, they have given their unstinted service, of a more secular character, without any personal remuneration. The wives of the missionaries have been called upon to endure peculiar privations in this long-neglected region. They have borne themselves with a Christian fortitude that takes rank with the best and holiest service in all mission history.

Latterly, it has been our privilege to welcome some of these brethren and sisters to New York City, on their way to the mission, full of hope and the joyous spirit of service. Again we have opened our hearts and our hands in tender welcome to those who, after having borne the heat and burden of many days, have come for a season of well-earned rest and much-needed recuperation. The veteran, the Rev. Augustus Martin, who was welcomed to New York, a few years ago, was forced to retire from active service in Mosquitia, after thirty years of uninterrupted service in that tropical country. When Mr. Martin left Bluefields, where he had filled the offices of superintendent and warden of the entire mission, and had performed the functions of treasurer of the Mosquito Nation, all the people, natives and foreigners, felt that they were losing a father and a friend.

His successor, the gifted and scholarly clergyman, Rev. Augustus Erdmann, died within a year after his appointment to the superintendency, a victim to his too great devotion to the duties of his station. He and his devoted wife died within twenty-four hours of each other, and their bodies were laid side by side in the "God's Acre" at Bluefields, amid the lamentations of the people who felt deeply the great loss that Mosquitia's interests had sustained. The present superintendent, Rev. William Sieborger, is a veteran Mosquito missionary who together with his colleague in the office of warden, the Rev. H. Berckenhagen, is well calculated to represent the true spirit in which Moravian missionaries, the world over, carry on the gospel work. In the picture, the ordained clergymen, foreign and native, of the missionary Conference of the Reserve, are represented, together with Bishop Benjamin Romig, a native of the state of Ohio, who came to reside at the sessions of the Conference, on a visitation as the official representative of the Home Board of Missions at Herrnhut, in Saxony. This was in 1891.

The Moravian Church regards the mission in Central America as a very successful and promising part of its missionary operations. If undisturbed in its unselfish gospel work in Nicaragua this missionary church looks forward to yet greater triumphs of the Gospel and a still larger measure of success in carrying the message of salvation to those who sit in the darkness of superstition and heathenism. The missionaries who are in the field are constantly calling for re-inforcements. They have that hopeful and joyous spirit of work which always is more than half the battle. The frequently repeated vacancies by death, in the last few years have been promptly filled by men and women who have gone forth to the perils and the privileges of missionary service and sacrifice in Mosquitia. At no time in its history of about fifty years, have the people among whom and for whom this mission was established, been more eagerly loyal in its support. Never before have the neighboring tribes sent more urgent invitations to the missionaries to come over and help them, and to break to these hungry souls the bread of life.

In the establishment of new stations, almost in every instance, the people themselves have borne almost the entire burden of the expense of building the churches. A portion of the expense of maintaining the missionary families is borne by the modest profits of the trading with the natives which is carried on to some extent under the supervision of the Mission. Standing as this Moravian Mission does, at this time, face to face with peculiar perils, all true disciples of him who gave the great commission to evangelize all the world, will unite in prayer to Jesus for his special care of these brethren and sisters, their work and the people of their spiritual charge.

The Spanish control of this strip of Central American territory came to an end in the latter part of the seventeenth century. About 1678, England set up her claim for a British protectorate over the Mosquito Reserve. This authority, reasserted in the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty within a little more than a generation ago, has been the mainstay of the independent sovereignty of the hereditary Indian chief who has governed the Reserve.

The Reserve covers a large part of the coast along the Caribbean Sea. The proposed building of the inter-oceanic canal, across the Nicaraguan territory, gives an international importance to all that affects that land. It seems but natural that Nicaragua should desire to secure the control of the eastern coast line, from which the autonomy of the Reserve cuts her off. The control of this important strip of Nicaraguan territory must naturally and inevitably fall into the hands of Nicaragua.

The influence of our Moravian missionaries has been similar to that exerted upon all heathen tribes to whom Gospel civilization has been brought. They have constituted the moral support and strength of the government, ever since the establishment of the mission in 1849. They have secured to the people a measurably faithful administration of just laws.

It remains to be seen whether the readjustment of the civil relations of Mosquitia's people by the Nicaraguans will be effected without seriously impairing the prosperous continuance of the work of these devoted men and women who have given their best, in Jesus' name, for the moral and spiritual uplift of the Mosquito Indians.

GOSPEL LIGHT FROM THE BLIND.

A poor blind woman in Paris put twenty-seven francs into the plate at a missionary meeting.

"You cannot afford so much," said one.

"Yes, sir, I can," she answered.

On being pressed, she said:

"I am blind, and I said to my fellow straw workers, 'How much money do you spend in a year for oil for your lamps when it is too dark to work, nights?' They replied, 'Twenty-seven francs.' So I found I save so much in the year because I am blind and do not need a lamp, and I give it to shed light into the dark heathen lands."

MISSIONS IN KOREA.

In Korea the Presbyterian Board occupies Seoul, Fusan and Gensan, on the east coast, and Pyeng-Yang in the interior. Of these Fusan and Gensan are the only places liable to injury from the Japanese fleets. The Methodist Board has little established work outside of Seoul, and has withdrawn its missionaries from the interior stations to that city.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, Church of England, has some missionaries at Seoul and Chemulpo. In Seoul the missionaries are practically safe, being under the care of the United States legation and the protection of the United States soldiers from the ship of war at Chemulpo, the port of Seoul.

JESUS PREACHING AT NAZARETH.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 7. Luke 4: 16-30.
Golden Text, Heb. 12: 25. By Mrs. Baxter.

TEMPTATION conquered leaves us stronger than before. Jesus returned from his sore conflict with the enemy in the power of the Spirit into Galilee. The Spirit of God had come upon him like a dove when he was baptized; "full of the Holy Spirit." (Luke 4: 1, R.V.) He had been led of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted, and now, the temptation over, he was as Man in the power of the Spirit, ready for his ministry. "A fame concerning him went out through all the region round about, and he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all." Divine power is popular until it crosses the human will and attacks human pride. The Galileans, in glorifying Jesus, glorified a man; they did not know Jesus as the Son of God. It was only from the very time that Simon Peter recognized and acknowledged him as "the Christ the Son of the living God" that Jesus could teach the lesson of the Cross and his coming sufferings. But Jesus had an intuitive Shrinking from Popularity.

The Spirit of God never glorifies man, but Christ, in this dispensation of the Spirit: "He shall glorify me." So Christ did not seek his own glory. Thus we see that, instead of remaining in the places where he was glorified of all, he came to the place where he had been brought up, and where he was least likely to have honor from men. In this, as in all else, he was guided by his Father. So he came to Nazareth for the first time since he had left his carpenter vocation to seek baptism from John the Baptist, who had born testimony to him when the opened heaven declared him to be the Son of God. "He entered, as his custom was, into the synagogue on the Sabbath day and stood up to read." Jesus was not a Levite, he was of the tribe of Judah, and the synagogue was in no way a substitute for the Temple worship, but only a place of gathering together for instruction in the Scriptures and for prayer. But the fact that Jesus was an acknowledged Reader and Teacher in the synagogue leads us to conclude that his great familiarity with the Scriptures was recognized at Nazareth, and that by common consent; he was looked up to as a Teacher although none perhaps, except Joseph and Mary, had any idea that he was indeed the Messiah.

"And then was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Isaiah." He was familiar with it as with every other Scripture of the Old Testament. "And when he had opened the book (which was a huge double roll of parchment), he found the place where it was written, The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor, he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord." It was part of the prophecy of Isa: 61: 1-6, but he, the Living Word, stopped short just where the fulfillment has stopped short to admit of this Gentile dispensation which shall end with "the day of vengeance of our God," the time of "tribulation." The Jews were familiar with this prophecy, but few among them could understand that it should be broken off in the middle; the way of the Cross was revealed only to the few who Studied the Whole Scriptures.

The Lord Jesus read the prophecy as far as it referred to himself, at that time, and having done so, he closed the book and sat down. He had given his message: there was nothing left but to apply it. But it did its work; "the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him." A profound impression was made. And yet nothing had been done but to read these verses of Scripture in the power of the Holy Ghost. What an illustration of his own declaration: "The words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself." The sermons preached by Peter, by Stephen and Paul, etc., are almost entirely Scripture. No human philosophy is added, no figure of speech, no flowery language adorns the testimony of these men of God: they did not preach what are now called sermons; they preached "the Word." Those who came together did not come to hear a preacher, but to hear the Word of God.

And the application? It was as short as the Bible reading; "He began to say unto them; This day is this fulfilled in your ears." This was all: he read that which described a ministry, on which he had entered, to fulfil that very Word of God. They had heard from the surrounding country the fame of him, but he had been brought up among them, they had known him as an ordinary mechanic. First they "bore him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth." The Word of God was beginning to exercise its power, when a change came over them and they had no longer ears to hear. They looked at the Instrument and could not believe that the familiar face of the carpenter, whom they had passed daily in the street, and knew so well, could really be the face of the long expected Messiah, who was spoken of in this prophecy. "Is not this Joseph's son?" just as later on the Jews of Capernaum said, "Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph whose father and mother we know? how then is it that he saith; I came down from heaven?" (John 6: 42.) They did not do as the Bereans did, who "searched the scriptures daily, to see if these things were so." The men of Nazareth who had always looked on Jesus as Joseph's son, and whose ideas of the Messiah were of a reigning, triumphant Potentate, repudiated the idea of the claims of Jesus. "And he said unto them, ye will surely say unto me this proverb; Physician heal thyself, whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum, do also here in thy country; Verily, I say unto you: No prophet is accepted in his own country." And then he added

A Solemn Warning:

"I tell you of a truth, many widows were in Israel when the heaven was shut up three years and six months, when great famine was throughout all the land, but unto none of them was Elias sent save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. And many lepers were in Israel in the days of Elisha the prophet, and none of them was cleansed saving Naaman the Syrian." Among all his people in Israel over whom his heart yearned, and whom he longed to deliver and to bless, there was not one widow found to trust in him, and he must needs go outside of his chosen people to find one widow in that generation who would serve his purpose in vindicating his claim to be the God of the widow. He was, from the land of Egypt, the Physician of his people; "I am the Lord that healeth thee," but he must needs find a heathen Syrian who should be a witness to his grace and power, for not one could be found of the many lepers in Israel who would put his trust in God; and the honor of God, demanded that there should be, at least, one witness to his will and power to heal, in the days of Elisha: Should it be so now? Must he needs turn his back on Nazareth, the place of his early youth, where he had studied the Scriptures carefully, where he had lived a holy life in an ordinary occupation, and where there were so many associations which were dear to him; was it just here, where at a great cost to himself, he had, in obedience to his Father, read in the synagogue the prophecy which in his life and ministry he was now fulfilling—that he should first meet with opposition and persecution! Yes; it was even so—the Cross was entering into his ministry. He was "to die daily" all through his life. If he had gone on preaching and healing as a prophet, without disturbing the prejudices of the people, or bringing them to book, all would have been the quietness of death. Jesus had explained his ministry elsewhere. He was ready to do at Nazareth what he had done elsewhere, but they must accept him as he fulfilled the Scriptures, and must own that their own conceptions about the Messiah were wrong; they must know a suffering, a despised Messiah, and this they would not have. "All they in the synagogue, when they heard these things, were filled with wrath, and rose up to thrust him out of the city, and led him to the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, that they might cast him down headlong."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AN ANCIENT BOOK.

THE last lesson on the life of Christ left him at Sychar, after his talk with the woman of Samaria. Thence he appears to have gone to Cana, where on a former visit he turned water into wine. On this occasion, he healed the son of a nobleman. From Luke we learn he then went to Nazareth, where he had been brought up. On the Sabbath, he attends the service in the Synagogue. As a boy he had doubtless been there often, but now he goes with all the éclat of the miracles he had worked during the past year. The rulers appear to have recognized the distinction he had won and to have invited him to conduct the service. It was the custom thus to honor a distinguished visitor, and we may infer that Jesus was invited, as he was little likely to have put himself forward without the invitation. The people seem to have hoped that he would do some miracle there as he had done at Cana. The attendant handed him the prophecy of Isaiah. It was inscribed on a roll of parchment (as shown in the initial letter). He turned to the part which in our version is the beginning of the sixty-first chapter. He stopped reading in the middle of the passage, handed the book back to the attendant and sat down, as was customary, to preach. His first words showed why he had not finished the passage. "This day," he said, "is the Scripture fulfilled." It was the acceptable year of the Lord. The next words relating to the day of vengeance were not then fulfilled but were still future. At this point the indignation of the hearers seems to have been stirred. They apparently asked, "Does this man whom we have seen working at his trade, whose family we know, claim that Isaiah was writing of him?" Others, who were disposed to accept him, were disappointed by his next words, which intimated that he did not intend to work a miracle there, and justified that course by the examples of Elijah and Elisha who did their wonders among strangers. The two classes joined in their indignation, and the service broke up in tumult. They hurried him to the place of execution; but at the last they appear to have recovered their better judgment and allowed him to go away. He left the town and never again, as far as we know, did he return.

As his custom was he went to the synagogue. The Lord set an example in this that is not always followed. Every one should have the custom of going to God's house on his day. A minister complaining of the small attendance at a week-evening service, said that one member did not come because it looked like rain, but the following evening, although it was actually raining, the member was at a place farther away listening to a lecture. A second member did not come because he was tired, so he stayed and worked on a sleigh for his boy. A third was a woman and she stayed because it was slippery and she was afraid of falling, but the next morning, although it was still pery she went down town, having wrapped a piece of woolen rag around her shoe to keep her from slipping. Of many a person it might be said not, "As his custom he went to the Lord's house," but "as custom was he made excuse."

He hath anointed me to preach the Gospel. A missionary in India answered with a able a Mohammedan objector who rupted him in preaching. The Mohammedan wanted the missionary to explain doctrine of the Trinity and came again again to the services to put his question after the missionary had given an private to a statement of his belief on the ject. Finally the missionary submitted dispute to his audience. "Suppos said, "a fatal disease is devastating kingdom. The king has a specific wh a sure cure and he calls a number of sicians, gives them the specific and them go out with it and heal the There is one physician who effects cures and the king sends for him an quires how it is. The physician an that a learned man wanted inform about the king's person and private lit he has been satisfying him. But the says, "Meanwhile my subjects are dy sent you out to administer the specit to gratify the curiosity of learned. And the physician is punished and des to be. Now," said the missionary, King has sent me out to preach the C that dying men might be saved and not going to neglect that to argue abo Trinity." The audience applauded the missionary proceeded to preach the G

An Appeal to Christian America

TURKISH RELIEF COMMITTEE IN NEW YORK ADVOCATES THE PITIFUL CASE OF THE CONSTANTINOPLE EARTHQUAKE SUFFERERS.

Christian Europe Sets the Example of Helpfulness—Many Distinguished Americans Unite in Urging America to Aid the Movement—A Great Opportunity for Generous Deeds and for the Advancement of the Gospel.

IN His Name," comes a loud cry for succor across the Atlantic once again. It is a call that cannot pass unheeded, for it is uttered by those whom the Gospel of Jesus teaches us to regard as brothers. In issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, facts concerning the prevailing distress in Constantinople were briefly stated. That it was not overdramatic for details, since the actual condition of affairs among the earthquake sufferers is far more than first represented.

A very large proportion of the sufferers have been rendered destitute by the war. They are tradesmen and shopkeepers, and there are hundreds of cloth merchants, bakers, fruit dealers, bazaar keepers, grocers, traders and people of similar occupations. They are Moslems, Armenians, Greeks; the two last-named nationalities being represented in almost every business known in the city. There are large numbers of these unfortunates in open camps, many points outside of the city. One of the largest camps of the refugees is at the west of the city, where there is an extensive garden which was formerly a private pleasure-ground for the Sultan. But so general and widespread has the distress, that the humane ruler, appreciating the urgent necessity of supplying succor for the unhappy and despairing ones—who seemed to be panic-stricken by their double misfortunes in the loss of relatives and property—ordered the place to be transformed into a camp for special use. This the Sultan did immediately after the full extent of the earthquake visitation became apparent. To his treasurer, he issued an order to draw from his personal income a sum sufficient to supply bread to all the poor who congregated in the Yildiz gardens and other places, and at the same time directed that a sufficient number of tents be erected for them, also at his personal expense.

The Sultan's Kindness.—And many other orders of the Sultan, issued with the same kind and charitable object, were carried into effect by a Commission which was entrusted with the supervision of all relief measures, and of the commission being Sadrazam, "first Pasha." His duties are very similar to those of Count Andre Bobrinskoy, who was the head of the Grand Duke's Committee in Russia during the great famine two years ago, when the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent the steamer "Lithuania" with a cargo of food to the starving people. With Sadrazam, who is a kind, benevolent-looking man, past middle age, a number of other Pashas and officials are associated, the whole forming an Imperial Commission. Their duties are very light, owing to the very large number of men requiring aid. No distinction whatever is made by the Commission on account of the nationality or creed of the sufferers, for it is the express order of the Sultan now, as at other times, that Turk, Armenian, Moslem, Jew, or Christian, be treated on a basis of absolute equality by the relieving officers. The relief wagons, on their rounds, make no distinction, but all are supplied alike. Medicine and other supplies were often sent by order from the palace, to the needy, within an hour after their condition being ascertained.

There are many evidences of a kindly nature and a heart that, in the time of affliction regards all men as brothers, are not only those who have had opportunities of serving the character of the Turkish Relief Committee, but also the Turkish Relief Committee. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should remember the Sultan's liberality in granting lands and facilities for the erection of Christian churches in Constantinople—a thing unprecedented among Moslem rulers. He has always been a liberal giver to charity. Repeatedly, after large fires that involved ruinous losses to numbers of families, orders from the palace have brought tents, food and money, and afforded encouragement to the helpless ones to make a new start in life.

Fears of Pestilence.

But the terrible calamity in Constantinople presents a harder problem than any the government has encountered in the present generation, since it deals with many thousands, who must be helped for the next few months or until some permanent provision can be made for them. It is a situation which, but for the aid that is being extended from other quarters, would undermined, had also agreed to serve on the Committee in an honorary capacity.

At the meeting of the Committee, the needs of the sufferers in Constantinople were discussed and arrangements were perfected for the prompt transmission of all funds subscribed in this country for their relief. The Fund has already received the warmest assurances of sympathy and approval from many quarters. It is especially desirable that the charitably-disposed should render aid as speedily as possible, since we are assured that the present condition of the unsheltered and destitute families is one that calls for energetic action.

The Earthquakes' Work.

Later details received by members of the Committee from Constantinople furnish a sad picture of the present condition of affairs in that city. The "Kareek" (Path), and other daily newspapers continue to print long lists of buildings wrecked, and speak of the number of killed, injured and homeless as even larger than was first estimated. In the "Divan Yole," "Tavook Bazaar," "Osmanyeh Bazaar," "Charsko us, is one of the highest privileges a Christian can enjoy. The cause we have presented is one that deals with the best interests of Christianity, in a land where our devoted Christian missionaries have been making a gallant struggle. By responding to the appeal of the Turkish Relief Committee, you will thus not only afford direct aid to the earthquake sufferers, and strengthen the bonds of amity between the two countries, but you will be opening up new opportunities for missionary influence and usefulness, and advancing the standard of the Gospel in a distant land.

Aiding the Western Sufferers.

Our Missionary's Tour of the Burned District in Minnesota—Sad Memorial Services—Abundant Relief Measures.

DURING the past week, Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Sunday School missionary who was detailed to visit the fire-devastated district in Minnesota, and co-operate in the work of relief, has been over the territory swept bare by the recent conflagration. In a letter relating his experiences, Mr. Sharp says that he found the fire refugees generously cared for. They were mostly housed in temporary quarters in Pine City. Duluth had cared for about 1,300 refugees, other cities had done an equally noble Christian work and the State authorities had been busy in relieving their wants. He writes from Pine City:

"As our train from St. Paul to this place proceeded north, the smoke from fires in the country increased till we reached Rush City where the train received orders to stop on account of alarms of fire. The smoke became quiet dense, and the heavens lurid overhead, like a display of aurora-borealis, but evidently from fires in the woods west and north of us. Looking north, up the railroad track we could see only a short distance off, the smoke making it darker below than above.

"Ten miles south of Pine City we found the people in a panic. At Rush City, passengers and citizens were absorbed in discussing the prospects of a conflagration. Passengers got out of the cars, mingled with the citizens around the platform of the depot, viewed the situation, discussed what should be done if hemmed in by fire, at intervals brushing off of their clothing the white ashes which the wind scattered over us, not copiously, but pretty constantly. I praise God for the peace I enjoyed in the assurance that I was in his hands. The feeling of uneasiness with the people increased when a strong, high wind set in from the north, the direction from which danger was most apprehended. But at length appearances became less threatening, the train received orders to move, and we reached Pine City about six P. M.

"Memorial Services for the dead of the fire-stricken region were held at the Opera House, the following account of which is from the St. Paul Pioneer Press:

"The memorial services were under the immediate supervision of Joseph T. Mannix of Minneapolis. Opening prayer by Rev. George W. Sharp, of Kirksville, Mo., representing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of New York; reading Scriptures by Rev. Louis Knutson; solo by Mrs. Dr. Barnum; remarks by Rev. Mr. Knutson, the Hinckley pastor who passed through the fire; commemorative poem by J. Lin Talman of St. Paul, read by S. G. L. Roberts; "To Scenes of Peace Retire," by Albert Berg of Center City, Minn., who is possessed of a remarkable voice; remarks by Rev. Father E. A. Jock of Rush City."

Mr. Sharp adds to his letter: "From present indications, my judgment is that the greatest need will come a little later on, when the cold weather arrives, which will be soon in this climate." The refugees are kept away from Hinckley, so that the workmen there may not be hindered in constructing temporary homes or shelters. The local relief committees have done nobly, and the St. Paul "Pioneer Press" has conducted an excellent relief work on its own account.

An appeal has been issued by sufferers in the burned district for help to bury the dead animals, whose carcasses are beginning to decay, and which threaten to breed pestilence. Governor Nelson has expressed the opinion that this is a very important matter, as the water-courses and the atmosphere of the whole region might be poisoned by such infection. He promised to devise some remedy and thought it would be a charity if some effort to bury the animals were made by those intending to help in general relief. It was suggested that a number of needy unemployed sufferers might be hired to do this work—thus giving them practical relief, and at the same time averting possible pestilence.

THE RELIEF COMMITTEE'S APPEAL.

"Owing to the recent earthquakes, the destitution in a large portion of Constantinople, and many suburban towns and villages, is something appalling. Thousands of families, whose homes and places of business have been demolished, with all their contents, are camping in open lots, and clothing, shelter and food are urgently needed. The calamity is so great that it has over-taxed the abilities of the Imperial Ottoman and Municipal Governments, which now find themselves compelled to look to other countries for help.

"This deplorable state of destitution has recently been confirmed by the following cablegram from the United States Minister to the Porte:

"CONSTANTINOPLE, Sept. 14.
"Constantinople is in urgent need of relief. All European governments have contributed. The Sultan gave generously during the Johnstown disaster, and Christian America should reciprocate."

Signed

"TERRELL."

"Humanity and Christianity alike suggest that our own land should at once respond to this pathetic appeal. Such a response would not only be a graceful and grateful acknowledgment of the Sultan's action during the Johnstown disaster several years ago, when he led the entire list of European contributors with a princely donation, but it would be of inestimable value in influencing the attitude of Turkey in the future toward strangers within her gates, especially Christians. England has already contributed $40,000, France $70,000, the Emperor of Austria $1,250, and the German Emperor 5,000 marks, to aid the sufferers. Among the latter are many thousands of Christians, and these have thus far been fed by the Sultan's and the Imperial Prince's bounty as freely as the Moslem sufferers. All money contributed in this country will be forwarded to the American Minister at Constantinople, and by him transferred to the Imperial Commission appointed for the purpose of relieving the wants of the multitude of earthquake sufferers. An American Turkish Relief Fund has been organized in New York, and at a recent meeting, elected THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, as Treasurer of the Fund, to whom all who desire to aid in this movement should forward their contributions, which will be promptly acknowledged in the columns of that paper, and forwarded to Minister Terrell as arranged.

"The Committee trusts that the well-known generosity of the American people which has prompted them in the past to relieve human suffering wherever found, will lead them to respond heartily to this appeal in behalf of the unfortunate people of Constantinople. doubtedly result in most painful consequences. There might be a menace to all Europe in the event of an outbreak of cholera or an epidemic of any description among the wretched crowds now huddled together in the tents and with just enough food to keep life together. The Porte has done its best to feed and shelter them; it now remains for the Christian world on both continents to show its practical sympathy by coming to the rescue of these afflicted ones.

The Relief Committee's Appeal.

The members of the Turkish Relief Committee met in the Bible House last week and issued the appeal to the American people which we print on this page.

At that meeting, letters were received from a number of distinguished Americans expressing the warmest sympathy in the movement. Among these were communications from Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, Hon. Whitelaw Reid and Governor Knute Nelson of Minnesota, accepting the office of Honorary Vice-President and promising to aid the movement by every means in their power in the interest of Christianity and humanity. Mayor Gilroy of New York, Comptroller Theodore W. Myers and other gentlemen prominent in public affairs in the metropolis, it was announced at the meet-

THE RECENT EARTHQUAKE.

WHAT a rough time this old earth is having! The recent earthquake in Constantinople is only one of a series of volcanic agitations. Geologists tell us our planet has been in convulsions ever and anon since it was born, and it does seem to me as though it had been in chills and fever without end—now so cold it chattered with the white teeth of glacier, and now hot until the hemispheres seemed afire. "Firm as the everlasting hills" should be rejected as a figure of speech, for the hills are neither firm nor everlasting. Two or three years ago our climate was all disturbed and frenzied by what were called electric showers in the sun. Every little while a comet shoots through our night with enough force to obliterate us with one sweep of its tail. Caracas down, Lisbon buried, Java cracked open, Charleston terrorized, San Francisco again and again frantic, and now a large part of Constantinople in ruins and thousands homeless and calling for our sympathy and help.

It is evident that God has no special controversy with any city or any land, for all lands have felt the tread of the earthquake. My impression is that there will be no long continued cessation of these subterranean attacks; but a greater frequency of them until the planetary demolition. It is a shaky, rheumatic, epileptic old world and it will die in one of these stupendous fits. It is a poor place to make permanent investment. Some think it will be fixed up for the final residence of the righteous. No; there is so much ice to be melted and so much fire to be extinguished and so many wild winds to be tamed. It is hardly worth while to reconstruct it. Let us have a brand new world. God did not make the moon over again after it became an extinct volcano. The telescope tells us it was left in ruins and will probably stay in ruins, and I think this world will yet be a forsaken wreck, to which we will from brighter spheres make excursions as now we go down to the beach at Southampton or Amagansett to see an old hulk that has been rotting there for twenty years. There is caged in the center of this world an old lion of destruction and he will not rest quiet much of the time and he plunges against the bars of his cage. A few years ago he put one paw against the Western Hemisphere and that made everything rattle from Florida to New York, and now he puts his paw against the Eastern Hemisphere and Turkey and Greece rock from side to side. No one can chain the raging infernal monster or bid him lie down except the one who made the lions crouch before Daniel in the Babylonish cavern.

Volcanoes are to this world what boils are to a diseased human body—the escape of bad humors that must come out—and though they are hard to bear—both the boils and volcanoes—it is a choice in both cases between eruption and death. Perhaps God will give to the human race a power not yet exercised. By discharge of artillery it has been found that showers of rain can be brought down, and it almost always rains on the evening of the Fourth of July, after gunpowdery explosion, and always rains on the evening after a battle, so the ingenious men may after awhile contrive some system of cannonading that will break up the great droughts that afflict the earth. So I am not sure that huge-handed machinery may not be invented that shall yet give relief to this world's paroxysm of earthquake, diving down until the disturbed elements can be let free. A few extemporized outlets would end forever these subterranean turmoils and take this nervous and feverish earth into placidity and health.

But before its destruction the world is to be gardenized. The last thunder will not roll over a desert, but over a Los Angeles, a Chatsworth, a Paradise regained. We may not be able to manage the inside of this world, but religion will manage the outside. If the lion will not lie down under the mountain, the lamb will lie down on the top of it. In Eden, Adam had the beasts around him in amity, and the birds taught him to sing, and the lambs taught him to play, and the fish taught him to swim, and the lion and lioness at peace with all covered his feet with their tawny mane. So it shall be again. All forces, brutal, atmospheric, aquatic, volcanic shall be in complete accord with the redeemed human race, and there shall be nothing to hurt or destroy in all God's holy mount, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

PERSECUTION.

A CUP may be so sweet that it is insipid or nauseating. Our cup of life is not all sweets. It is a compound cup and with the saccharine there mingle the acids and the bitters. All the good and useful shall have the promise of persecutions fulfilled. Cutting out the tongue, putting out the eye, or pulling apart the limbs is a past fashion, but still there are weapons of persecution. Sometimes it is a newspaper attack, sometimes it is an anonymous letter, sometimes private caricature and misrepresentation. Tell me of any man eminently useful that has not been eminently cursed. Crossing the sea, I used to hang over the side of the ocean steamer and watch the stroke of the wave against the ship's cutwater. I noticed when it was foggy and we were making only seven or eight knots an hour, there was but little stir in the water, but when it was fair weather and we went at the rate of 400 miles a day, the ocean tossed in front of the prow and boiled on either side. So just in proportion as a Christian makes headway in Christian enterprise, in that ratio will there be commotion and excited resistance in the water. If nothing can be said against you, if you have never been assaulted, if everybody seems pleased with you, you are making little or no progress; you are waterlogged. Instead of mastering the waves, the waves master you. All of you who will do your duty must take a share of that treatment.

Be not over-sensitive. If you see two persons talking in a corner, and occasionally looking toward you, you are annoyed and think they are talking against you. Let not your mind sit brooding over one small egg of provocation till it has hatched out into a great obscene culture of unhappiness. Persecution may be a blessing by testing our earnestness. A man may think himself in earnest, when it is a mere hobby he is riding, and when the hobby balks he gets off and goes home. Let a man start out and find those who promised to help, proving tricky and his motives maligned, he will give it up unless he be in earnest. It is easy to be a soldier in time of peace. We had many brave captains and colonels and majors before the war began, but at Big Bethel, when the war opened, how the fellows did run! If men are not in earnest in Christian conflict, they make a big show for a while, but, attacked and pursued, they show the white flag and surrender. Persecution, if sanctified, makes one humble. Success has a tendency to brag, and so God lets it be jeered at. The man says: "I endowed that college. I started that school. I built that church. Is not this great Babylon that I have built?" And God turns Nebuchadnezzar out to eat grass like an ox. "Blessed are the poor in spirit for theirs is the kingdom of heaven!"

Another advantage of persecution is it lets us know how much of the bad is left in us. What a mild Christian he was when everybody praised him! Now he runs against the sharp edge of sarcasm and opposition and he is in full fight. He feels more like swearing than praying. He runs about in great excitement talking over all the mean things he knows about those who oppose him. An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, scorn for scorn, personality for personality; and the demons of malice, revenge and hate, with racket of explosion, keep Fourth of July in his heart. After awhile he wakes up and finds he is all wrong, and he cools down and has a long list of hard speeches and unjust deeds to repent of and learns as never before his weakness before God. Persecution brings us into sympathy with Christ.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

H. Raymond, Trenton, N. J. The Sultan of Turkey, whose predecessors were regarded as the greatest foes of Christianity, has, by his recent acts of charity, put many so-called Christians to shame. Without any suggestions save the kindly promptings of his own heart, he sent a noble gift of money to the Johnstown sufferers, and now I see he has done likewise in the case of the fire sufferers in the West—and this, although he has a much greater calamity than our own to contend with at home. If there be any truth in the old Roman proverb, "He gives twice who gives quickly," then the Sultan has given four times! This seems to me to be good Christian logic. Now let us see all who believe we should vie with each other in well-doing roll up a splendid fund, worthy the name of Christian America, for the Constantinople earthquake sufferers.

We believe there are many who will echo Mr. Raymond's sentiments approvingly. The present is an age of international goodwill and kindly deeds; but even apart from the Sultan's generous acts, as mentioned by our correspondent, there remains the Christian duty of relieving human suffering, especially when it is so painful and widespread as in Constantinople. Ex-Mayor Hewitt's letter and the appeal of the Turkish Relief Fund Committee in another column explain the situation, and the urgent need of help.

Constant Reader, Lamont, Pa. 1. When and where was the first Dictionary printed? 2. What is the Moabite stone? 3. Where is Mainz, where the first complete Bible was made?

1. Dictionaries are really very old. The Chinese have possessed standard dictionaries—huge, comprehensive affairs—for many centuries. Athenæus, the Greek author, refers to over thirty dictionaries, one of which was in existence during or shortly after the reign of Alexander the Great. Probably the first printed dictionary was the "Catholicon" or "Summa" of Johannes de Janua, which appeared in 1460 and ran twenty editions in a quarter of a century. The first English dictionary was published in 1623. 2. The Moabite stone, discovered in 1868 at Dhiban in Moab, contains in Phoenician characters the wars of Mesha, King of Moab with Israel. It contains many confirmations of events mentioned in Scripture. 3. In Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany.

C. W. D., Marshall, O. 1. If a person subscribe a certain sum to build a church and then he has to leave the neighborhood before he pays, and finds he cannot pay all of his subscription without difficulty, what is required of him? 2. Is a person as responsible for a subscription as any other debt he contracts?

1. His position would be unfortunate, but he would be still bound in good faith to pay his subscription, unless, on explaining the matter to the proper parties, they decided to release him wholly or partly from his pledge, as they would probably do. His proper course would be to go to them frankly and explain the entire situation. 2. Morally, yes; it is a debt in the highest sense, being an obligation of honor which should take precedence of all other obligations. In a case, such as you mention, the entire project rests on the absolute good of those who pledge their word, voluntarily contribute their share. The legal responsibility would depend largely on the form of pledge. A written pledge, even if executed by pencil, would hold the signer, and possibly also would a verbal pledge, made in presence of witnesses.

We have received many letters of the tenor as the foregoing and to all have we the same uniform answer: While these occupations may not necessarily be sinful in themselves, the emotions they excite and the character they induce are liable to be character very injuriously. They are, even in their least objectionable aspect, frivolous indulgences. That they are detrimental to spiritual growth ought to be a conclusive reason why Christians should avoid them.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE ANTWERP EXHIBITION.

CN international exhibition is attracting visitors from all parts of Europe and crowds of American tourists to the quaint old town of Antwerp, in Belgium. Although it seems an exhibition in miniature to people who saw the World's Fair at Chicago, there is much in it to please the eye and interest the intelligent spectator. America has its own building, a picture of which appears on this page. Machinery, electrical apparatus and ingenious instruments of various kinds are its chief contents and these are examined with wonder by the Belgian workmen. Other nations are well represented. England sent the model of an earl's mansion of the time of Queen Elizabeth, which is a perfect reproduction of the furniture and all the appliances in use at the beginning of the seventeenth century. France surprises visitors by making her chief exhibit a trophy of light-colored beer-barrels. It is claimed that the French brewers have succeeded in making better beer than the Germans, both for home consumption and exportation, and the fact gratifies the national pride. Every Frenchman is glad if his country is ahead of her enemy in anything, though success in brewing is not a matter for a patriot to rejoice over. One of the Belgian exhibits which attracts general attention is an exact reproduction of a Congo village. It is, however, with the old town of Antwerp that one who visits it for the first time is most pleased. It is an exhibition in itself with its crooked streets, jutting cornices, and weather-stained buildings. A fine old town, with many historical associations, it speaks of a time long gone by, for Antwerp can boast of an existence as a town for eleven hundred years. Wonderful changes has the old town seen in that time, changes in government, in manner of life and social conditions. It is only in the spiritual world that permanence is assured, for the Lord's "throne endures from generation to generation." (Lam. 5:19.)

Fighting Fire at Sea.

The steamship "Capac" arrived at New York on Sept. 14 from Chili after a perilous voyage. When the vessel was off the Falkland Islands, smoke was seen issuing from one of the bunkers, which contained six hundred tons of coal. A hose was at once turned into the bunker, and after pouring in water for four hours the smoke stopped, and it was supposed the fire was extinguished. The voyage was resumed, but, two days later, the fire was raging again with still greater intensity. The crew worked night and day, but could not get the flames under control. A serious complication was the fact that the greater part of the cargo consisted of nitrate of soda packed in bags, and the Captain knew that if once the flames ate through the bulkhead and ignited the nitrate, all hope of saving the ship would be lost. The life-boats were provisioned and swung from the davits and all preparations were made for leaving the ship. The course was changed and the ship headed for the nearest land, which was Rio Janeiro. All hopes now hung on reaching that port before the nitrate caught fire. The crew, almost exhausted with their long fight with the flames, redoubled their efforts, and at last the ship entered the harbor. Then firemen from the city removed a quantity of coal from the bunker, the fire was reached and effectually extinguished, and the voyage to New York was finished in safety. The trouble and the danger came from the fire not being thoroughly extinguished when it was first discovered. An analogous mistake has often involved men in spiritual peril. Wicked propensities are not always extinct when they are subdued, and if vigilance is relaxed they sometimes break out with renewed energy and threaten temporal and eternal ruin. (1 Cor. 9:27.)

Return of the Peary Expedition.

A telegram from St. John's, Newfoundland, announces the arrival there on Sept. 15 of the "Falcon," with a majority of Lieut. Peary's Arctic expedition on board. The leader of the expedition was not with the party as he had decided to remain behind at Falcon Harbor, North Greenland, to continue his explorations. He has as assistants Hugh J. Lee and Matthew Henson, his colored servant who volunteered to remain with him. Lieut. Peary was not able to cross Greenland last spring as he hoped to have done. He intended to go from Falcon Harbor on the north-west coast to Independence Bay on the north-east coast and set out on his journey on March 6. The long summer day had commenced then, and the Lieutenant started over the ice with seven men, ninety dogs and twelve sledges. Independence Bay was 650 miles off in a straight line, but the party succeeded in travelling only 125 miles. The weather was very severe, the thermometer often registering sixty degrees below zero. Strong headwinds were also encountered which delayed the party and increased their sufferings. Two explorers were severely frost-bitten at the end of the eighth day and were compelled to return. Six days later the storm increased and the wind was laden with drifting snow. The explorers were forced to go into camp where they remained three days. They were then on the summit of the ice cap five thousand feet above the sea. The march was resumed on March 24 but two of the party were unable to go on, and returned to Falcon Harbor. The remainder of the party struggled on until April 10. It was then decided to return. One of the explorers was badly frost-bitten and the others were suffering from snow-blindness. Many of the dogs were dead and it would have been suicidal to have continued the march. The return journey was made in ten days. While waiting at Falcon Harbor for the arrival of the relief party, Lieut. Peary surveyed Melville Bay and made an excursion to Ross's Iron Mountains near Cape York, where he made photographs of the famous meteorites. He intends making another effort to reach Independence Bay next spring, using the Esquimaux as a supporting party. Peary has evidently the true spirit of the explorer. It is by such courage, indifference to hardship and danger and such indomitable persistence on the part of its devotees, that science has won its triumphs. In the Arctic, as in Africa, our knowledge of unknown regions has been purchased for us at the cost of suffering and often of life itself. So it is with every realm that is added to the kingdom of Christ, but science has no crown to offer for self-sacrifice like that which Christ will give to those who suffer and fall in his service. (1. Cor. 9:25.)

Seven Days in a Box Car.

A brakeman on the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad rescued a man from a distressing situation on September 5. He heard a strange knocking on the side of a box car which stood on a siding near the Philadelphia station and opened the car to find the cause. As he opened the door the gaunt, emaciated form of a man rolled out. He was so weak that he could not stand, and could scarcely speak. The brakeman gave him some milk and the man revived sufficiently to tell his story. He said that he entered the car at St. Louis, where he had been working. He wanted to get to his home at Winchester, Va., having lost his situation at St. Louis. He had no funds, so he crawled into the car which was loaded with barrel-staves and was locked in. The car stood on the tracks for two days before it started on its journey he knew not whither, but, he hoped, to some point nearer his home. Two days later the car stopped, but the man knew not where. He had been four days without food and water and was in a fainting condition. He pounded on the sides of the car, but no one came to his relief. His hunger and thirst were so pressing that he gnawed the tops of his boots in his craving. Three days more passed, during which the car was sometimes moving and sometimes standing still. The man was too weak to hammer loudly and he was not heard until at Philadelphia the brakeman happened to be standing near the car, when its inmate pounded, and released him. He was sent to the hospital where his condition was pronounced critical. His sufferings were like those endured by men whom ministers and Christian workers often find, who, ardently desiring to reach their heavenly home, have taken the wrong means of getting there. Left to himself, a man is apt to try self-reformation, fasting and penance or any way rather than the only sure one of trusting in Christ. (Rom. 4:5.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Last Year in Response to a Request made by the publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, many of our readers were kind enough to furnish him with the names of twenty-five church members or adult Sunday School workers, in return for which they received a beautiful section of Olive Wood, cut from the Mount of Olives and polished in Jerusalem by workmen from Bethlehem. We have all these names now on file in our office, but would like to increase the list. We, therefore, make the same liberal offer, namely, a section of genuine Olive Wood for every twenty-five new names (in return for which names which have already been sent in, and hope that many of our subscribers can supply such names will avail themselves of this generous proposal. The Olive Wood is sent either by mail or express, all charges prepaid. Do not enclose communications of any other character in the application. Write on one side of the paper only and be careful to state clearly the names of town and State. Address your letter Premium Department, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

A Medical Mission Station has been opened at Bunner, on the borders of Afghanistan, a country which has been as firmly closed to missions as Tibet.

In London there is an Association of "Gospel Cyclists." They spend the Saturday half-holiday in excursions to towns near the city where they hold open-air Gospel meetings.

Mr. Alfred S. Dyer, the famous missionary in India, accompanied by Arthur W. Frautich and two Hindoo Christians, are on their way to England to conduct a campaign against the opium traffic.

The Recent Fire in Yokohama. Japan, which destroyed the books and papers of the American Bible Society, did not, we are glad to learn, spoil the electro plates, as they were stored in another building. The disaster is not so serious as was supposed.

The Chicago Bible Society Employs a Number of young women to go into the homes of the city to read the Bible and to supply copies of it at cost price to those who do not possess the Book, or in cases of extreme poverty to give a copy. Last year there was an average of fourteen of these workers employed. They made 31,000 visits, and distributed over 24,000 copies of the Scriptures in Chicago.

Mr. George Muller has issued his Fifty-fifth annual report of his Orphanages. From this it appears that the "orphan" account closed with a balance in hand of nearly $25,000, and the school and missionary account, with a balance of over $5,000. During the past year 1,950 orphans have been cared for, and the directors announce that they will be glad to receive applications on behalf of destitute orphans to fill existing vacancies.

A Sunday School Worker in Michigan says: A Bible which cost only thirty cents given in a Catholic family eight weeks ago, was read daily, and both man and wife are converted. They have found the "pearl of great price," all through the gift of a thirty-cent Bible.

Gospel Work Among the Italians of Kensington, Conn., has been very successful. Eleven of them were received into church membership on one day recently on confession of faith, after examination.

The Latest Report of the Moravian Mission Board gives the total expenditure for Foreign Missions for the year at over $350,000. They have 21 mission provinces, 122 principal stations, 21 outposts, 392 missionary laborers, and 91,844 under their care. Each 65 of their membership at home support a missionary.

A Correspondent of "The Interior," writes: The Presbyterians had at least two churches destroyed in the recent terrible Western fire, one at Hinckley and the other at Sandstone. The Hinckley pastor, the Rev. Peter Knudsen, escaped with his life and very heroically directed scores of people to the only place of safety, the pond in the unused gravel pit at the edge of the town. Mr. Knudsen lost all of his goods.

Among the candidates before the Civil Service Board in Wisconsin for examination was Julia Wheelock, a full-blooded Indian, who is to be a teacher in the Indian Schools. She is the first Indian ever examined by the Board. Of 1,300 Menominee Indians in this State, 520 can read and write English. $2,600 was expended by them last year for church purposes and books.

An Excellent System of Mission Work among the children of the poor is being pursued in Chicago. Three halls have been opened in different parts of the city where the children are taught music free. One meeting for boys and one for girls are held after school-hours in each hall once a week. The children come gladly and are taught Gospel hymns Mr. Wm. J. Tomlins is superintendent.

A Jewish girl who has been missing from Helsingborg for some time, and for whom official search has been made, has been found in London. She had joined the Salvation Army.

The American Baptist Publication Society is about to erect a building in Philadelphia in connection with its offices where in future it will do its own printing, etc. The cost of the building and plant will be $135,000.

A Society exists among Rituahsts which makes monthly intercessions for "the souls of clergymen who die in the faith." The biographer of the late Mr. J. H. Hopkins mentions regretfully that Dr. Hopkins lost the benefit of the Society's prayers by voting for the election of Dr. Phillips Brooks to the Bishopric of Massachusetts.

The Northwestern District of the American Sunday School Union, under the charge of Rev. E. G. Ensign, has been availing itself of a Gospel Railroad Car for the extension of its work. The party on the car included beside Mr. Ensign, Evangelist E. F. Goff, Mr. E. B. Stevenson, and one or two good singers from the Moody Institute. Successful meetings were held at Galesburg, Ill., Muscatine, Ia., Sioux Falls, S. D., and other places.

Sunday in Camp.

A Morning Reading with Jericho and Joshua's Battle-Field in Sight—The Sultan's Spring.

THE phrase "Sabbath stillness" borrows new meaning from the experience of a Lord's day passed in a wilderness camp. The very mules comprehend that nothing is expected of them, and do not offer to rise from breakfast until luncheon-time. The big leader of the palankeen team lies in the shadow of the burden he is expected to bear six days in the week, in lordly forgetfulness of yesterday and carelessness of to-morrow—a sedate preacher to the caretaking bipeds who watch him from the tent-door.

Our morning-reading has to do with Joshua and with Jericho. The city of palm-trees and of roses rivaling those of Damascus in prodigality of bloom, was still a place of note on our Lord's day, and the great mound to the left of our camp probably hides the ruins of one of the fortified towers, from which perhaps, as we like to think, the inhabitants "straitly shut up because of the children of Israel," watched during six suspenseful days the daily circuit made by priests in sacerdotal robes, bearing the ark, and followed by "all the men-of-war." Fancy dwells in the perusal, upon the awful silence that prevailed among a host so vast that it must have girdled the place, unless measurements made in modern times err as to the extent of ancient Jericho.

"Ye shall not shout nor make any noise with your voice," thus ran the leader's order—"neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth, until the day I bid you shout."

"And it came to pass on the seventh day that they arose about the dawning of the day," I read aloud.

There was need of an early start and brisk work, for between that gray day-break and the going down of the sun behind the hills lifting their bald heads against the cloudless heavens to-day, the town was compassed seven times. It would be well on toward evening when "it came to pass when the people heard the sound of the trumpet and shouted with a great shout that the wall fell down flat"—or, as the margin has it, "under it." That is, at the mighty roar which must have reverberated from distant Nebo and shaken the waters of the salt sea.

In the sanguinary history of conquest which succeeds the tale of this marvelous siege, we come once and again upon the war-cry—"As Joshua has done to Jericho and her king."

Alcides calls a halt by-and-by. In his opinion the Jews were never a war-like people unless urged to the front, and then required divine interposition in every exigency.

"Who of us does not?" I interpolate here.

"True—but listen! The surprise of Ai was planned by the Lord; when Joshua made a forced night-march from Gilgal, we are expressly told that 'the Lord discomfited' the five kings from Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish and Eglon, so that they fell before Israel, and 'He cast down great hail-stones from the heaven' upon them in the retreat, so that 'they were more than died with hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.'"

"What an amphitheatre of wonders, what a segregation of battle-fields this region has been," the young critic breaks off to observe. "It makes one dizzy to think of it. And how kings quarrelled for the possession of this miserable stretch of waste land. Eglon of Moab possessed the city of palm-trees, and David's sons and ambassadors took refuge here until their beards were grown, and three hundred and forty-five former inhabitants of Jericho were returned to the beloved oasis after the Captivity; Antony thought it good enough to give to Cleopatra; Herod the Great coveted and bought it from her, fortified and built in it his favorite palace—where he died, by the way. There was a big hippodrome here in which he ordered all the leading citizens of Jerusalem and vicinity to be imprisoned, when he knew his end was near, and left a dying injunction that they should be massacred as soon as the breath was out of his body—a Shylockian device to procure a general mourning for the dead king—And look at it now!"

The forenoon wears on peacefully. The writing-table is brought out to the tent-door and,—always in sight of Nebo—letters are written to the dear ones at home—all done as in a dream-world, so steeped are thought and fancy with the tragic story of that dead past.

We are still dreaming as we visit what modern travelers and natives know as the Sultan's Spring, a living fountain bubbling from the side of a mound of which I have spoken as covering a fortification of the Jericho destroyed by Joshua. Excavations have brought to view broken marbles and pottery, the remains of temples and dwellings belonging to a long-buried era. The whole hill is a conglomerate of dumping grounds for different ages, kings and tarrying in their midst, after the translation of Elijah, while the sons of the prophets sought vainly for his vanished friend. For, "Peradventure the Spirit of the Lord hath taken him up, and cast him upon some mountain, or into some valley."

"The situation of the city is pleasant," the Jericho people represented, "but the water is naught and the ground barren." And he went forth unto the spring of the waters, and cast the salt in there and said, "Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters. There shall not be from thence any more death of barren land." So the waters were healed unto this day.

"This is Elisha's Fountain,—if wise men are to be believed," comments the guide.

The healed waters are crystal-clear, and, led off in various directions from the outlet, make green and flourishing the small gardens of herbs in the neighborhood. The sides are covered with succulent plants. All growing things within reach of it press eagerly toward the life-giving stream.

"It is a pity that Elisha set the she-bears upon the children so soon after a deed the good of which has come down to us," regrets the reader, and I cannot gainsay the stricture.

foul weather to-day, for the sky is red and lowering."

David is of like opinion for once with

A TEMPORARY HALT BY TOURISTS IN PALESTINE.

Pharisee and Sadducee, for he hastens the preparation for departure. The cords and stakes of the dining-tent are loosened while we are at breakfast. When we issue from the shaking tenement, palankeen and horses are ready. The sunlight has not touched the lower valleys when we take the road to Jerusalem. The defiles gloom blackly between the black heights, the profound stillness is even more oppressive than when we traversed the same road last week. Above the sullen mists that hide the depths, play broken rainbows; the bald brows of the distant hills are wreathed with fogs, turbans of white and gray, changing to the prismatic colors as the sun darts through a rift in the gathering clouds. The mules pick their way among rolling stones, and along shelving paths where the palankeen tilts crazily; David and the sheik ride mutely ahead, heads lifted often toward the darkened sky; Alcides alights to unstrap a roll from Serkeese's luggage. It contains mackintosh, rubber boots and helmet, and is swung now from Massoud's saddle. At the dragoman's suggestion I get out my own waterproof and fasten the palankeen windows.

Our preparations are made none too soon. As we turn the pass beyond the Khan of the Good Samaritan, the storm strikes us, sharp and sudden. We have hardly time to see it rushing toward us in slant, white sheets, from a dozen different directions, when the road is filled with a falling volume of water, like a cloud cataract, under which horses stagger and the mules stop for a blind moment. There is a steady, bitter rain in our faces all the rest of the way. Enveloped in waterproof furs and rugs, I sit well back in my corner and but for the spray drenching cap and veil, am unharméd. Serkeese pulls his abieh over his head, and bends almost double; Alcides and David ride erect, the rain pouring in sheets from their glistening mackintoshes, the eyes all that is visible of their faces under the visored helmets; the sheik is as impassive as a mummy. The foremost muleteer, at the first dash of the flood, has snatched off his heelless red slippers and tucked them into the foot of the palankeen. In three minutes there is not a dry thread on him; in five, every wet thread is a tiny aqueduct, every fold of his garment a pool. The rain is at its bitterest worst when he breaks into song—the nasal drone that passes with the Syrian peasant as music—and keeps it up at scant intervals for at least five miles.

I seem to have listened forever to the dissonant chant by the time we halt for luncheon at the ruined Khan opposite the Apostles' Fountain. At one end an arch of Roman masonry protects the pallet and rugs laid upon a ledge on which the proprietor sleeps at night. The roof is of reeds overlaid with turf, and the rain drips through crevices upon the earthen floor. Six of eight men huddle about a fire of thorns built in the middle of the room. They fall back at our approach, and after David has laid out luncheon upon a rude table at the back of the room, nobody glances in our direction. It is a taciturn group. The cold and wet have taken all the spirit out of conquerors having acted as scavengers. A bit of reddish stone picked up at random on the hill-side, proves upon inspection to be a fragment of "rosso antico" marble, susceptible of exquisite polish, and is laid away to do duty as a paper-weight when Jericho and the unreal outlying lands shall have taken their place among the other by-gones of this witching winter.

The Sultan's Spring has another name in David's mouth.

"If the Captain will look at Second Kings, second chapter, from the nineteenth to the twenty-second verses—" he intimates as we stand above the shallow pool and remark upon the solidity of the masonry securing and bounding it.

It is the well-known incident of the appeal of the men of Jericho to the prophet

In flat contradiction of a serene sunset, the eastern sky is a passion of flame-color as I draw aside the flap of my tent-door on Monday morning. Against it lie the mountains of Moab, misty-purple as an August plum; waves of softest pink quiver up to the zenith; the yellow sand-hills catch the reflection and change into orange-red. In all the camp no one is astir except John and the head muleteer; horses and mules have not aroused themselves from their Sabbath rest. The world enclosed by the eastern and western ranges of hills is still and cool, and transfigured by the magic bath of glorious color. Hastily throwing on a dressing-gown, I steal to Alcides's door and summon him to enjoy the sight with me.

Presently we repeat in unison—"It will be them, and there was never much. They part their ranks again to let a Nubian woman pass to the fire, with a baby in her arms. The blackest, forlornest baby I have ever beheld, the creature sits upon the stool drawn up into the very area of flame and smoke, and shivers piteously in a violent ague, never uttering a whimper but staring solemnly at the fire.

"It will die, I think," says the mother, stolidly, to David who replies, "Indeed, I think so," with more show of concern than is manifested by her.

At the parting of the ways between Bethphage and Bethany the sheik rides close to my palanquin, thrusts in a brown hand and utters the only English words I am to hear from his lips: "Good-bye!"

"His village is near," explains David.

I have been in a deep reverie for a long hour. Thoughts of the homeless Man who walked this weary road, footsore and heart-sore, have well-nigh supplied the place of sight. As we pass Bethany, dimly visible through the curtain of rain, the solitary Figure is yet more vividly present to my imagination.

In the exultation of spirit begotten by these musings, it is a shock when the palanquin swerves abruptly to the side of the road to get out of the way of a carriage and three horses driven abreast in Syrian fashion, and coming down the hill at full speed. Before I can ask a question, the vehicle stops in mid-career, the horses falling back upon their haunches, and out springs Domian, the ex-partner of David Jamal, his dark, handsome face full of kindly solicitude, an umbrella in one hand, a bottle of restorative medicine, already uncorked, in the other. In a semi-trice we are bestowed among dry rugs in the interior of the coach, hot-water bottles at our feet, and the three horses are galloping back to town.

"Mr. Gelat and I thought you should be met, Madam," says the dragoman, and we discover, all at once, that we are drenched and chilled to the bone, and must have been utterly wretched in another half-hour.

"I shall have a fire kindled in my room!" articulate between chattering teeth, in lighting at the door of the Grand Hotel.

Domian says nothing, but hurries me along the corridors and across a great hall to my familiar quarters, throws open the door, and with the current of genial warmth there streams out upon us the red glow of firelight and the fragrance of "tired woman's sweet restorer," a cup of hot tea.

Mission Work Among Hebrews

What has been Accomplished by the Forsyth St. Mission—Rev. H. P. Faust's labors among the Hebrew Strikers.

AN excellent spiritual work is in progress among the Hebrews who live in the densely-populated east-side of New York. It is conducted by the Hebrew-Christian Mission, founded by Rev. Herman P. Faust, and was referred to recently in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The work has made a great impression upon the Hebrews in the quarter surrounding the mission, which is in Forsyth St. Mr. Faust had large meetings almost daily and there have been a number of conversions. Since the beginning of the year the average attendance at these meetings has been from 50 to 400. All are very attentive to the reaching of the gospel. They no longer argue or interrupt as before, but are patient and thoughtful. For discussion Mr. Faust has set apart Thursday of every week, from seven to nine P.M. A Bible Class meets on the mission the same evening.

Twelve Hebrews have been converted this year at the mission. Some of the converts are young people and some are married, with three and four children. They are mostly painters or tailors. One is an ex-abb, who with wife and one child, is out to be baptized. There are several young men who are waiting an opportunity to enter the proposed Industrial Home and there begin study for training. Three students who are now supported in Mr. Faust's own home will enter the Theological Seminary this month to study for the Christian ministry. He has supplied them with books, clothing, etc., at an outlay of about $200 a year each. Very little progress has been made in the Industrial Home project thus far on account of lack of means. With such a Home established, twenty-five or thirty young men might be easily accommodated, educated and trained in some respectable calling at small cost. There is not at the present time a Hebrew-Christian Industrial Home and Training School in the United States and the need of such an institution becomes daily more urgent, as a necessary adjunct to the success of mission work among the Jews.

There has been a great of suffering among the eastside Hebrews in New York caused by the strikes. Some of the cases that appeal to Mr. Faust are very distressing, and he relieves the most urgent, as his means permit. On a recent Saturday he held a special meeting, after the regular preaching, to assure the striking Hebrews that Christian people have great sympathy with them. He is very grateful to those who have helped up to the present time, and asks prayer and future sympathy with the work.

A BISHOP'S PLAIN ADVICE.

An apt reply is often more effective in presenting the truth than a long discourse, however able. The story is told that on a certain occasion, when a company of persons were discussing in a crowded room sacred subjects and certain prominent men, one suddenly exclaimed: "I should like to meet that Bishop of Litchfield: I'd put a question to him that would puzzle him."

"Very well," said a voice out of another corner: "now is your time, for I am the bishop."

The man was somewhat startled and taken aback, but presently recovered himself and said:

"Well, my lord, can you tell me the way to heaven?"

"Nothing easier," answered the bishop: "you have only to turn to the right and go straight ahead."

SHINING FOR JESUS.

ARE you shining for Jesus, dear one, Shining just everywhere? Not only in easy places,

Not only just here or there? Shining in happy gatherings

Where all are loved and known? Shining where all are strangers, Shining when quiet alone? Shining at home and making

True sunshine all around? Shining abroad and faithful,

Perhaps among faithless found?

Are you shining for Jesus, dear one, Not for yourself at all?

Not because dear ones watching

Would grieve if your lamp should fall? Shining because you are walking

In the sun's unclouded rays, And you cannot help reflecting

The light on which you gaze? Shining because it shineth

So warm and bright above

That you must let out the gladness,

And you must show forth his love?

ISRAEL AND THE NATIONS.

The Oppressed People to become a Blessing to the Whole World.

BY REV. H. M. PARSONS, D.D.

WHEN Israel enters upon the mission to the nations, his original calling, the first function will be judicial. As in the treatment of foes when led by Moses and Joshua, so the nations that oppose themselves are to be overcome.

And this will be retributive, as in the case of the Amalekites and the Moabites. In some measure this may have commenced. The march of the exiled people during the last years, has been attended with marvelous progress, and the prophecy of Isaiah 33: 1, seems to have a measure of fulfilment, even before the complete restoration of the nation. "Woe to thee that spoilest, and thou wast not spoiled; and dealest treacherously, and they dealt not treacherously with thee! When thou shalt cease to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled; and when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee." This is said to the nations which have oppressed the Jews. Psalm 149 teaches that God will use Israel to punish the nations for their treatment of Israel in the millennial day. The prophet Micah in 5: 8-15 refers to this period of deliverance.

There evidently is to be an emergence from their dispersion among the nations, that will call attention to the revealed promises and purposes of God for Israel, and thus convince the world that Jehovah is God. Such testimony is also recorded for the recovery of Israel. And we may see the evidence daily increasing, as we follow the providential movements among the Jews, fulfilling Ezekiel 37: 13-14 and 36: 23-24.

Second, God will use Israel to convert the nations. The Lord says by the prophet Zechariah 8: 23, "In those days it shall come to pass, that ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the nations, even take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you."

With special reference to this missionary function of the Jewish nation, we have in Isaiah 61: 6, this distinctively mediatorial office described. "But ye shall be named the priests of the Lord: men shall call you the ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves." Certainly there has been no fulfilment of this prediction in Jewish history.

May it not be that, as in the oppression of Egypt they were driven out to seek the land of promise, so under modern persecutions and oppressions, Israel may not only be restored to their own land, by the urgency and greed of the Gentiles, but even now in their planted colonies in every part of the world, may we not foresee the missionary stations from which the gospel message being proclaimed—and received—processions of representative pilgrims shall annually represent the nations in Jerusalem.

That this recovery of the nations through Israel is the great burden of many prophecies, cannot be denied. In the programme of events sketched at the first Christian council in Jerusalem, the order is most definitely stated! 1st, the out-gathering of the church. 2d, the in-gathering of Israel. 3d, the residue of the Gentiles. God has taken an election from Israel, and will have a completed remnant—and so "all Israel shall be saved." So too of the Gentiles, God has taken the first fruits—the church—at the coming of the Lord—afterward the nations—through the ministry of Israel.

Third, God will bless the world by Israel. This is largely predicted of the millennial period, and so minutely predicted, that language ceases to convey any meaning if these plain promises of the glory of the messianic kingdom are not to be literally fulfilled. In this blessing, Israel is to be the central or metropolitan nation of the earth. This future glory is the theme of all the prophets. By Isaiah 27: 6 the Lord says, "Israel shall blossom and bud and fill the face of the world with fruit." And in 60: 5-12, "The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee." "For the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish, yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted." Similar fulness of blessing is promised by the prophet Hosea 2: 21-23.

"In that day"—from the context, the day of Israel's restoration, the Lord declares he will "hear the heavens."

CHURCH-GOING.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning Oct. 7th.
Hebrews 10 : 25.

WHY do people go to church at all? Even earnest Christian men would probably give different answers if they were asked why they go to church. A well known writer calls attention to the fact that the seer of Patmos in giving us his idea of a heavenly life, holds up to the world a picture of a city without a church. "I saw," he says, "the Holy City, New Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven and I saw no temple therein." To the Jew, to whom the Temple was the place of God's presence, the place where men ought to worship, this peculiarity of the city would be very significant. If we heard that there was a city in our own land in which there was no church, we should immediately conclude that it was a godless city; yet this city, coming directly from God's hand, was without a place of worship. Christ gave the clue to the solution of this mystery in his talk with the woman of Samaria. He said: "The hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet in Jerusalem, worship the Father. . . . the hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth." We have discarded the idea of localizing God, of conceiving of him as dwelling in this or that place and have gained the loftier, nobler idea of his being everywhere. We may meet him and commune with him on the mountain, in the forest, on the placid lake, on the storm-tossed ocean, in the busy city, in the business office, or in the chamber of sickness. To the truly devout soul every place is holy ground. But there is a danger in thus seeing God everywhere and in everything, of losing sight of his personality, of thinking of him as a spirit pervading the universe rather than as the Being who created the universe. That this danger is very real, is evident by the neglect of the church service which is increasing on every hand. Yet this neglect is detrimental to spiritual life. Even if we were to admit, as some contend, that the church is not the place for worship, and that the only acceptable worship is that of which Christ said, "When thou prayest enter into thy closet and shut the door," there would still be many reasons for church-attendance. There is that of edification, the gaining of new views of divine truth. There is much, too, to be gained from association. When we meet with God's people, and unite with them in singing his praises, hearing his word and celebrating Christ's redeeming love we gain stimulus and enthusiasm which cannot come from solitary meditation. The atmosphere of such association like mountain air invigorates the soul. Besides this, and this is after all the most cogent reason for church-going, there is the explicit promise of Christ that where even two or three are gathered in his name he will be present with them. To be in his presence is to receive life.

THE M. E. C. PROGRAMME.

Christian Endeavor Societies are familiar with the idea of the Missionary Extension Course. The speakers who are now arranging for their Eastern tour have given the following dates in the "Golden Rule:" Meetings in Buffalo, N. Y., Oct. 7. Rallies in Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 14. In Albany, N. Y., Oct. 21. In Springfield, Mass., Oct. 28. In Boston, Mass., where one hundred simultaneous meetings are to be held Nov. 14. All these dates are Sundays; in the intervening week-days, towns lying between the two Sunday appointments may secure one of the speakers for a meeting by paying a small sum for expenses and applying to the headquarters of the Missionary Extension Course, 607 Association Building, Chicago. These great campaigns, with their simultaneous Missionary Extension rallies in the large cities, will occur once a year. It is the intention to follow them, in every case desired, with the regular meetings of the Christian Endeavor Missionary Extension course.

THE BERLIN ASSOCIATION.

The Young Men's Christian Association in the great city of Berlin, is in some degree a development of the Young Men's Association, which was organized as far back as 1768. A Swiss minister in that year organized an Association at Basel, and his example was followed by pastors at Stuttgart, Elberfeld and other German towns. In 1834, an Association was formed at Bremen, for the purpose of giving young men

ed with the good that might be done in Berlin by an Association of the American pattern. Mainly through his efforts a suitable home, a picture of which appears on this page, was acquired and the Association was regularly organized. The Emperor was interested in the movement and gave liberally to the fund for the building while the Empress became President of the Ladies' Auxiliary and was present at the dedication.

The Association has now a membership of over two thousand, many of whom keep up their membership even while residing in distant parts of the Empire. Beside the regular meetings, the Association has a number of Sunday Schools under its charge and conducts various forms of Evangelistic work. It has also a class for training young men as nurses in the army hospitals. The workers are a most earnest devoted body of men, many of whom have gone out from the Association to become pastors and foreign missionaries.

The building is well arranged and well-equipped. On the second floor is the restaurant, the parlors, lecture room, library and large hall, the latter seating a thousand people. On the third floor are class and committee rooms. One room, which is used by the committee of management, by the Women's Auxiliary and for the American gospel meetings is named after Mr. Frederick von Schluembach. The General Secretary "devotional, social and intellectual opportunities." It soon had a membership of three hundred and became the model for Associations in other cities, and in 1850, the Berlin Yuenglings Verein was established. By the close of 1882, there were four hundred Associations in Germany, with an aggregate membership of about 16,000. They were not, however, such Young Men's Christian Associations as we know here and in England. They were composed almost exclusively of young working men, who were united under their pastors, more after the pattern of a Christian Endeavor Society, than a Young Men's Christian Association.

A change came with the arrival in Berlin of Mr. Frederick Von Schluembach who had been working in the Associations of this country. He had been an innkeeper, but for several years had been a most successful evangelist among the German-speaking young men of America. In 1881 he was in Germany for rest and recuperation and while there became impressed with the good that might be done in Berlin by an Association of the American pattern. Mainly through his efforts a suitable home, a picture of which appears on this page, was acquired and the Association was regularly organized. The Emperor was interested in the movement and gave liberally to the fund for the building while the Empress became President of the Ladies' Auxiliary and was present at the dedication.

A SYMPOSIUM SOCIAL.

Among the papers read at the Toronto Convention of the Baptist Young People was one on "the Symposium and Social," by Rev. F. P. Leach of Red Oak, Ia., which has been republished by the "Baptist Union." It is the story of a meeting which has crystallized into its present form after several experiments. As it has met a long-felt want which must have been experienced in other churches, it is worthy of general consideration. Mr. Leach says that it has been found better to hold this meeting at the homes of the members, rather than in the church, when that can be done. The meetings have been opened with prayer and the reading of the minutes of the previous meeting, there is a roll-call by the Secretary, when each member responds to his or her progress in the required readings. The readings of the month are then reviewed by several members appointed for that purpose. Music and literary features are to complete the formal part of the programme. Any business connected with the work of the society may properly be presented at this meeting. At the conclusion of the Symposium proper is a social hour. Here the committee has an opportunity to do its work. It is the aim during this part of the evening to introduce some innocent game or form of amusement which shall unify the company, and not to separate the members into groups according to the law of natural selection. In this way the fellow feeling is developed, and peril of clannishness avoided. One of the encouraging features in connection with this monthly gathering of the young people is that it joins the social and study hour in such a pleasing way as to solve one great difficulty that has hindered the best success in this important department of work. Hitherto our socials had been too purely social. There was needed just what the study hour is able to bring, an earnest spirit of devotion to the truth as a sort of antidote to the lighter spirit of mirth and thoughtlessness. The symposium and social is here to stay, because this need of the church has been met in a most satisfactory way.

AMONG THE ORDERS.

It is now decided that the great International Convention of Epworth League shall be held next year at Chattanooga Tenn.

A committee has already been organized in Boston, Mass., to secure for that city the International Christian Endeavor Convention of 1898.

A large Convention of the Clarion Baptist Young People's Union was held recently at North Buffalo, Pa. The meetings continued over two days and there were many addresses from eminent pastors and members of the Union.

The members of the Young Women's Christian Association of Adelaide, South Australia, have a weekly Prayer Union and the meetings are much enjoyed by a who are present, and very blessed times are spent. On the third Monday in every month is a missionary meeting. The Girls' Institute also goes on well.

The Grand Rally of the Baptist Young People's Unions of Rhode Island was held this year at Newport. A large steam chartered for the occasion carried the Providence delegates to the rendezvous. Mr. Willard Baker President of the Rhode Island Union presided, and the Rev. Isaac Newton Phelps made the address of the day.

The Washington Grove Camp Meeting near Washington, D. C., assigned the first day of the exercises to the Epworth League. Fully five hundred Leaguers were present. One of the interesting features of the day was a speech by a prominent member of the Washington Christian Endeavor Union heartily and cordially congratulating the League.

An Epworth City Union has been organized at Springfield, Mass. The Union consists of five Leagues and one Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor. The full management of the Union is vested in the board of control, which consists of the officers of the Union, the president, secretary, and one member elected from each Chapter.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Topeka, Kans., is rejoicing in the accession of six hundred new members who pay the annual fee of ten dollars. This is the result of a systematic canvass of the city by the General Secretary Mr. George E. Leeri and a committee of members. The Association will now take possession of new quarters which it has rented.

New rooms have recently been acquired for the Anglo-Hebrew Young Men's Christian Association at Jerusalem, situated within the city walls. The opening was the occasion of a very pleasant gathering. Among those present were Revs. A. H. Kel J. Jamal, A. H. Hanower and W. Heat cote; also a number of young men of various nationalities. The future prospects of the Association are encouraging.

Closing our Children's Home.

Its Summer Work Ended and all its Little Guests Departed—The Return of "Number 1,000"—A Group of Grateful Girls.

AFTER nearly four delightful months of summer housekeeping at Mont-Lawn, during which 1125 poor city boys and girls have been fed, clothed, entertained and instructed within its hospitable halls, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Children's Home has closed for the season. There is a hush over the great ay, a thousand times over, has it repaid all the trouble and care and expense involved; for the influences that surrounded our children at Mont-Lawn will remain with very many of them during the coming years, to sweeten their young lives and make them kinder and more loving and helpful to other children. To many it was a wide-open glimpse of an earthly Paradise, never to be forgotten; a long rift of sunshine, and laughter, and fun, and frolic and kind surprises.

Among those who returned to their homes from Mont-Lawn during the last week was Lillie S—, "Little Number 1,000." But it was not the same Lillie who went there ten days before, if eyes were to be trusted. Instead of the little bare-foot and bare-headed wail, with the torn dress and the generally woe-begone appearance, there stood on the deck of the steamer "Chrystenah" among the other children, a bright-eyed, merry little girl in a neatly-made frock and with a hat and shoes that fitted well and looked comfortable. Lillie had gained wonderfully in both health and spirits during her stay at Mont-Lawn, and now that she was going home again to Mulberry Street, her heart was full of gratitude to her entertainers. She was wondering what her father and mother would think when they saw the change that had taken place in their little Here Katie Vint, the small spokeswoman of the party, took off the lid and tilting the box, out jingled a lot of pennies and bright nickels, the grateful heart-offerings of half a hundred dear little children. What a sacrifice it must have been to yield up their pennies, and yet how deep, and true and sweet the gratitude that prompted the act? "Now, little lady, won't you give us the names of this small delegation of yours?" she was asked.

"The names? Oh yes," and she smiled prettily. "This is my sister, Alice Vint; she's four, and this is Pauline Yost, she's 'bout eleven, and Maggie Yost, her sister, she's seven; ain't you Maggie? an' I'm Katie Vint," and she curtsied with the air of a little duchess, "an' I'm eight years old."

"Well, Katie, you are remarkably clever for your years, and I congratulate you on the bright way in which you have fulfilled your duty for the other children of the Mission."

The little folks were cordially thanked for their gift, and were assured that it would not be forgotten, and they then withdrew.

Owing to the continued mild weather, the Home at Mont-Lawn was kept open later than was first intended, involving considerable additional expense over the amount appropriated for its summer work. It is believed the excess will reach fully a thousand dollars. No provision was made to meet this additional expenditure; but the needs of the tenement children were such that it was decided to continue the work, in the hope that among our readers who had been interested in the Home from the beginning and had watched its gradual development, there might be found some who would care to bear a share of the burden for the sake of the little ones who look on the past summer as the happiest of their lives.

"Chicken-Talk."

Some time ago, Prof. Garner asserted that monkeys talked. It has long been a away. Keep your misery to yourself. Persons charged with the rearing and training of the young ought to think of this, and seek to fix them early in good habits.

ONE-SIDED PEOPLE.

NEVER try to reason a man or woman out of a belief he or she has never reasoned into," is, we think, one of Lord Bacon's aphorisms; and any one who has undertaken a task of this kind will readily concede the forcefulness of the expression. When the foundation of belief is mere prejudice, it is difficult to change the opinion; yet how many have no better ground than this for what they erroneously term an opinion. They believe, or think they believe, certain things; but for the life of them they can give neither your nor themselves any satisfactory reason for believing as they do; and it is plain the opinion they claim to possess is not the result of any careful weighing of the facts. Such people are always the most difficult to convince, and their stubbornness is the frequent cause of disturbance in the home or in social circles.

roomy house on the hillside. The trees sigh over the lonely lawn, where but lately the merry rompers played in innocent glee; the birds find no echo to their song, and the long, sunny dining-hall, where so many bright little heads were bent over the snowy table as the childish "grace before meat" was sung in unison, is silent and empty. Their "play-room," too, is deserted, and all the games and toys laid aside for the season—a sweet memory of happy hours; and the dormitories, each with its row upon row of shining white little beds, are lone and tenantless. All are gone, even the last wee tot who picked the few wild-flowers she could find and took them with her as a pretty souvenir of the dead summer. House-mother Faulhaber and her staff of missionaries, too, have departed, and the Home will be quiet and voiceless till the spring flowers bloom again.

It has been one of the pleasantest experiences of a busy life-time, not only to the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but to all whom he associated with him in this beautiful and helpful work. Ten times,

THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

FROM the distant crowded city,
Where 'midst sin and want they roam;
Rescued by your love and pity,
See them through the Children's Home.

Little ones so pale and weary,
Sick and suffering, worn and sad;
Denizens of alleys dreary,
There grow rosy, round, and glad.

Winsome blind ones, gentle cripples,
Nurtured by kind care, grow gay;
And where the blue river ripples,
On the Hudson's beach they play.

More than all, these souls immortal,
By the powers of love are led,
To the straight way's only portal,
To the Christ who for them bled.

For to them is taught the story, [song,
From God's Word, by prayer and
Of his wisdom, power, and glory,
Of his love, so pure and strong.

Can there be an aim more holy,
Or a work more glad and sweet,
Than by love's example lowly,
Thus to bring them to his feet?

girl in these few days. "Little Number 1,000" is only one of hundreds who have undergone a similar transformation, and who, with their parents and friends, must bear Mont-Lawn in kind remembrance during the long months of winter.

A very touching incident occurred during the closing week of the Home. One bright morning, four little girls from Catherine Street called at the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the Bible House and sought audience with the editor. They were accompanied by Miss Delany, one of the good missionaries who has been instrumental in bringing different parties of deserving poor children to the Home. It was intended to be quite a visit of state, and the four little tots entered the sanctum with due ceremony; but they could not keep up the solemn expression, for in a moment, their faces were running over with smiles. One of the brightest of the quartet stepped to the front and said:

"Mr. Editor, we's come from the children of the Catherine Mission and we's been makin' up somethin' to give to the Children's Home, where you was so kind to us when we was up there."

And she paused, as if hesitating what to do next. Here the other three little girls, after some mysterious whispering and nudging, and more smiling, pushed the wee speaker once more to the front.

"This is what we's been saving up for the Home," she said, "and there was forty or fifty of us girls did it all by ourselves, and it is all for the Home, for it was good to us and we had a real nice time there."

And she set on the edge of the desk a small, circular seed-box of cardboard, at which the few adults present gazed in surprise. Miss Delany stepped forward.

"The gift is in the box. Why don't you open it?" she said.

conviction that birds and other animals had some simple method of communication. Prof. Hamerick, of Baltimore, now writes that domestic fowls, too, have a language to which even our children may listen with interest. He says: That they are conversing with one another is proved by the fact that a rooster or hen, when alone, is absolutely silent, excepting on rare occasions, when it sings a low lullaby, as it were, to itself, much as humans hum when alone, or as a cat will purr when contented. Just as soon, however, as the solitary hen or rooster meets another, you will hear an animated conversation. If I sound the note of alarm a hen makes when a hawk is near or some other danger menaces, she will immediately fly to cover. The Professor believes chickens tell each other current news. One day he introduced a new hen into his yard who, the very first time she spied the dog, set up a great cackling and flew around the yard in a state of evident terror. An old hen observed her for a few minutes, meanwhile making some sounds that were intended to reassure the scared fowl, but which had no effect, for the new arrival cackled worse and louder than ever. Finally the old hen approached close to the stranger, clucking in a low tone. What she said must have been something of a reassuring character, for the new hen at once ceased her clatter.

Don't Indulge Ugly "Moods."

A man subject to moods, and who makes himself miserable by indulging them, has no right to make other people unhappy. It is no excuse for an ill word or an ugly act to say: "I was in one of my moods at the time." If moods will come, and you are unable to drive them off, shut yourself up in a close room until the paroxysm passes

Home Blessings in Disguise.

The happiest, sweetest, tenderest homes are not those where there has been no sorrow, but those which have been overshadowed with grief, and where Christ's comfort was accepted. The very memory of the sorrow is a gentle benediction that broods ever over the household, like the silence that comes after prayer. There is a blessing sent from God in every burden of sorrow. There are hints of the blessings of burdens. Our dull task-work accepted will train us into strong and noble characters. Our temptations and hardships, met victoriously, knit thews and sinews of strength in our soul. Our pain and sorrow, endured with sweet trust and submission, leave us purified and enriched with more of Christ in us. In every burden that God lays upon us there is a blessing for us, if only we will take it in the right spirit.

A NEW-FASHIONED WOMAN.

Written Specially for
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
BY MRS. M. JEANIE MALLARY.

CHAPTER I.

Nature had spent her strength to make a perfect woman.

A SEPTEMBER sun was sinking lazily down the west and not a breeze cooled the sultry air. The earth lay still, with quivering breath, panting from the noon-tide heat. Above, poised in mid-air, clouds of gorgeous tints floated in seas of flame and gold, while farther down were fleecy drifts, the snowy draperies of a royal couch awaiting the King of Day.

A girl of striking beauty stood with her hand resting on the half-opened iron gate which enclosed a costly residence. She wore a dress of filmy white, tilted in here and there with lace, while at her neck drooped a spray of half-blown, creamy rosebuds fastened by a diamond bar.

The residence was on a high eminence, near the terminus of a fashionable street; indeed, it protruded so far out, that by direct act of the "City Fathers," the street bent in its course. No one could tell why this irregular mode of building and of procedure by the City Council was allowed, but so it was, and so it had been from time immemorial. The site pleased Col. St. Clair, he paid a fabulous price for it, put up a fabulous house upon it, and lived in it in fabulous style.

Annie St. Clair, like her father, was a lover of nature, and this evening the glowing west had drawn her out of doors to this spot of unobstructed view. Below, thronging the fashionable thoroughfare, were equipages of endless number and variety, while promenaders sought the cool shade of the long line of live oaks which bordered the street on either side, but her eyes were fixed upward on the protean cloudlets and flame covered skies.

"Cobalt, Raw Sienna, a touch of carmine here and vermilion there—then those long golden threads, almost lost in the clear blue, and that little Vesuvius of fire yonder.—Oh, for my canvas and my brush!"

Unconsciously her fingers moved, as though the great oak tree in front were her mahl-stick, and the broad expanse of sky her canvas.

The sun had been hidden for a moment by a cloud, but now, athwart the dark oak boughs it marked a golden pathway, then up it blazed against the windows of the mansion, then down it fell, bathing the marble statues and the girl in a flood of light.

Somewhere from out the shadows a voice called: "Miss Annie, your mother says you must come right in; you'll just ruin your pretty complexion."

"Complexion, indeed!" was murmured softly. "What care I for a fair face, when this fair face of nature lies before me!"

"Miss Annie, your mother says—"

"Yes Betsey, I hear."

But there was no movement to return—a moment of silence, and again:

"Miss Annie, your—"

"Betsey, tell mamma I'll be in directly."

Then her eye looked below at the busy life, then around, at the clear sweep of the horizon, against which rested wave upon wave of mountains, the delicate tracery of whose distant foliage could be plainly discerned upon the liquid blue of the background,—then she looked upward at the sunset sky, too glorious for words to describe, and her artist's eye grew tender even humid, and she felt like falling prostrate and worshipping nature, her divinity. Lost in admiration, she was startled by a voice:

"Good evening, Miss Annie, have you no eyes for a friend?"

"Oh, Dr. Gordon, good evening," she exclaimed, "Do excuse me, I was lost in thought."

"You must have been not to have heard me rattle up. I was going to propose for you to come back to earth from your long aerial ride. Why, you were literally lost in the sunset, indeed, you seemed a part of it, for its radiance was all over you, on your hair, your face, and shining in your eyes."

"Dr. Gordon, did you never open your arms, so, and long to take nature right to your heart, and press a rapturous kiss right upon her fair forehead?"

Her arms remained folded in a graceful pose, and her rapt expression was a study. The young physician replied:

"I admire nature, certainly,—yes."

His eyes were smiling and fixed upon her face, but hers were upon the sky. There was a moment of silence, and then Dr. Gordon said again:

"You are a Pantheist, Miss Annie. Nature is your God."

"No, I am no Pantheist. I admire the work without tracing it back to its Original."

Our New Serial and its Author.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the publication of the opening chapters of our new serial, "A New-Fashioned Woman," it will interest our large circle of readers to know something of the author of this delightful story. Mrs. Mallary is the daughter of the late Rev. J. L. Dagg, D.D., once the President of Mercer University, Ga., and known as the distinguished author of "Dagg's Moral Science," "Evidences of Christianity," "Manual of Theology," etc. Her mother, (Dr. Dagg's second wife), was Mrs. Noah K. Davis of Philadelphia, and Mrs. Mallary is, therefore, half-sister of Professor N. K. Davis of the University of Virginia. She thus comes of intellectual sides. She Philadelphia was pastor of Church in that band having ber of years leges for females had much to do tion of the young

It is her desire and prayer that her work may do good. Her object in writing "A New-Fashioned Woman" for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was to show the necessity of the religion of Christ for all, but especially for the young. She has taken what she considers the loveliest type of fashion- able life, shown something of what this woman was in society, then how much more lovely she became when "new-fashioned" by grace, and through her sat- isfying joy in her Saviour and usefulness in his cause. It is a story of surpassing interest, true to nature and to the sphere of life and action it represents, and we confidently predict for it a very wide popularity.

it never contains one drop the less for me." "I need not ask who is your favorite poet, Miss Annie; it must be Wordsworth. I recall his words:—

Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her. 'Tis her privilege
Through all the years of this our life, to lead
From joy to joy."

"I certainly agree with him, Dr. Gordon. I unite with him in his admiration of nature, but I envy him his gift of poetic words."

"Miss Annie, I would have been over-joyed to have been one of your party as you reached the lovely vale of Chamouny, lying in the midst of Alpine wonders, as you sailed up Lake Lehman, then up the Arve, through its stupendous gorges—Ah! I would like to have been near when hoary-headed Mont Blanc first loomed in view. How did you feel, Miss Annie; what did you say?"

"Say? I said not a word. I gazed, I was overpowered, I buried my face in my hands and wept. My heart was too full for words, I did not want to hear a human voice, and when I could see through my dim eyes, it was in unbroken silence, with joy unutterable."

"I think it would have affected me very differently. I imagine I should have been he said, 'Yes, it will be a very fine view, when those mountain sides, and nearer hills are improved, their fronts cut down and elegant residences built upon them.' I felt half wounded. For my part, I would not take anything for that rude cabin over yonder with that line of white clothes fluttering in the breeze."

"Beauty belongs to you women."

"And the love of beauty to whom? Politeness, I suppose, would require me to say, to you men, but I don't know."

"Miss Annie, I have slandered myself; please give me more credit for taste than I have given myself. I am not so blind to the lovely earth as I have made out. I only wanted to draw out a rhapsody. I am no artist, not a bit of it, so do not view nature with your eyes, but I love it and adore its great Creator. To confess the truth, though, there is more beauty to me in the old skeleton hanging up in my office, than in all this—he's a Frenchman, too, was killed at—"

"Horrible! Dr. Gordon, horrible!"

"Ha! ha! ha! I knew you would think so, but it is the truth, there is to me far more beauty in it, than in all these pink and white clouds. The radio ulna and carpal joints, the temur, tibia and paletta, indeed every bone and joint in that grinning old fellow, are far more beautiful, more wonderful to me, and I go further than you do, for you say, you give no thought to the original. I do; I love him, I adore his omnipotence. Now, I am not going to ask permission to bring my pet for your eyes to admire, but I am going to make another request. May I call, and will you allow me the pleasure of examining the sketches, which, I understand you made in your European travels?"

"Certainly, Dr. Gordon, I shall be glad to show them to you, though they are very imperfect. By the way, I am expecting my cousin from Virginia by this evening's train. Roy has gone with the carriage now to meet her. I shall be glad for you to call upon her also."

"Thank you, Miss Annie, I shall be happy to avail myself of your kindness. Since my partner has returned, I shall have more time to devote to my friends. Your cousin, you say, from Virginia?"

"Yes, sir; my alliterative cousin, Valeria Vernon of Virginia. I have never met her. She is the daughter of papa's only sister, the eldest of a large family of children. Her father died last year,—Yonder is the carriage now. See! Roy is waving his handkerchief to let me know that she has come."

The young doctor bowed, put spurs to his horse and left, just as the carriage dashed around the corner.

CHAPTER II.

A beautiful home, but God is not there.

"Here she is, Annie," exclaimed Roy, putting his hand outside the carriage door and turning the heavily-plated knob. With a spring he was out, and, turning, he held his hand toward his companion. A small black-gloved hand was placed in his, and in another moment a little figure in black stood facing the one in white in the gateway.

No introduction was necessary, for before a word could be spoken, two arms were around the stranger and two kisses pressed upon her lips.

"I am so glad you have come," said Annie.

"And I am so glad to come," was replied.

"Love at sight," said Roy.

"Or, rather," replied Annie, "love before sight."

"Any way, just so it's love," said Roy, as he turned to the baggage wagon, that just then came dashing up with its one trunk.

"There is mamma waiting on the veranda; let's go in, Roy will look after the baggage."

So through the iron gateway they went, up the serpentine walk, hedged on either side by low boxwood, and in front of this, rows of white flowers, looking like lines of drifted snow. Then they passed the beautiful fountain, but they did not linger now to listen to its music. Val wanted to stop; but the vision of her aunt on the grand entrance above, hurried her on, up the steps, and into the outstretched arms.

"Welcome to our home and hearts, my child," and Val thought Aunt Rosa's pale face the sweetest she had ever beheld.

"Heigh, ho!" cried a merry voice behind, and up rushed Uncle Royal, hot and bustling, with a genial smile and a loud—

"Well! Well! If you haven't got here, and I not in to meet you. Well! Well! I never heard the whistle one time, and I've been listening for it these two hours."

Howd'ye little girl, howd'ye, —one kiss, two, three—you're for the world like your mother, only not half so good-looking. Ha! Ha! Ha! Take her up to her room, Annie, she looks tired to death."

"Oh, no, Uncle Royal, I'm scarcely tired at all."

"Come by yourself, did you, and how did you leave your mother and the little ones?—Pshaw, we'll have plenty of time to talk after awhile. Take her upstairs, Annie; let her go to bed if she wants to and not come down to supper. Do you hear, child, don't come downstairs any more to-night if you don't feel like it."

So, throwing a little protest down to Uncle Royal as she went upstairs, Val followed Annie to her room, and when she entered it, to the inexperienced eyes of the little untravelling girl, it seemed a perfect Paradise. A bright Brussels carpet of autumn leaves turning one over the other, an elegant set of walnut furniture, with mirror long enough to take her in at one sweep, bed of dainty white, curtains of fleecy lace and lambrequins to match, shades of pearl with vine of leaves in unison with the floor, easy chairs, large and small, lounge of crimson plush, a wardrobe with French plate doors, then here a door opening into an elegant bath-room,—what more could human creature want?

After refreshing herself by a cool bath, she took from her trunk a dress of black grenadine, shook out its folds, hung it in the wardrobe for present use, then out she drew her escritoire, a present from her mother on her last birthday. This she placed on the table, then donning a white wrapper, she drew up a chair, seized her pen, and thus it flew over the white paper:

"Dear, dear mother:

"If you could only have been with me during the last hour! How glad and thankful your anxious heart would have been to have seen my sweet welcome, and to have heard the loving words of Roy first, then Annie, then Aunt Rosa, then dear, big-hearted Uncle Royal. Even the servants speak as though they were glad I had come, and they actually anticipated my wants. One has just come in to replenish my ice pitcher, and, seeing that I was writing, has lighted all the jets of my chandelier, a most extravagant thing to do it seems to me, and very unnecessary for one who has all her life been accustomed to a little flaming, flaring, flickering, kerosene lamp. They are lighted, though, and I am writing in their blazing light, for I assure you, I didn't remind her that one would answer, but just let her do as suited her best.—Oh, Annie is angelic! As I drove up and she stood, so fair, so peerless, in a pure white dress, rich and soft, her lustrous hair coiled around her head, and the golden rays of the setting sun shedding a heavenly glory over and around her, I could not help thinking of a Madonna from some grand old master. Roy is exceedingly handsome, Annie bewitchingly beautiful, auntie, goodness and sweetness personified; and dear, noisy uncle, the best and dearest of all, because he is nearest to my darling mother. Do excuse my many adjectives, for I cannot help piling them up.

"My room reminds me of the Arabian nights, and seems the magic creation of some magic power. The yard, with its dream-like, winding walks and long hedges of delicate, white flowers, the splashing, laughing fountain, the music of its trickling drops reaches me now, the gorgeous beds of coleus, looking like one great big bloom, the roses, firs, spruces, cypresses, and, oh, so many more; all this I saw, as I walked up the pathway, for my eyes were everywhere. The entrance to the high front veranda is by one of two flights of half-winding steps which end upon a platform, and from this you step upon a porch which is high and completely surrounding the house. A semi-circular bed fills the space between the base of these two flights of steps, and what do you think? But you could never guess. There are two japonica trees, only think of it, trees, one is a double white, the other double rose color, and they are in full bloom! I could scarcely believe my own eyes. Our one little japonica in a jar, and perhaps one blossom might gladden our hearts as a reward for a year's nursing, while here were trees out of doors, and loaded with lovely flowers! Then the edge of this semi-circular bed, was—guess what? But then you never could. Actually a hedge of our pet geranium, Mountain of Snow, and it was just too beautiful to get a peep of these varied beauties from my window now, and this only makes me long for more. You know my eyes will take in flowers, no matter what else is by, and all this they snatched while Annie's tongue was expressing her welcome, and mine was rattling off thanks, at a rapid rate.

"But I almost forgot to tell you that I am here safe and sound. Everything was pleasant throughout my entire journey, except the one thought that I had left mother and the little ones behind. Were you all here, I should be too happy; as it is, I find it hard work to contain myself. Everybody is good, sweet, and kind, and I am happy, happy, happy."

"I must stop now, with a kiss to every one, and a loving good-night to you, my precious mother."

"Please be quick and write to
"Your devoted little girl, VAL."

COULDN'T GIVE UP PRAYING.

Many years ago there was an insurrection in one of the West Indian Islands. Among other things, the rioters resolved to break up the religious meetings of the slaves in the neighborhood. These meetings were generally conducted by an old slave called Uncle Ben. The rioters went to the negroes' meeting house at the time of service for the purpose of breaking it up, and not finding Ben there, they seized the leader of the service and put him to death, and with his head upon a pole marched to Ben's dwelling. When he appeared, the leader pointed to the bleeding head on the pole, and asked, "Do you know that head, Ben?"

"Yes, massa," said Ben. "I know him."

"Well, that's what he has got for his praying: and if you don't stop praying we'll just do the same with your head."

Ben looked the leader of the mob full in the face, and said, "Massa, do you mean dat?"

"To be sure I do," said the man; "and if you wish to keep your head upon your shoulders, you'll give up praying at once."

All were waiting anxiously, when the negro turned to his fellow slaves and said, "Bredren, let us pray!"

And then he kneeled down in the presence of these fierce, lawless men and poured out his soul in prayer. He prayed that God would pardon their sin, and show them the evil of their ways, and change their hearts by grace. When he ceased, he rose up and went into his cabin. God's power was on the hearts of these rioters, so that they went away without offering to touch him.

Two ways of washing.

One is the same way your grandmother washed—but there wasn't anything better, in her day.

You rub soap into the clothes—then you rub them up and down on a washboard till you get the dirt worn off. This is hard work—and while you're wearing off the dirt, you're wearing out your clothes, too. The other way is Pearlina's.

You put the clothes into Pearlina and water—then you wait. Pearlina gets the dirt all out. A little rinsing makes them perfectly clean.

Pearlina does the work. There can't be anything so easy, so economical, or that keeps your clothes so absolutely safe from harm and wear and tear.

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearlina." IT'S FALSE—Pearlina is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 426 JAMES PYLE, New York.

The Ocean Gate of Australia—Splendid Harbors and Superb Scenery.

(Copyright, Louis Klopsch, 1894.)

SYDNEY, Aug. 7, 1894.

PITCHED, shaken, twisted, flung, sickened, bruised, dismayed, alarmed, are some of the words which describe our feelings whilst crossing from New Zealand to Australia. We heard that the passage was like crossing the channel at Calais from France to England but that instead of the hour and a half it would be four days and a half. It was worse than we expected and worse than usual. We had nearly six days of it. The only alleviation of the voyage was the Captain, who was jolly at the time to be jolly, serious at the time to be serious and deeply religious at all times. Converted in a Presbyterian Church in New Zealand, he has become a flaming Evangel, preaching on board his steamer once or twice every Sabbath.

Our rough sea experience prepared us for full appreciation of one of the brightest panoramas of the land and sky that ever unrolled before mortal vision. Captain Neville said to us, "We will soon be in sight of the Australian coast, and when we approach the harbor of Sydney come up on my bridge, and I will point out to you the objects of interest." "Thank you," was our reply, to the unusual invitation, for sea captains do not ordinarily like to have company on the steamer's bridge. In a few moments we climbed to the side of the Captain. Great walls of rock built by the Eternal God reached along the coast, and stopped only wide enough apart to allow ships to enter and to keep the boisterous ocean out.

"Yonder," said the Captain, "is the retreat in the rocks which in the twilight deceived the Captain of the 'Duncan Dunbar' to mistake it for the harbor and to aim for it, crashing into destruction. All on board perished save one man, who was picked up after he had floated down on to the shelving."

Safely we rode in between the Two Great Brown Pillars of Hawkesbury sandstone, and then began the revelation of a harbor such as nowhere else in the wide world is to be found. The whole scene is an "Odyssey," a "Divina Commedia," an Old Testament and a New Testament of grandeur and loveliness. You cannot for a moment relax your energy of watching without missing something which you cannot see again. The white palaces of the merchant princes of Sydney shine through the foliage of the trees. Dipping to the Bay are gardens abloom in winter, and lawns with an emerald like unto the fourth layer of the wall of heaven. Tropical plants and tropical flowers stand side by side with the growths of more rigorous climates. Vineyards and orange groves, pomegranates and guavas, and pineapples growing in a revelry of luxuriance. Yonder are the Houses of Parliament. Yonder are the old prisons. There is the Governor's residence." Here sweeping up close to our steamer are launches with excursionists. Yonder are sailing boats, so small they suggest a fluttering seagull.

While the area of the harbor is said to be nine square miles, the water line of it, if followed up and down all its inlets, would be twelve hundred miles. The rippling waters kiss the beach, and the beach embraces the Bay. At the next turn of our steamer's wheel more garniture of island and arbor and inlet and promontory. Oh! how the marine loveliness played "hide-and-seek" amidst the islands! Five grim batteries pointing their Armstrong guns at us, but only in play. "Yonder," says the Captain, "is a French steamer, yonder an American and yonder an Englishman." Sydney Harbor is so broad and honest that

No Pilot was Needed to come on board. Room here for all the navies of the earth to ride in and secrete themselves so that they could not be found without much search. Room for the "Great Easterns" of the past and the "Campanias" of the present to wheel without peril. Room to welcome all the centuries and generations and ages which are yet to drop anchor in its clear depths. He only be-littles and be-dwarfs and be-meads Sydney Harbor who compares it to the Bay of Naples or the entrance to Rio Janeiro.

The day we entered it clouds of all hues were looking down into its mirror, beauties of all styles were walking its opaline pavement; grandeurs of all charlots were rolling across its crystalline highway. On the Captain's bridge we stood until near enough to the wharf to see the deputation of clergymen and prominent citizens who waiting to come aboard to greet us, and when they thronged the cabin of the steamer, and addressed us in welcoming words we were compelled by our own feelings to reply, "Brethren and friends! after sailing against headwinds and over very rough seas, it is most delightful to get into this beautiful harbor of Sydney, and into the still more beautiful harbor of Christian fellowship."

But I was up before daybreak next morning looking at the harbor. The window of my room in the Australia Hotel takes in the enchantment and I watched the coming of the Day into the harbor. The whole sky first took on a pallor, not sickly, but healthful, as though there were white wings from the other side shining through. Then there came coruscations, and deep indigos, and irradiations, and sadnesses of color, and Unrolling Scrolls Prophetic of more light, and sombre and holy gleams and rhapsodies of advancing day; and then, banners of victory over the darkness. Then in this wall of heaven the gates began to swing open. It was no sudden swinging back of the panels of fire. There was no grinding of the gates on the amethystine hinges; there was no clang of bolts hurled back from the imperial portals, but a slow and gradual and overpowering movement that made me feel there was more to come, and I wondered if I could endure the expanding vision. As I looked into the gate I saw, what I described to my son afterward as a sceptre, a sceptre of great length and brilliance. Such a sceptre as no earthly emperor ever had in his throne room. The handle of the sceptre had all the colors of the prism. The edges of it were translucent, the point of it was tipped with a waving light all the time changing. Yet what a sceptre! What king would dare to handle it! What monarch would dare to lift it! But while I wondered, the question was answered. The King of Day, the rising sun took hold of it, and the sceptre which I had seen a few seconds before lying on the shelf of heaven, was first hoisted as though to command the hidden glories of the skies to come down and then it was pointed to the harbor as the place of their destination, and on that sapphire of the waves, both the sceptre that I had seen, and the crown of the king who took it, were put down; and from green island to green island, and from beach to beach, and all up and down the promontories, and from sky to water and from water to sky it was morning in Sydney harbor.

"RIKKI," THE MONGOOSE.*

RIKKI-TIKKI-TAVI was a mongoose, rather like a little cat in his fur and his tail, but quite like a weasel in his head and his habits. His eyes and the end of his restless nose were pink; he could scratch himself anywhere he pleased, with any leg, front or back, that he chose to use; he could fluff up his tail till it looked like a bottle-brush, and his war-cry as he rattled through the long grass, was: Rikk-tikk-tikki-tikki-tchik!

One day, a high summer flood washed him out of the burrow where he lived with his father and mother, and carried him, kicking and chucking, down a roadside ditch. He found a little wisp of grass floating there, and clung to it till he lost his senses. When he revived, he was lying in the hot sun on the middle of a garden path, very dragged indeed, and a small boy was saying: "Here's a dead mongoose. Let's have a funeral."

"No," said his mother; "let's take him and dry him. Perhaps he is n't really dead."

They took him into the house, and a big man picked him up between his finger and thumb, and said he was not dead but half choked; so they wrapped him in cotton-wool, and warmed him, and he opened his eyes and sneezed.

"Now," said the big man (he was an Englishman who had just moved into the bungalow); "don't frighten him, and we'll see what he'll do."

It is the hardest thing in the world to frighten a mongoose, because he is eaten from nose to tail with curiosity. The motto of all the mongoose family is, "Run and find out!" and Rikki-tikki was a true mongoose. He looked at the cotton-wool, decided that it was not good to eat, ran all under the table, sat up and put his fur in order, scratched himself, and jumped on the small boy's shoulder.

"Don't be frightened, Teddy," said his mother. "That's his way of making friends."

"Ouch! He's tickling under my chin," said Teddy.

Rikki-tikki looked down between the boy's collar and neck, snuffed at his ear, and climbed down to the floor, where he sat rubbing his nose.

"Good gracious," said Teddy's mother, "that's a wild creature! I suppose it's so tame because we've been kind to it."

"All mongooses are like that," said her husband.

Nag, the cobra, coiled himself down, coil upon coil, round the bulge at the bottom of the water-jar, in Teddy's mother's room, and Rikki-tikki stayed still as death. After an hour he began to move, muscle by muscle, toward the jar. Nag was asleep, and Rikki-tikki looked at his big back, wondering which would be the best place for a good hold. "If I don't break his back at the first jump," said Rikki, "he'll still fight; and if he fights—O Rikki!" He looked at the thickness of the neck beneath the hood, but that was too much for him; and a bite near the tail would only make Nag savage.

"It must be the head," he said at last; "I'll head above the hood; and, when I am on the other side, I must not let go."

Then he jumped. The head was lying a little clear of the water-jar, under the eave of it; and, as his teeth met, Rikki-tikki forced his back against the bulge of the earthenware to hold down the head. This gave him just one second's purchase, and he made the most of it. Then he was jerked to and fro as a rat is shaken by a dog—to and fro on the floor, up and down, and round in great circles; but his eyes were red, and he held on as the body cart-whipped over the floor, upsetting the tin dipper and the soap-dish and the flesh-brush, and banged against the tin side of the bath. As he held, he closed his jaws tighter and tighter, for he made sure he would be banged to death, and, for the honor of his family, he preferred to be found with his teeth locked. He was dizzy, aching, and felt shaken to pieces when something went off like a thunderclap just behind him; a hot wind knocked him senseless and red fire singed his fur. The big man had been wakened by the noise, and had fired both barrels of a shot-gun into Nag just behind the hood.

Rikki-tikki held on with his eyes shut, for now he was quite sure he was dead; but the head did not move, and the big man picked him up and said: "It's the mongoose again, Alice; the little chap has saved our lives." Then Teddy's mother came in with a very white face, and saw what was left of Nag, and Rikki-tikki dragged himself to Teddy's bedroom and spent half the rest of the night shaking himself tenderly to find out whether he really was broken into forty pieces, as he had imagined.

CONSTANTINOPLE'S CRY HEARD.

America Responding to the Appeal for Aid for the Earthquake Sufferers—The Relief Fund Progressing—A Movement in which the Whole Christian World is Uniting to Relieve the Stricken Population of the Ottoman City.

CONSTANTINOPLE'S cry of distress, wrung from her in a season of deep sorrow, has awakened widespread and genuine sympathy. Generous responses are already beginning to flow in upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as the result of the publication of the appeal by the Turkish Relief Fund, in these columns. Touched by the abject misery of the many thousands of earthquake sufferers, who, having lost all their earthly possessions, are now camped in tents and subsisting on charity, the kind-hearted Christian people of our own land, whose hands are ever open to succor the stricken and distressed, are preparing to supplement the charitable efforts of good citizens, and the "Tribune," "Journal of Commerce," "Times," "Sun," and "Journal" have voluntarily undertaken to receive contributions at their respective offices for the benefit of the sufferers. Drexel, Morgan & Co., the well-known bankers, have generously subscribed $1,000 to the Fund.

It is within the power of every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to help in this great work of charity in which, at the present moment, a large part of the Christian world is engaged. Where thousands of families, both Christian and Moslem, have been suddenly overwhelmed by a calamity that has brought death and destitution into homes once happy and prosperous, their ledged and duly forwarded to United States Minister Terrell at Constantinople, who will act in conjunction with the Imperial Relief Commission in charge of the general relief work.

In Constantinople, the Armenians, Greeks and Jews have each church communities of their own. Recently the government, in securing information regarding the damage to property caused by the earthquakes, made inquiry of the Armenian and Greek Patriarchs and the Jewish rabbi as to the respective losses their different church communities had sustained. The Greek Patriarch estimated the loss inflicted upon his church community at 75,000 Turkish pounds, the Armenians placed theirs at 50,000 Turkish pounds and the Hebrews at 35,000 Turkish pounds—a total equal to about $640,000. Christians and all nationalities except Moslems, have their own schools to support. In some cases these church communities own buildings from which revenue is derived for the maintenance of the churches. So exten-sidents generally to assist, is producing good results. At the same time, the amount thus far secured from all sources is totally inadequate to relieve the general distress, which the approach of cold weather must soon render doubly severe. A very large number of dwellings have been inspected and condemned as dangerous for habitation and only fit to be pulled down. How the many thousands of homeless will pass the next three months is a problem that must now be faced. Their hardships, under all the circumstances, are such as would melt the stoniest heart to pity. Utterly unable to help themselves, their church communities practically bankrupt, and their wives and little ones growing weak and emaciated from insufficient food and overcrowded quarters in sheds and tents, they seem doomed to a miserable fate indeed, unless the Christian sympathy of other lands comes in time to their rescue.

In Koum Kapoo, the principal Armenian quarter, there is probably greater suffer-condition is one that appeals to every heart and which even the poorest may help in some degree to alleviate. We invite the kind co-operation of all our friends in every State of the Union, in this work of Christian sympathy, reminding them that even the smallest aid may be the means of succoring some poor, homeless household in its hour of sorest need. Every contribution, be it a dime or a dollar, will be acknow-

The home Relief Fund, started under official auspices, is being very generally subscribed to by Moslems and Christians alike. No compulsion is employed to secure subscriptions; but the moral effect of the action of the authorities in inviting Ottoman subjects and ing than in any other part of Constantinople. Contributions of bread, meat, beans, olives, cheese, rice, sheep and money have been received and applied to the relief of the sufferers. In other thickly populated sections of the city, the situation is little better. The fact that different nationalities and creeds are represented among the unfortunates seems to have awakened very general sympathy, and evoked many proffers of assistance. Under an order from the Greek government the ministry will send 50,000 ready made in England, France and Germany. Many encouraging letters have been received by the Relief Committee in New York, containing assurances of the heartfelt sympathy with the movement and pledging contributions to the Relief Fund. Philanthropists, statesmen, high officials and leading merchants and business men have given it their cordial endorsement and approval and consented to serve on its committees. In New York City, the entire press has urged it as a most praiseworthy movement, deserving the support of all

THE QUICK FEET.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage. Text: Matt. 14: 16: "When Herod's birthday was kept, the daughter of Herodias danced before them, and pleased Herod."

IT is the anniversary of Herod's birthday. The palace is lighted. The highways leading there to are all ablaze with the pomp of invited guests. Lords, captains, merchant princes, the mighty men of the land, are coming to mingle in the festivities. The table is spread with all the luxuries that royal purveyors can gather. The guests, white-robed and anointed and pertumed, come in and sit at the table. Music! The jests evoke roars of laughter. Riddles are propounded. Repartee is indulged. The wit rolls on into uproar and blasphemy. They are not satisfied yet. Turn on more light. Pour out more wine. Music! Sound all the trumpets. Clear the floor for a dance. Bring in Salome, the beautiful and accomplished princess. The door opens, and in bounds the dancer. The lords are enchanted. Stand back and make room for the brilliant gyrations. These men never saw such "poetry of motion." Their soul whirls in the reel and bounds with the bounding feet. Herod forgets crown and throne and everything but the tascinations of Salome. All the magnificence of his realm is as nothing now compared with the splendor that whirls on tiptoe before him. His body sways from side to side, corresponding with the motions of the enchantress. His soul is thrilled with the pulsations of the feet and bewitched with the taking postures and attitudes more and more amazing. After a while he sits in enchanted silence looking at the flashing, leaping, bounding beauty, and as the dance closes and the tinkling cymbals cease to clap and the thunders of applause that shook the palace begin to abate, the enchanted monarch swears to the princely performer: "Whatsoever thou shalt ask of me I will give it thee, to the half of my kingdom." Now, there was in prison at that time a minister of the Gospel by the name of John the Baptist, and he had been making a great deal of trouble by preaching some very plain and honest sermons. He had denounced the sins of the king and brought down upon him the wrath of the females of the royal household. At the instigation of her mother, Salome takes advantage of the extravagant promise of the king and says, "Bring me the head of John the Baptist on a dinner plate."

Hark to the sound of feet outside the door and the clatter of swords. The executioners are returning from their awful errand. Open the door. They enter, and they present the platter to Salome. What is on this platter? A new glass of wine to continue the uproarious merriment? No. Something redder and costlier—the ghastly, bleeding head of John the Baptist, the death glare still in the eye, the locks dabbled with the gore, the features still distressed with the last agony. This woman, who had whirled so gracefully in the dance, bends over the awful burden without a shudder. She gloats over the blood, and with as much indifference as a waiting-maid might take a tray of empty glassware out of the room after an entertainment, Salome carries the dis severed head of John the Baptist, while all the banqueters shout with laughter, and think it a good joke that in so easy and quick a way they have got rid of an earnest and outspoken minister of the Gospel.

Well, there is no harm in a birthday festival. All the kings from Pharaoh's time had celebrated such occasions, and why not Herod? No harm in kindling the lights. No harm in spreading the banquet. No harm in arousing music. But from the riot and wassail that closed the scene of that day every pure nature revolts. I am not at this time to discuss the old question, Is dancing right or wrong? but I am to discuss the question, Does dancing take too much place and occupy too much time in modern society? and in my remarks I hope to carry with me the earnest conviction of all thoughtful persons, and I believe I will.

You will all admit, whatever you think of that style of amusement and exercise, that from many circles it has crowded out all intelligent conversation. You will also admit that it has made the condition of those who do not dance, either because they do not know how, or because they have not the health to endure it, or because through conscientious scruples they must decline the exercise, very uncomfortable. You will also admit, all of you, that it has passed in many cases from an amusement to a dissipation, and you are easily able to understand the bewilderment of the educated Chinaman who, standing in the brilliant circle where there was dancing going on four or five hours, and the guests seemed exhausted, turned to the proprietor of the house and said, "Why don't you allow your servants to do this for you?"

You are also willing to admit whatever be your idea in regard to the amusement I am speaking of, and whatever be your idea of the old-fashioned square dance and of many of the processional romps in which I can see no evil, the round dance is administrative of evil and ought to be driven out of all respectable circles. I am by natural temperament and religious theory opposed to the position taken by all those who are horrified at playfulness on the part of the young, and who think that all questions are decided—questions of decency and morals—by the position of the feet, while on the other hand, I can see nothing but ruin, temperal and eternal, for those who go into the dissipations of social life, dissipations which have already despoiled thousands of young men and young women of all that is noble in character and useful in life.

Dancing is the graceful motion of the body adjusted by art to the sound and measures of musical instrument or of the human voice. All nations have danced. The ancients thought that Castor and Pollux taught the art to the Lacedaemonians. But whoever started it, all climes have adopted it. In ancient times they had the festal dance, the military dance, the mediatorial dance, the bacchanalian dance, and queens and lords swayed to and fro in the gardens, and the rough backwoodsman with this exercise awakened the echo of the forest. There is something in the sound of lively music to evoke the movement of the hand and foot, whether cultured or uncultured. Passing down the street we unconsciously keep step to the sound of the brass band, while the Christian in church with his foot beats time while his soul rises upon some great harmony. While this is so in civilized lands, the red men of the forest have their scalp dances, their green-corn dances, their war dances. In ancient times the exercise was so utterly and completely depraved that the Church anathematized it. The old Christian fathers expressed themselves most vehemently against it. This indiscriminate and universal denunciation of the exercise came from the fact that it was utterly and completely depraved.

But we are not to discuss the customs of the olden times, but customs now. We are not to take the evidence of the ancient fathers, but our own conscience, enlightened by the Word of God, is to be the standard. Oh, bring no harsh criticism upon the young. I would not drive out from their soul the hilarities of life. I do not believe that the inhabitants of ancient Wales, when they stepped to the sound of the rustic harp, went down to ruin. I believe God intended the young people to laugh and romp and play. I do not believe God would have put exuberance in the soul and exuberance in the body if he had not intended they should in some wise exercise it and demonstrate it. If a mother join hands with her children and cross the floor to the sound of music, I see no harm. If a group of friends cross and recross the room to the sound of piano well played, I see no harm. If a company, all of whom are known to host and hostess as reputable, cross and recross the room to the sound of musical instrument, I see no harm. I tried for a long while to see harm in it. I could not see any harm in it. I never shall see any harm in that. Our men need to be kept young, young for many years longer than they are kept young. Never since my boyhood days have I had more sympathy with the innocent hilarities of life than I have now. What though we have felt heavy burdens! What though we have had to endure hard knocks! Is that any reason why we should stand in the way of those who, unstung of life's mistortunes, are full of exhilaration and glee? God bless the young! They will have to wait many a long year before they hear me say anything that would depress their ardor or clip their wings or make them believe that life is hard and cold and repulsive. It is not. I tell them, judging from my own experience, that they will be treated a great deal better than they deserve. We have no right to grudge the innocent hilarities to the young.

As we go on in years let us remember that we had our gleeful times; let us be able to say, "We had our good times, let others have their good times." Let us willingly resign our place to those who are coming after us. I will cheerfully give them everything—my house, my books, my position in society, my heritage. After twenty, forty, fifty years we have been drinking out of the cup of this life, do not let us begrudge the passing of it that others may take a drink. But while all this is so, we can have no sympathy with sinful indulgences, and I am going to speak in regard to some of them, though I should tread on the long train of some popular vanities.

What are the dissipations of social life today, and what are the dissipations of the ball-room? In some cities and in some places reaching all the year round, in other places only in the summer time and at the watering-places. There are dissipations of social life that are cutting a very wide swath with the sickle of death, and hundreds and thousands are going down under these influences, and my subject in application is as wide as Christendom. The whirlpool of social dissipation is drawing down some of the brightest craft that ever sailed the sea—thousands and tens of thousands of the bodies and souls annually consumed in the conflagration of ribbons.

Social dissipation is the abettor of pride, it is the instigator of jealousy, it is the sacrificial altar of health, it is the defiler of the soul, it is the avenue of lust and it is the curse of every town on both sides of the sea. Social dissipation. It may be hard to draw the line and say that this is right on the one side, and that is wrong on the other side. It is not necessary that we do that, for God has put a throne in every man's soul, and I appeal to that throne today. When a man does wrong he knows he does wrong, and when he does right he knows he does right, and to that throne which Almighty God lifted in the heart of every man and woman I appeal.

As to the physical ruin wrought by the dissipations of social life there can be no doubt. What may we expect of people who work all day and dance all night? After awhile they will be thrown on society nervous, exhausted imbeciles. These people who indulge in the suppers and the midnight revels and then go home in the cold unwrapped of limbs, will after a while be found to have been written down in God's eternal records as suicides, as much suicides as if they had taken their life with a pistol, or a knife, or strychnine.

How many people have stepped from the ball-room into the graveyard! Consumptions and swift neuralgias are close on their track. Amid many of the glittering scene of social life, diseases stand right and left and balance and chain. The breath of the sepulchre floats up through the perfume and the froth of Death's lips bubbles up in the champagne. I am told that in some of the cities there are parents who have actually given up housekeeping and gone to boarding that they may give their time illimitably to social dissipations. I have known such cases. I have known families after family blasted in that way in one of the other cities where I preached. Father and mother turning their back upon a quiet culture and all the amenities of home leading forth their entire family in the wrong direction. Annihilated, worse than annihilated—for there are some things worse than annihilation.

Let me tell you that the dissipations of social life are despoiling the usefulness of vast multitude of people. What do the people care about the fact that there are whole nations in sorrow and suffering and agony, when they have for consideration the more important question about the si of a glove or the tie of a cravat? Which one of them ever bound up the wounds of the hospital? Which one of them ever went out to care for the poor? Which of the do you find in the haunts of sin distributed tracts? They live on themselves, and it is very poor pasture.

Sybaris was a great city, and it or sent out three hundred horsemen in battle. They had a minstrel who had taught 1 horses of the army a great trick, and when the old minstrel played a certain tune the horses would rear and with their front seem to beat time to the music. Well, the old minstrel was offended with his count and he went over to the enemy, and he said to the enemy: "You give me the masters of the army and I will destroy their troops when those horsemen come from Sybaris. So they gave the old minstrel the manna ment, and he taught all the other minstrel a certain tune. Then when the cavalry troop came up the old minstrel and all other minstrels played a certain tune, at the most critical moment in the battle when the horsemen wanted to rush to conflict, the horses reared and beat time to the music with their forefeet, and in disgust and rout the enemy fled. Ah! my friend, I have seen it again and again—the minstrels of pleasure, the minstrels of dissipation, the minstrels of godless associations have defeated people in the hardest fighting. Frivolity has lost the battle for a thousand talk.

You know as well as I do that the dissipations of social life are destroying thousands and tens of thousands of people, and it is time that the pulpits lift their voice against them, for I now prophesy the eternal fortune of all those who enter the river. When did the white, glistening boards of a dissipated ball-room ever become the road to heaven? When was a torch for eternity ever lighted at the chandelier of a dissipated scene? From a table spread after an excited and desecrated scene who went home to pray?

In my parish of Philadelphia there was a young woman brilliant as a spring morning. She gave her life to the world. She would come to religious meetings and

OUR MISSIONARY AT HINCKLEY.

Rev. G. W. Sharp Tells the Story of His Relief Tour in the Fire-Swept Valley—Pastor Knudsen's Heroism—A Region of Desolation that May Bloom Again.

AFTER their recent terrible visitation of fire and death, hope is again beginning to dawn among the desolated towns and villages in the lumber region of Minnesota. Everything has been done for the survivors that sympathy could devise. Kinds hand have buried their dear dead ones, friendly aid has relieved the wants of the living, and the ruined homes are being replaced as rapidly as possible by comfortable dwellings. The State of Minnesota and the prosperous cities of St. Paul and Duluth have generously provided against the immediate possibility of further suffering, and the outside public has borne its share of the burden of relief promptly and cheerfully.

Rev. G. W. Sharp, the Sunday School Missionary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who was commissioned by this journal to make a tour of the fire-swept district, and supplied with funds to aid in the relief work, has accomplished his duty, and, after making report, has returned to his post at Kirksville, Mo. His closing letter, which we give below, will be read with deep interest:

"ST. PAUL, Minn., Sept. 14, 1894.

"DEAR MR. KLOPSCH:—On Monday, 11th inst., I went from Pine City (Minn.)

feet. Only about half who sought refuge in it were saved; the others perished. About a quarter of a mile north of Grindstone Creek, a little west of the Eastern railway, was an open space where many sought safety. It was a fatal mistake. Ninety-six were found dead there.

"As the hurricane of fire came sweeping through the woods south of town, the terror-stricken people flew north. Thus, on the Eastern Minnesota track a south-bound train having crossed the bridge over Grindstone, found a surging crowd in the south-eastern part of town, and stopped and took on board men, women and children till the last moment of safety, while the fire was flaming right and left, and the bridge behind was on fire. Best was the engineer, and having nearly 500 passengers and refugees on board, he reversed his engine, recrossed the burning bridge, which soon after fell in, and carried his precious train back to Duluth. Thus also the south-bound passenger train on the St. Paul & Duluth road met a swarm of refugees about a mile before it reached the town.

Just in front of where engineer Best's train stood, south of the Grindstone bridge, a street running from west to east and into the country, crossed the railroad track. Near this crossing stood Pastor Knudsen tion in sandy ground just east of the Eastern Minnesota track. The sand was used to enlarge the bed of the track and for ballast. The pit is about 300 yards long, north and south, of irregular width, but the mean distance across it is about 100 yards; depth about ten feet at the south end, becoming more shallow gradually till it comes to a level at the north end on the street crossing the Eastern Minnesota R. R., as I have described. The pit is less than half a mile east of the centre of the town, and besides its own depth, the railroad track west of it is a sheltering embankment. There is shallow water over the deeper part of it. It is now easy to see that the whole population might have taken refuge in the pit and been saved, as those were who did go into it. A cow escaped death in it, and after the fire was milked that night, and the milk fed to the hungry children, being carried to some in a scorched watermelon rind.

"When I was walking along the road to the cemetery, which is about a mile east of town, I saw some paper caught in a scorched bush on the right hand of the road. At my request a boy stepped out and brought it to me. It proved to be part of a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (I enclose it in my letter.) Though charred and burned around the edges, the fragment is still very legible. It contains the concluding part of an article from Dr. Talmage, addressed to Christians, which says:

The wrathful wave will kiss the feet of the great Storm-walker. Our great Joshua will command, and above your soul the sun of prosperity will stand still. Bleak and wave-struck Patmos shall have Apocalyptic visions, and you shall hear the cry of elders, and the sweep of wings, and the trumpets of salvation, and the voice of Hallelujah unto God forever.

"I shall not attempt to describe the scene when grass, grubs, stumps, debris, brush and trees were devoured in intense heat by a fire which was borne on a rushing, mighty wind till the leaping flames enveloped houses and household goods, destroying animal and vegetable life in their roaring fury and flying speed. Graphic accounts of the conflagration have been published far and wide. They may remind one of the infinitely greater day—the day of God, 'Wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat.'

"About four hundred and sixty bodies of the dead have been found and buried of those who lost their lives in and about

Hinckley, Pokegama and other neighboring points. The number of missing is still greater. The homeless and unemployed sufferers who survive number about thirteen hundred. Their present need is supplied so far as to relieve them from present suffering. But this will have to be continued. Efforts and means for their relief are being systematically applied by the State Relief Committee and others. The liberality of the people of the State and abroad is most noble. A Queen referring to her adverse fortune at Calais, said: 'When I am dead, you will find Calais written on my heart.' Hinckley and neighboring places that were in the forest fires are written on the heart of Minnesota, and not on her's only. But there is much yet to be done to provide homes for the people in a climate where the mercury gets too cold to be reliable in the thermometer.

"Understanding your instructions to refer to cases of present need, I acted accordingly, of which work I will give you a detailed account later. I am also assured, from a most trustworthy source on the ground, that information of such cases as may need your assistance shall be reported when they arise. I conclude with a statement from the brother in the Lord who was my adviser. Yours very respectfully,

GEORGE W. SHARP.

Christian Herald Missionary of the Am. S. S. Union."

The statement referred to by Mr. Sharp is as follows:

"HINCKLEY, MINN., Sept. 11, 1894. This is to certify that Rev. George W. Sharp has been forward and faithful in his efforts to administer financial relief, and words of consolation to our stricken community, as the representative of a relief fund for forest fire sufferers, furnished by the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dr. Louis Klopsch. Signed P. KNUDSEN, Pastor of Hinckley Presbyterian Church.

to Hinckley, and in company with Rev. Mr. Knudsen, pastor of the Presbyterian Church—the only English-speaking church there—went over the ground where the town once was. At night we came back to Pine City for lodging, and on Tuesday returned to Hinckley.

"In those two days I had ample opportunity to study the wants of the people by the aid of Mr. Knudsen, whom I regard as the most competent counselor surviving, he having known the people before their calamity, having been with them in their dreadful ordeal, and since then, having been untiring in his attention to their wants. Moreover, on account of his cool and discriminating judgment while the town was burning, his reputation for truth and veracity, and his modesty and unaffected sincerity, I am sure I have reliable authority for the substantial accuracy of the following narrative concerning that awful day of forest fire, Sept. 1.

"Grindstone River flows from west to east, north of the town about a quarter of a mile, the ground sloping gently from the north part of Hinckley to the river, then rising gently north of the river, stretches out into the country. Two railroad bridges spanned this river; the St. Paul & Duluth being northwest, and the Eastern Minnesota being northeast of the town. Nearly midway between the two was a wagon bridge over the river, and many of the fugitives who tried to escape by fleeing north over this bridge, perished by the way. Grindstone River, so-called, is only a creek, at present about thirty or thirty-five feet wide, varying in apparent depth from one foot to three and called aloud to the frantic crowd who were flying to Grindstone Creek, warning them not to go there. One of them who survived said afterwards:

"We heard you calling but twenty devils could not have stopped me."

"Of all those whose heroic deeds in that awful baptism of fire deserve perpetual memory no names are more worthy to stand on 'Fame's immortal camping-ground,' than those of Pastor Knudsen and his devoted wife. When the price of every moment was above gold they stood together.

"We are only two," said he, 'let us help these women with children on the train—then to the gravel pit.'

"Soon the train, crowded and packed, moved swiftly away to the north, and they were left. As no more could be done for others, they now started for the north end of the gravel pit, which was about 100 feet south of them. Twice she fell, overcome with smoke and heat. The last time she said in despair:

"Let us lie down and die here."

"Just then she caught sight of a loaded wagon in the mouth of the pit.

"She bounded like a cat (I use his own words), and got under the wagon."

"There they were sheltered till the wagon took fire and they went further into the pit and were saved. The owner of that wagon, his wife, a daughter and three sons perished in the flames. A surviving daughter of his was one of those I assisted out of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund. This gravel pit is not a cave, nor anything like one. It is simply an excava-conviction would for a little while begin to say, and then would rush off again into the discipleship of the world. She had all the world could offer of brilliant social position. One day a flushed and excited messenger asked me to hasten to her house, she was dying. I entered the room, asked her some questions in regard to the soul. She made no answer. I knelt down and pray. I rose again, and desiring to get me expression in regard to her eternal interests, I said: "Have you any hope?" and then for the first time her lips moved in a whisper as she said: "No hope!" Then she died. The world, she served it, and the world helped her not in the last. I wish from my heart that I could marshal all the young people in this land to an appreciation of the fact that you have an earnest work in life, and your amusements and recreations are only to help you along in your work. At the time of a religious awakening a Christian young woman spoke to a man in regard to his soul's salvation. He floated out into the world. After while she became worldly in her Christian profession. The man said one day, "Well, I am as safe as she is. I was a Christian, she said she was a Christian. She talked to me about my soul; if she is safe I am safe." Then a sudden accident took him off without an opportunity to utter one word of prayer. Do you not realize, have you not noticed, young men and old—have you not noticed that the dissipations of social life are blasting and destroying a vast multitude? With any life is a masquerade ball, and as at such entertainments gentlemen and ladies put on the garb of angels and queens or mountebanks or clowns and at the close put off the disguise, so a great many pass their whole life in a masquerade, taking off the mask of death. While the masquerade ball of life goes on, they trip merrily over the floor, gemmed hand is stretched to gemmed hand, and gleaming brow bends to gleaming brow. On the dance! Flush and rustle and laughter of innumerable merry-making. But after awhile the hour of death comes on the limbs and blurs the eyesight. Lights lower. Floor hollow with sepulchral echo. Music saddened into a wail. Lights lower. Now the fragrance of the flowers is the sickening odor that comes from garlands that have lain long in the vaults of cemeteries. Lights lower. Mists gather in the room. Glasses shake as though quaked by sudden thunder. Sigh caught in the curtain. Scarf drops from the shoulder of a lady, a shroud. Lights lower. Over the slippery boards in dance of death glide courtesies, envies, revenges, lust, despair and death. Stench of lamp-wicks almost extinguished. Torn garlands will not half cover the ulcerated feet. Choking damps. Gloominess. Feet still. Hands closed. Voices hushed. Eyes shut. Lights out. Oh, how many of you have floated far away from God through social dissipations, and it is time you turned. For I remember that there were two vessels on the sea, and in a storm. It was very, very dark, and the two vessels were going straight for each other, and the captains knew it not. But at a while the man on the lookout saw the approaching ship, and he shouted, "Hard a-larboard!" and from the other vessel the captain went up, "Hard a-larboard!" and they turned just enough to glance by and passed in safety to their harbors. Some of you are in the storm of temptation and you are drifting on and coming toward fearful collisions unless you change your course. Hard a-larboard! Turn ye, turn ye, for ye will ye die, oh, house of Israel?"

THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.

S.S. Lesson for Oct. 14. Luke 6: 11. Golden Text Mark 1: 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER his rejection and persecution at Nazareth, Jesus came to Capernaum and taught there in the synagogue on the Sabbath day; and they were astonished at his doctrine, or teachings, "for his word was with authority." The Word of God is living and powerful, it has authority; it commanded all created things into being; and now when it comes from God through whomsoever he may use to speak, it has authority still. Oh, how much unholy waste of time there is in human discourses, which are composed of the thoughts of men, and have no authority to convince of sin, to edify, exhort or comfort. Those who truly prophesy must, like Ezekiel, speak God's words, not their own. "Speak with my words unto them." "Hear the word of my mouth, and thou shalt say unto them: Thus saith the Lord."

The Lord Jesus knew how to receive the Word from his Father. From all eternity he was the Word. "In the beginning was the Word, the Word was with God, and the Word was God." But "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us," and the human nature of Christ had, in a sense, to become the Word. To express to the full in his human life, the revelation of God, he "learned obedience," was "made perfect through sufferings, that, as Man, his Word might be with authority, because it was God. It is just in measure as we become perfectly yielded up to, and one with God, that our word, too, will have authority. In the early days of his ministry, it was which specially struck those who heard Jesus. In addition to this, there were deeds of power. The casting out of the unclean spirit from the possessed man in the synagogue at Capernaum, caused astonishment, so that the people said among themselves: "What a word is this! for with authority and power he commandeth the unclean spirits and they come out." In one day, Jesus becomes popular, and a great work of healing and of casting out of devils took place, until far into the night. But this work of healing was only a part of his ministry: "when it was day he went into a desert place." There the Son of God was at home; there he could commune uninterruptedly with his Father. There the works which he did in public were all prepared. It is the same with his true followers; they cannot rush from one spiritual work to another without taking time to be alone with God. They must receive in their hearts, as Ezekiel did, what they must afterwards speak to others. They must "eat the roll" (Ezek. 3: 1-3; Rev. 10: 8-11), and make their message their own, before they can speak with authority to others. But the precious time alone with his Father was broken in upon by the eager multitudes, and Jesus was not annoyed: He had an absolute trust in his Father's perfect wisdom, and took everything from his hand. The people would have starved Jesus and hindered his leaving them. But he had got his orders: I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also.

For Therefore, am I Sent.

He was commissioned, and true to his commission, had no moment of difficulty as to his course, and he preached in the synagogues of Galilee. But it would seem that the synagogues were soon too small: "the people pressed upon him to hear the Word of God." There were those who did not only come to him with temporal needs of healing, etc., but who thirsted to hear from him the words of life, which we so unblest the teaching the heard every Sabbath day in the synagogue, composed of dry doctrines which had not become a power in the life of those who preached them, or traditions, which obscured and spoiled the holy simplicity and power of the inspired Word of God.

The people pressed upon him to hear the word of God; and it had been necessary to adjourn from the synagogue to some place in the open air, and the shore of the lake of Gennesaret was the chosen spot. The place, the convenience, or inconvenience, was nothing to the Son of God. The lakeside was his auditorium, and he took as rostrum that which came most readily to hand. Two ships were standing by the lake, but the owners were washing their nets. One of them was no stranger to Jesus: it was the very Simon Peter, whom his brother Andrew had led to him. Why he was now fishing and not following Jesus we know not; the Master does not rebuke him, but at once takes possession of his ship, and begs him to thrust out a little from the land.

Peter was weary from a sleepless night, but he makes this no excuse, and immediately obeys. True disciples never consider how much it may cost them, when the Lord gives them a command: they Obeys Immediately.

"And Jesus taught the people out of the ship;" and Peter helped by lending his boat. How long this time of teaching lasted we know not: on one occasion the Lord speaks of the multitude being with him three days." (Matt. 15: 32.) Did Jesus know how weary Simon was? Does Jesus know what bodily and spiritual fatigue is? Yes, he knows; he does not, he cannot forget. When he had left speaking, his first thought was for Peter; the Word first, the disciple's need next. He said to Simon: "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught. And Simon answering, said unto him, Master, we have toiled all the night and have taken nothing; nevertheless at thy word, I will let down the net." "We have toiled all the night." The disciples must know their own nothingness; it is the first step to any new blessing. All our own efforts are fruitless. Yes, dear child of God; your Lord has said, "Without me (R.V., apart from me) ye can do nothing." (John 15: 5.) We cannot know Jesus, and continue to accomplish anything by our own toiling. And yet the Christian Church everywhere is putting the "toiling," the doing, the active service, in the place of that true worship in spirit and in truth, which waits upon the Lord, which knows not our own gifts, our own energy, our own places, our own institutions, but our God. True worship yields everything to God; it never seeks to be God's benefactor, but waits to know his will before doing it, and then, when known, does it, irrespective of what it may cost, whether or not it may be understood or appreciated by others, or what may be the consequence. Peter added to his confession of failure,

"Nevertheless at Thy Word

I will let down the net." This is the true secret of success. When Elijah stood, in the supreme moment of his ministry on Mount Carmel, God's champion in the presence of King and prophets, and people, he prayed that the people might know he had done these things at God's word. (1 Kings 28: 36.) God is responsible for all which is done at his word. Peter, fallible man that he was, so often making mistakes, had yet real confidence in the Lord Jesus, whom he had found as the Messiah: "At thy word I will," was real faith. Peter obeyed, with the help of Andrew, and to his amazement "they enclosed a great multitude of fishes, and their net broke." Peter was obliged to call his partners in business, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, that they should come and help them; they came, and the work of filling the ships began, but, as they went on, the ships proved unequal to the unusual cargo, and began to sink. It was no accident, and Peter knew it. He did not attempt to explain it, but he fell down and worshipped: he saw God in what had occurred, and "fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." Peter learned his nothingness in two ways; first by his unsuccess, and then by the wondrous grace of the Lord, and the success which he had in obeying and trusting him. And he learned how safe his own interests were with Jesus, just as soon as he made Christ's interest his. It is always safe to study God's interests first, and to trust him implicitly, so long as we are in the way of obedience.

FISHING ON LAKE GALILEE.

built by the good centurion, of which Jairus was the chief ruler. Simon, Andrew, James and John lived in the town or in the immediate neighborhood and Jesus was sure of a hospitable welcome. It was, besides a town better fitted than secluded Nazareth for the purpose he had in view. It was on the direct line by which travellers went from Jerusalem to Damascus and also on the route between Egypt and Syria. The sea also gave him ready access by the boats of his friends to other parts of Galilee. Jesus made Capernaum his central point for that year's ministry. He preached and healed there and made excursions to the towns in a circuit around it. The Sabbath service was interrupted by a lunatic afflicted by the peculiar form of derangement, known to the people of that day as "possession by the devil." Jesus delivered him, and on his return to Peter's house healed Peter's mother-in-law of a fever. In the evening other sick people were brought to him and those, too, he cured. It is easy to realize how welcome Jesus must have been to the Capernaum people and how they would need to be reminded that they must not monopolize him, as he must preach in other cities. Returning after one of these excursions, he is seen by the people, who immediately flock around him wanting him to preach to them. He steps on board Peter's boat and thence talks to the audience collected on the shore. The discourse is not recorded, but it would probably be the kind of sermon he gave on the Mount and in other places. How glad we should be now of a report of it, but it is lost to the world. At its conclusion, he gives a practical lesson to the four men whom he now proposes to draw closer to himself. They believed on him, counted themselves his friends and were his occasional associates. Now he would have them quit secular employment and be with him continually. They might be concerned about their support, and before calling on them to leave their business, he shows them that he has unbounded power. Although they have been toiling vainly all night, they make a rich haul when he gives the word. Peter was astonished, and perceiving that he was in the presence of a superior Being, he realized his own unworthiness. The others were of the same mind and forsaking all, they followed him. It may incidentally be useful to know that the little inland sea is twelve and a quarter miles long and at its greatest width six and three-quarters miles. The Jordan enters it at the north and flows out again at its southern side. It is noted for the many kinds of fish in it.

Nevertheless at thy word. A building was being torn down, and a laborer, who was noted among the workmen for his lack of intelligence, was set to pull at a rope attached to the top of a wall. "Do you think," a passer-by asked, "that you are going to pull that thick wall down in that way?" The man continued his tugs as he replied, "It don't seem so to me, but I guess my boss knows what he is about." After an hour's pulling the man felt a slight victory response to his tug and at last the wall swayed and fell. It had been undermined and the man who gave the order knew it, although the man who pulled at the rope did not. He obeyed, as Peter obeyed Christ's command to let down the net. Perhaps more faith were exercised in Christ's commands now, we should be as much astonished at the result as Peter was.

Partners who were in the other ship. A people would be won for Christ if there were less rivalry and jealousy between churches. Too often people who are in one ship are not regarded as partners, though they are working for the same Master and for the same cause. Melancthon used to tell a fable in illustration of the fact. He said that in a certain forest the wolves became alarmed by the report of the number of dogs that were brought to hunt them. They sent one of their number to visit the kennels and report. The spies came back and bade their comrades be of good cheer for there was no cause for alarm. There were as numerous as was reported but they were of various breeds, and though every dog professed to hate the wolf, he hated other dogs of a different breed to his own worse than he hated the wolf. They were never likely to hunt together, as if a whole army of dogs were led out they would fall upon each other, and the wolves need not fight, for one breed of dogs would fight with another breed and the whole army would be exterminated. "Were quite safe," said the spy-wolves, "so long as the dogs are at enmity with each other."

Thou shalt catch men. A common method of fishing on Lake Galilee was for boats to go together far out from shore. One boat went a few yards farther than the other and would then light a blazing torch at the stern and hold it over the water. The fish attracted by the light would come in shoals. A net would then be thrown from the rear boat and a rope attached to the net would be flung to the forward boat. The two boats would then be rowed to shore dragging the net full of fishes between them. He who would catch men not death but for life eternal must exhibit Christ as the light of the world.

They forsook all. Dr. Judson, the eminent missionary to Burmah, once examined Karen woman who was a candidate for baptism. She gave intelligent answers to his questions, but Judson was not satisfied. There seemed something lacking. His eye caught the glitter of a necklace a kind much esteemed by the Karens. "You give up your ornaments for Christ," the missionary asked. "Tears filled the woman's eyes. The struggle would evidence a severe one, Judson appealed to her consciousness of pride and vanity and woman broke down. She took her necklace off and looked at it admiringly. It was the most precious treasure in her possession. She thought about it for some time and laid it down on the missionary's table with the declaration, "I love Christ more than that."

Followed him. A clergyman with his brother and several friends were climbing the highest peak in the chain of Mount Rosa. The clergyman says: "When we were at the top, we entered a dense fog. Presently our guides faced right about and grounded their axes on the frozen snow-covered slope. My brother seeing the men still beyond and not knowing it was merely the cornice overhanging a precipice several thousand feet stepped forward. I shall never forget the guides' cry of warning. He stood a moment on the very edge and then, the snow yielding beneath him, he began to fall through. One of the guides at great risk rushed to him and seizing his coat dragged him out to a safe place. Christ has thus to rescue some who profess to be his followers, but who rush ahead, not content to follow only where he leads."

marks for the homeless and destitute. A Christian tobacco manufacturing concern has given 100 Turkish pounds (equal to about 400 piastres). Broussa has contributed 17,000 piastres. Halep has sent 9,860 gold piastres and Smyrna has twice sent 1,000 Turkish pounds. European Turkey's gifts will aggregate about 200,000 piastres. Syria has organized relief committees and in Beyrout a local committee is making commendable progress. Concerts given in Paris for the earthquake sufferers were a great success and a considerable sum was raised. From sources, up to the present time, about 225,102 piastres have been contributed and forwarded to the Relief Committee—equal to about 32,000 Turkish pounds in the neighborhood of $140,000. A majority of the individual contributions are small amounts. A bishop makes a donation of 2 Turkish pounds, a merchant sends 50 pounds of charcoal, a lady gives 5 baskets of grapes for the sick, and many persons have sent quantities of olives, while others have given to the Relief Committee hundreds of loaves of bread or their equivalent in money. These incidents, and many others of like character, show how genuine the sympathy that has been excited by the condition of the crowds of destitute, who are still camped out under canvas. One of our illustrations in this issue shows a group of families encamped in the "Derwishes' Gardens," a well known and picturesque quarter of Pera. These camps are now multiplied, since the wholesale condemnation of dwellings which, although left standing after the convulsions, are now pronounced unsafe. Scientific observers, who have been collecting all the accessible data regarding the earthquakes, now state that the shocks were felt over a very wide range and inflicted damage along the entire Grecian border, the Turkish islands, south to the Taurus Mountains, and west to the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, the centre of disturbance apparently lying in the Sea of Marmora. The latest violence by land was in Stamboul, where nearly all the houses were deserted, the horror-stricken inmates immediately after the first shocks. Whole streets are impassable owing to the ruins, and many stores, offices, bureaux and dwellings that were once levelled, still remain closed and are so changed that they must be demolished. The military and financial bureaux of the Ottoman Government in Stamboul were badly damaged.

But the panic was not confined to Stamboul. Over ninety per cent of the 1,400,000 inhabitants of Constantinople spent those terrible nights in the open air, most of them for the first night at least—with only bed-sheets to protect them. There was great excitement at the Imperial residence, and the members of the Sultan's household were among the multitudes who camped out in the Miliz Park, till the universal terror had somewhat subsided.

For beauty of situation and picturesque appearance there are few cities in the world that can compare with Constantinople, a general view of which is presented on the opposite page. Standing upon the threshold of two continents, it has unequalled commercial advantages, and its harbor is one of the finest in existence. In the immediate foreground is Stamboul the oldest part of the capital, and where the earthquakes did the greatest damage. It is a rounded promontory, whose extremity is known as "Saglio Point." Many of the buildings shown in the photograph are now a mere mass of debris. To the left is the arm of the sea known as The Golden Horn which separates the city into two great sections—the Turkish (Stamboul), and the European (Pera and Galata.) Two bridges span the Golden Horn and unite Galata to Stamboul. This splendid city has a history that is full of disaster and many times has been ravaged by conflagration and rent by earthquake, but never before has it experienced a visitation that has caused so much suffering and sorrow as now prevail there. Its prostrate condition with a large portion of its area in ruins and multitudes of Moslems, Armenians, Greeks and Jews supplicants for food, shelter and clothing, is one that appeals powerfully and justly to the humanity of all peoples and creeds. The broad and self denying charity which the avowr enjoined upon all his followers should lead Christians to extend freely and joyfully the helping hand to these afflicted ones in their time of deep tribulation.

MY PASSOVER.

A PILGRIM with my staff in hand,
I eat my passover to night;
With girded loins, full-shod I stand,
To wait the coming night.

I know not—and 'tis not my care—
If I shall spend the coming years
Where Elim's palm trees cool the air,
Or Marah pours her tears.

But this I know, the sprinkled blood
Hath set my soul at liberty,
A Red Sea rolls its cleansing flood
Between my sins and me.

And he, who knoweth all my way,
Creates the darkness and the light,
His cloudy pillar shades my day,
His glory cheers my night.

Full soon my pilgrimage will cease—
Its transient joys, its binding tears—
And I shall find eternal peace
Beyond the "rolling years."

WOMAN IN CHINA AND JAPAN.

IN our own land, woman is the grace of the tea-table. In China and Japan, she is not only the genius who presides over the preparation of the tea in the home, but she has a great deal to do with the process of "fixing" which the green leaf undergoes before it is ready for marketing. A missionary writing from Kobe, Japan, says:

"We visited a large tea-firing establishment, where hundreds of operatives are employed—mostly women. There the tea is dried and prepared for the foreign market. There were long rows of large ovens, under each of which was a charcoal fire.

"A woman stood at each, and with her hand stirred the tea until sufficiently toasted. Those laborers, I understand, get from eight to ten 'sen' (cents) a day, which, in their depreciated currency is worth four or five cents in American money. Ten cents a day is considered very good wages. I noticed that many of the women in that tea house had black teeth. It is a Japanese custom, dating back eight hundred years or more, that married women must blacken the teeth with some kind of ink, and shave the eyebrows when they become mothers.

"The reason for the practice given is that wives thus become unattractive to other persons. If so, it is a success; for they are almost hideous. Maiden ladies, also, when the prospect of marriage seems hopeless, blacken their teeth and die to the world.

The present Em-press dis-cards the custom and it is rapidly passing away. But I have already seen hundreds, if not thousands, thus hideously discolored."

THE MONEY CAME BACK.

Bishop Tucker, the successor of the murdered Bishop Hannington in Uganda, says that when the consignment of Bibles and books arrived there the rush for them was so great that the store of the missionaries got full of money—that is to say, of shells, which are the ordinary currency in the Uganda country.

"Why, we had half the currency of the country in our stores; and so our sale of books decreased for no other reason than that the people could not get shells with which to buy them. Just at that time Sir Gerald Portal came into the country, and knowing that he would need shells with which to pay his carriers, etc. I sent over to him and said, 'I will sell you the shells I have here at the rate of three hundred per rupee.' He agreed to my proposal; so, with a great deal of labor, porters carried them over from the missionary stores to the government house. In due course they were paid out to the employees of the government expedition, who in their turn paid them over to the natives for the bananas and beef and mutton they wanted, and so the shells got into circulation again, and the natives brought them back to us to purchase books. I do not know what this is called in financial circles but it was an interesting phenomenon to me. The shells going out from us, buying labor, then buying bananas, and finally buying books again."

Bible Institute Triumphs.

How the Students Testify to the Value of its Training—Some Glowing Letters—The Moody Fund Still Growing.

NOT a day passes in the Moody Bible Institute, in Chicago, that does not bring from former students letters full of Christian love and gratitude for the invaluable training they received there. In every department of Gospel effort, in the pulpit, on the platform, in street and lane, by land and sea, and among men and women of all nationalities, these young workers for Christ, in their various fields at home or abroad, find that the time spent at the Institute has been the most profitable of their lives in a spiritual sense. It taught them direct and practical methods in every case and fitted them admirably for the special work in which they afterwards engaged.

We are permitted to give brief extracts from a few of these enthusiastic letters from ex-students:

W. G. W., South Carolina, writes: I want to thank you personally Mr. Torrey for the power of your example—your life—as well as for the good derived from your teaching in the Lecture Room. I never have had such an insight into the joy of working for Christ as I have since I left the Institute.

B. A., Michigan. Am very thankful I was directed to the Bible Institute for there I learned certain lines of truth that have opened up the whole Bible to me in a wonderful way.

W. D., Edinburgh, writes: For the last four weeks it has been my privilege to have four meetings nearly every day. Much blessing has resulted, souls are saved, believers are receiving the Holy Spirit and are getting faith to serve. Your lectures on "How to Bring men to Christ," have been given in one of our halls here. Over fifty have attended every night and God has blessed us. On Sunday mornings at eight A. M., the same number turn out for the Bible meetings.

Another, now laboring in Great Britain, writes: Yesterday clear light came to me as to the future. The Foreign Mission Commissioners of the Church of Scotland have accepted me for the Punjab, India, and if the Lord wills, I shall proceed thither about October. In my time of preparation, I will not be idle. Demand came for meetings constantly. For the last two Sundays I have had five services, and blessing in them all, and next Sunday this is to be repeated. I wish you would ask special prayer for me in the Institute that every detail of fitness may be given me for my new work. There are some 3,000 converts to be shepherded in.

The women, at the last term of the Bible Institute represented fifteen denominations, and came directly from thirty-one States. The men represented thirty-five States, besides a number of foreign countries; and they had been engaged in more than one hundred different occupations before entering the Institute. Many are now engaged as pastors, evangelists, local preachers, exhorters, missionaries, Y. M. C. A. secretaries and Christian workers on different lines. It is for the extension of this great work of Christian training for the evangelistic field that Mr. Moody has made appeal through the THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for funds for the Institute. SAILORS AND RELIGION.

NEVER hear the howling of the autumnal or wintry blast without remembering those who are on the deep or amid the storms of temptation in foreign ports. Help the bethels on the land which swing open their doors inviting the mariners to free reading rooms to cultivate their minds and to chapels of worship to save their souls. Do you know that I think converted sailors are yet to be the most successful missionaries in all the world? During the great revival which swept Christendom in 1857 there were ships which arrived at New York harbor and it was found that the captain and all the crew had been saved between Glasgow and New York or between San Francisco and the Narrows. The day will come when those scenes will be multiplied until every forecastle will hear the voice of prayer and the New Testament given by mothers to their adventurous sons shall be wept over in every seaport of the round world. The Bible says that "the ships of Tarshish will yet sail into the kingdom." What does that mean but the salvation of all sailorhood? Get the sailors right and soon all the world will be right. When a sailor is converted he is converted all over, from the parting of the hair on the crown of his head to the tip end of his long toe. He does not sing the old hymn:

'Tis a point I long to know,
Oft it causes anxious thought,
Do I love the Lord or no?
Am I his or am I not?

The sailor knows it. He knows it in every nerve of his body and every faculty of his mind and every energy of his soul. He is the best stuff in all the world to make a missionary out of. We went ashore at Smyrna, Asia Minor, and that night in the sailors' bethel heard converted men of the sea give testimony as to the power of the Gospel on shipboard, whether in the Mediterranean or Adriatic or Atlantic or Pacific seas. May the blessing of God come down upon these men so potent for good or evil. America owes them a debt she has never paid. They bring to us the luxuries of all the earth. Not a bountiful table in all the land but is advantaged by their wrestle with the midnight tempest. To their care we entrust the precious lives of our people. Again and again they have saved the nation. You hear chiefly of what the armies did on the land but have not sufficiently appreciated what the navy did on lake and river and land and sea. Where would American independence have been and where our nation in later exigencies had it not been for Commodore Decatur on the flagship "Delaware," and Commodore Hull on the "Constitution," and Admiral Dupont on the "Wabash," and Admiral Glassborough on the "Minnesota," and

Admiral Dahlgren on the "Philadelphia," and Admiral Bailey on the "San Jacinto," and Admiral Porter on the "Black Hawk," and Admiral Foote on the "Boston," and Admiral Farragut on the "Hartford," and Admiral Walker on the gun-boat "Lafayette," whether he stood on deck in the thunder of battle or led in prayer and gave out the Christian hymns in worship. Ask the intelligent soldiers on the land how much they were helped by the sailors at Belmont, at Fort Donelson, at Island No. 10, at Vicksburg, at Mobile. Yet when on the solemn and imposing memorial day, when by long procession and mountains of flowers, we appropriately honor the soldiers of America, how little, if anything, is said of those who, with the uncertainties of the deep beneath them, had all the tempests of battle above and around them. I wish you could have seen General Sherman's intensity and enthusiasm when in his home at St. Louis he showed me the capture of Vicksburg, and then told of the endurance of the men on the gunboats. As he walked up and down the floor he showed me how it was, in a very tragedy of utterance. He said: "Do you see those three men in that boat? One of them is myself. You see that I not only had opportunity of knowing what was done on the land, but what was done by the brave men on the water. Oh, the scene was awful. It was a perfect hell." Men and women of America, let us pay back the debt we owe the sailors, whether for that which they did in war, or are doing in time of peace. May the Christian influence put forth for their temporal comfort and everlasting salvation be multiplied a thousand fold, and the time be hastened when "the fullness of the sea" shall be given to God, and may it be said of those who are imperilled on the waters in the autumnal gales as it was said in Paul's time of the rescued 276 voyagers on the corn ship, "It came to pass that they all escaped safe to land."

CHEERFUL CHRISTIANS.

WOULD God that a revival of charity might come to the hearts of all men of large means, and that some of the millions they are piling up to spoil their children with might be given to the cause of God and suffering humanity, and that these men, instead of priding themselves on the amount laid up in bonds and stocks and real estate, might gratefully tell how much God had permitted them to give for the relief of the world's suffering and ignorance. But whether we have faculty to work on a large scale, or are limited in resources, let us all do what we can, remembering that our time for work is being abbreviated, and that even a cup of cold water given in the name of a disciple shall come to divine and heavenly celebration. And let us all work in good cheer. Instead of listening for the nighthawk and the whippoorwill on the edge of the darkening woods, let us watch for the rising of the morning lark.

Much of the Christian work is done amid gloomy forebodings. Temperance men overwhelmed with statistics of drunkenness. Advocates of political integrity disheartened with the story of official corruption. Ministers of the Gospel stunned and crippled with the world's impenitency. Mohammedanism with its host of 340,000,000, Brahminism with its army of 175,000,000, Buddhism with its army of 340,000,000, sometimes make the Christian man disposed to give up the contest and say, "there is no use." Indeed, throw out of the calculation our superhuman allies, and all reformatory and missionary and ecclesiastical attempts would be a long continued absurdity, but the reserve corps has not yet come up. We are only planting the batteries, and when the Lord once opens fire all along the line, you will see such a complete rout as the Midianites experienced when they mistook the crash of Gideon's pitcher for the smashup of everything. Wait until God buckles on his sword. Wait until God takes his hand from his bosom. Wait until the white horses are harnessed to the king's chariot. Joshua's troops retreated just before they triumphantly took the City of Ai. Let the enemy of righteousness beware when the army of God falls back. It is preparing for universal rally. Those who do not believe this had better quit Christian work and go home. We have had enough lugubrious Christians. They load once, shoot, fling away their rifle and run. It is the cheerful workers who keep on. If you have any doubt about the complete victory of our side you are a nuisance and had better go away and hide. But come on, all ye who believe in the utter rout of sin and the universal dominion of Jesus. Not only bring along with you enough ammunition with which to fight, but enough trumpets and drums and rockets to celebrate the victory. Stand out of our way with your sporificals and give us a few drops of double distilled exhilaration. We pitch our tent toward the sun-rising. We may fail, but God never fails. Onward and upward. All bondage to be broken. All ignorance to be illumined. All the fortresses of sin to be captured.

His kingdoms stretch from shore to shore,
Till moons shall wax and wane no more.

The twenty-five names need not necessarily be members of one church, or of any one denomination. They should, however, be members of Protestant churches. To all readers who forward twenty-five such names, a slab of genuine olive wood will be sent, postpaid.

J. D. Pierce, Hot Springs, Ark. Did Samuel's warning to Saul that he and his sons would be with him on the morrow, 1 Sam. 28: 19, imply that good and bad men, when they die, go to the same place?

No; simply that they would be dead as Samuel was. The whole story is full of difficulty. Many expositors believe that the woman was practising a trick and others think that some evil spirit personated Samuel. The narrative shows that Saul did not see Samuel but identified him by the woman's description. She would, however, have been little likely to invent the conversation which took place.

J. S. Montalvo, Cal. What is to be understood by the reference in Revelation 18 to Babylon, seeing that the city of that name is now only a heap of ruins?

Rev. George Pember believes that when the ten kingdoms of the ancient Roman Empire became confederated in the last years of this dispensation, a federal city will be needed, and then Babylon will be rebuilt and will be destroyed as described in the chapter you refer to. Other expositors, however, identify Babylon with papal Rome. The Romish ritual contains many striking resemblances to the heathen rites of ancient Babylon, which is a fact cited in confirmation of the theory. Similar denunciations to those in Rev. 18, will be found in Isa. 13, 21, 34 and other places, where they apply to the literal Babylon of the Captivity.

Subscriber, Shelburne, Minn. Is it true that if a person is born of God he need not take further care, as he can never be lost?

A person who has been born of God needs to be very careful and vigilant lest he fall into sin. The epistles abound with exhortations to watchfulness. You may be sure that if the child of God can never be lost, he will have to go through a process of reclamation if he backslides, which will be very painful. Peter is a case in point. The account of his restoration in the Gospel according to Mark, the composition of which Peter is supposed to have supervised, contains a pathetic remark not contained in the other Gospels. It is that "when he thought thereon he wept," showing how much and how long he mourned.

H. F. B. Martin. I am told that conversion and regeneration are not the same: what is the difference?

Conversion, when the term is used theologically, is the turning away from sin to God. It is the reversal of a man's course of life. After his conversion his desires and aims and principles of life cease to be toward enjoyment or self-gratification or worldly ambition and tend toward God and holiness. Regeneration is the new birth wrought by the Spirit of God upon the man. Thus conversion supposes some activity on the man's part while in regeneration he is passive. As the Spirit operates on the spirit of man "making it willing in the day of his power," the difference between the two terms is not of moment.

Student, North Clarendon, Vt. 1. Are the fundamental principles of evolution opposed to a true interpretation of the Bible? 2. Do Huxley and other evolutionists believe in God as the Creator? 3. Is there any Scriptural ground for belief in the existence of Pre-Adamites?

1. They are opposed to the commonly received interpretation. There are, however, many Christians of high character, some of them very useful ministers who have accepted the evolutionary doctrine, but they generally regard the narrative of the Garden of Eden as a poem or parable which is not to be understood literally. 2. Huxley calls himself an agnostic that is one who does not know whether there is a God or not. He and his school believe that there was some power at the back of all development and that the universe is in self-existent. But they do not define the power and some of them aver that it is unknowable. 3. The only passage that occurs to us being in any way capable of being used as basis for a belief in the existence of Pre-Adamites is Gen. 6: 2, and that may be understood in a different way.

Joe J. Edes, Mill's Springs, N. C. Kindly advise what are the best books, of a humorous and entertaining character, that can be selected by one who needs to be cheered and amused? I have been suffering from prostration of nerves a mind and need something that will afford pleasure and wholesome entertainment.

There are many books that might be enjoyably read by one in our correspondent's condition. Dickens' Works and Burton's American Wit and Humor, will afford no little entertainment. So will R. J. Burdette and "M. Twain." Spurgeon's "John Ploughman Talk," which mingles genuine wit with spiritual truths, might be found more to J. J.'s liking. Any of the books we have named will drive off a fit of the blues.

S. J. L., New York. Is it possible, and if possible, is it the duty of a Christian to forget and forgive a grievous wrong that has been done him? The Scriptures tell us if we forgive men their trespasses neither will our heavenly Father forgive us; and again that God forgives our sins and remembers them no more against us forever.

To forgive is a Christian duty; to forget may be something quite beyond the power of the individual, since it involves the effacement from the memory of some particular incident. We may strive to forget, and even we cannot succeed in obliterating the recollection, the fact that we have already forgiven will tinge that recollection with sadness, rather than with anger. This is remembering offence no more against the offender, but rather as a plea for his fuller forgiveness by himself.

B. T. P., Brooklyn, N. Y. What is the meaning of John 7: 39, which states that the Holy Spirit not then given? In several other passages are, as in Luke 4: 1, intimations of the Spirit's work.

There is no doubt of the Holy Spirit having been in the world operating in various ways prior to that time. In the Old Testament a nation is made of him. (See Num. 11: 25, 26; 34: 16; 48: 16, etc.) John's remark is explanatory of that which Christ made but which has been misunderstood. He was speaking of the Pentecostal descent of the Spirit, (Acts 2: 1-4) which gave special miraculous powers for work that lay before the Apostles. Also, probably, of that indwelling of the Spirit which had been occasional, but was now to be the privilege of every believer who sought the way prescribed.

Subscriber, Fisherville, Va. Is it possible to live a perfect life as Adam did before he fell?

We know so little about Adam's life that it is difficult to answer the question categorically. The circumstances of our lives are so different from those described as existing in the Garden of Eden, that they do not admit of comparison. Our inherited proclivities make it more difficult for us than for Adam to live a perfect life. Theoretically it is, of course, possible to live without sinning, but a matter of experience we know that no man attains that ideal. Some come nearer than others, being of a more spiritual nature or by being kept more rigidly from temptation in having the help of the Holy Spirit in a larger degree than others. Absolute sinlessness is the Bible ideal to which we are repeatedly exhorted to aim.

Friend, Newark, O. Some time ago, I read in Ohio paper a statement, made under the name of Karl Melite, that Eugene Pauset, a Catholic official of the Church of Notre Dame, Paris, in his charge the Crown of Christ and a piece of the Cross. Are these claims reliable?

No; they are on a par with many other equally sacrilegious claims put forth by Catholics at different times and which the Church of Rome has allowed to pass uncontradicted, thereby lending its sanction. The special mention you make is an unqualified imposition of the fact that "Karl Melite" whom you name as the writer of the letter is suspicious. "Carmelite" adds strength to this conviction. It has been estimated that there are at least alleged fragments of the Cross in existence in various Catholic churches to make a score more crosses if all were put together. All claims, wherever made, should be stamped once as spurious.

THE CHINESE DISASTERS.

JAPAN'S military and naval superiority to China in every respect except in numbers, has been proved by the events of the past few weeks in Corea. Her troops are better drilled and equipped, her artillery is heavier and better handled and, what is of greater moment than all, her generals and admirals are better strategists. On land and on sea Japan has won all the laurels of the campaign so far, and China has suffered heavy losses in ships and men. The battle of September 16th at Ping Yan, which is in the north of Corea, not far from the Chinese frontier, was very much like the battle of Sedan, which was the decisive struggle of the Franco-German war. The Japanese attacked the Chinese in front, on both flanks, and in the rear, and having routed them, took possession of the only passes by which the fugitives could escape, and compelled over twenty thousand to surrender themselves prisoners. The naval victory was apparently almost as decisive, although in that case the Japanese reports are disputed. It was fought on September 17th at the mouth of the Yalu River, between eleven Japanese and fourteen Chinese ships, besides torpedo and gunboats. Three of the finest ships in the Chinese navy were sunk, and three others were burned, and five of those which made their escape were severely injured. The Emperor of China has given vent to his indignation over the disasters by degrading Li Hung, Chang the ablest statesman he has, whose plans for the reorganization of the Chinese army would, had they not been thwarted by the Emperor's connivance, have prevented the collapse which has occurred. The Emperor appears now to fear that the Japanese will invade China, and has given orders to strengthen the defenses on the way to Pekin. On this page is a picture of Tientsin, the chief port of the capital, which would be the probable approach. It is a large trading city, and since 1860, when it was seized by the French on their way to Pekin, has been an open port for foreign ships. We also give a picture of the Chinese "God of War," whom the priests are now endeavoring to propitiate. That at this late day this enormous nation is worshipping such a frightful image is an evidence of spiritual darkness of an appalling character. Serious as are the disasters they have suffered, the Chinese would have reason to regard them as blessings if by them they were led to abjure such idols and worship him whose name is the Prince of Peace. (Isa. 9: 6.)

A Chameleon Spider.

Among the treasures an American entomologist has brought home from Africa is a specimen of the chameleon spider, which he exhibits with a great deal of pride. In describing his capture of it, he said that he mistook it for a rare flower of which he was in search. He was walking along a road that skirted a forest in Western Africa when his attention was caught by what appeared to be an exceedingly delicate white flower with a blue centre. "Stopping to examine," he says, "I found to my astonishment that it was not a flower at all, but a spider's web, and that the supposed light blue heart of the flower was the spider itself, lying in wait for its prey. The mottled brown legs of the spider were extended in such a way as to resemble the divisions between the petals of a flower. The web itself, very delicately woven into a rosette pattern, was white, and the threads that suspended it from the bushes were so fine as to be almost invisible. The whole thing had the appearance of being suspended in the air upon a stem concealed beneath. Upon knocking the spider from his perch into the white gauze net which I carried, my surprise was greatly increased upon seeing my captive instantly turn in color from blue to white." It changed color several times afterwards having apparently the power of assuming any of the colors of the rainbow. Its many changes of color and its flower-like web doubtless put the insects it preyed upon off their guard and lured them to their death. It is so that the enemy of souls secures victims. They are attracted into his snares by the prospect of profit, or pleasure, or the gratification of the senses. (Prov. 1:17.)

A Secret Blacklist.

One of the railroad employees discharged for activity in the recent strike contends that he has discovered evidence of a secret method of communicating information from one manager to another. When he was discharged he applied to the manager been given to a man who had been active in the strike and the man believes that the highest praise that could be written on such paper would not avail him with a railroad manager; while an ordinary certificate written on paper, which had the whole crane in its water-mark, will secure for the bearer favorable consideration. If this theory is true, the managers judge of an applicant's character by the texture of the paper he presents rather than by what is written on it. We are warned that it will be so in the day of final account. A man's eternal state will be decided not by his baptism, by priestly absolution or church membership but by his nature. Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision but a new creature (Galatians 6:15.)

A Mourner Becomes a Bride.

A singular episode occurred at Sharon, Pa., on Sept. 13. There was a funeral there on that day which was followed by the marriage of two of the mourners. It appears that a lady who went from Buffalo to attend the funeral of her friend was surprised on entering the carriage which was to convey her to the cemetery to see in it a young man to whom she had formerly been engaged, but whom she had not met in three years. During their ride to the cemetery they talked over the trouble that had led to the rupture of their engagement, and both came to regard it as a matter too trivial to have had such a result. On their way back after the ceremony they had as their companion the clergyman who had been officiating at the funeral. He was made acquainted with the situation and consented to marry them at once. The clergyman then conducted the marriage ceremony in the carriage, and the two mourners returned from the funeral a bride and bridegroom. Joy and sorrow often come near together in our lives, but it is seldom that they come into so close and an-face bore marks of mental anguish. At his request two physicians examined him and they confirmed the opinion the man had formed of his own case. He soon became violent and, before reaching the Asylum, he was a raving maniac. It is strange that a man so near madness as he was should yet have had the sense and self-control to act so wisely. He showed more discretion than some do who are in no danger of insanity. Many confess with sorrow, as Paul did, "The evil that I would not, that I do," who never go for restraint to him who is able to keep them from the evil. (Rom. 7: 25.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mrs. Bishop, the Great Traveller and Wrier, has accomplished the first part of her Corean journey without illness or disaster. When last heard of, she was purposing to go to Moulken, the Manchurian capital, to wait the development of events in Corea. The land, she finds, is most fertile.

Miss Annie Taylor has not yet obtained permission to enter Tibet. She has settled at Darjeeling pending the further consideration of her appeal. Two Swiss ladies are also on the Tibetan border doing medical missionary work among Tibetans, who cross the frontier to be treated.

Revs. Connolly and Struble, the Pacific Coast evangelists commenced a series of meetings at Owosso, Mich., on Sept. 20. They expect to labor during the winter in several cities of the Middle Western States and possibly the way may be opened for them to come to New York and the New England States, if union or denominational work is arranged.

The Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church reports receipts from April 1st to August 31st of $242,150, against $159,998 for the corresponding period of last year. The gain is divided as follows: Women's Executive $22,259, legacies $59,996, miscellaneous, $4,173. In the church collections there has been a loss of $4,276, leaving a net gain of $82,152.

Rev. C. H. Yatman Commenced on Oct. 2, a series of Revival Services in Brooklyn which promise large results. They are held every afternoon and evening in the Central Presbyterian Church on the corner of Tompkins and Willoughby Avenues.

A Suggestion to Pastors is Made by the Open-air Workers' Association. It is to hold a short praise service on the steps of the church a short time before the Sunday evening service. Wherever it has been tried a crowd has collected to hear the singers, many of whom have accepted an invitation to attend the service in the church.

The Baptist Union of South Africa will shortly enter on possession of three farms of three thousand acres in Mashonaland and Matabeleland to be worked for missionary purposes. A church and mission house is to be built on each farm. The concession of land has been made by the Hon. Cecil Rhodes, Premier of Cape Colony.

A Difference of Attitude Between the Supreme Court and the Municipal authority is imminent in Brooklyn, N. Y. The Mayor recently refused to issue a permit for a Sun day parade of German Societies. An appeal is now to be presented to him to prohibit, on the same ground, base ball games within the city limits on Sunday. Judge Gaynor of the Supreme Court recently upheld the legality of the Sunday base ball games.

of the road on which he had worked for several years, for "a clearance paper" which he knew he would have to show to the manager of any road before an application for employment would be entertained. He expected a meagre statement of satisfactory service and was surprised when he read on the form the managers use for the purpose a complimentary notice of his character and work. But he could not obtain a position and the clearance wherever it was shown appeared, in spite of the praise it contained, to operate against him. Several other men had a similar experience, while others succeeded in getting work although their papers were no more favorable. He became suspicious and examined his own and other clearance papers more closely. He found that all the papers had a water mark which was visible only when held up to the light. The chief figure in the water mark was a crane. In some instances the crane was complete but in others the cutting of the paper had beheaded the crane. In all the cases in which the crane was without its head the paper had omalous association as is implied by a wedding in a funeral coach. It has, however, often happened that the infinitely greater joy of union with Christ has been begun in a time of bereavement. (John 11: 45.)

In Fear of Insanity.

An extraordinary application was made a few days ago to the Overseers of Albany, N. Y. A prosperous business man, in the prime of life, went to them and asked to be committed to the asylum for lunatics. He said that he was in his right mind then but was convinced that he was on the verge of becoming insane and was desirous of being put under restraint. He described his symptoms intelligently and explained why he was apprehensive. Strange voices, he said, called to him and he was tempted to kill his wife and children and commit suicide. He feared that he would not be able to resist the impulse and he wanted to be put out of the way of doing harm to those he loved. The Overseers looked at the man in amazement. He was tall and vigorous and apparently in good health, but his

"Thine Ancient People the Jews."

Our Traveler visits the Chief Rabbi of Jerusalem and converses on the Lord's coming and the hope of Israel's return to Palestine.

UNDER this name I heard them prayed for every day throughout my infancy and girlhood. The phraseology in which the patriarch of the household remembered them at the family altar varied little in all those years:—

"We pray thee to have mercy upon thine ancient people the Jews and bring them into thine everlasting Kingdom, together with the fullness of the Gentiles. May they look upon him whom they have pierced and acknowledge him as King of kings and Lord of lords."

I am saying it over to myself on this murky afternoon, as, despite the corrugated soles of my overshoes, I slip and slide upon the greasy mud of the Jewish quarter of the City of David. The smells are of the foulest I have encountered, and we stir them into aggressiveness in our passage through the damp, breezeless air. It is Friday, and marketing is lively, in preparation for the national Sabbath. Every huckster has put forward his choicest wares; women, conspicuous by their uncovered faces, have baskets on their arms and haggle shrewdly over "green stuff," groceries and meat. Once we are shoved against a wall by a crowd of both sexes gathered about an auctioneer who is selling tainted fish at a plastre (four cents) a pound. The ground is wet and steep; the stones are treacherous, the throng motley and unsavory, with an indescribable air of sordidness evident through the squalor of the region.

My companion is Rev. Joseph Jamal, a cousin of our educated dragoman, and assistant-rector of the English Church in Jerusalem. Under his guidance I have seen the various benevolent institutions established in Jerusalem by the Church Missionary Society, which is an honor to English Christians and philanthropists. The Ophthalmic Infirmary, where tens of thousands of sufferers from the fearfully prevalent diseases of the eye are treated annually; the Dispensary, well stocked and admirably managed, the Industrial School, where carpentry, printing, book-binding, etc., are taught; the Hospital, fifty-five years old, which will be, ere long, transferred to the fine new building, now in construction outside of the walls—one and all are fraught with deep interest to her who has seen enough of the Jewish population of Palestine to appreciate the needs and the discouragements of the work undertaken by the splendid organization named above. Mr. Jamal's twenty years of service in the Church Missionary Society have fully qualified him as an intelligent and trustworthy authority upon the subject which, during the past few days, has especially engrossed my time and thoughts.

Threading the maze of filthy streets, we arrive presently at an archway so low that my tall guide stoops low, and I have to bow my head in passing it and entering a sort of tunnel, wetter and fouler than the open street we have left, and sloping downward. Another turn and a plunge of several steps, and Mr. Jamal knocks at a low, dingy door in the blank wall. It is opened by means of a cord running along the dark passage, and we see nobly until we are met at the head of a flight of unclean stone steps by a "kervasse" in dirty uniform, with a red fez upon his head. He takes us into an apartment of fair size, the upper half raised by two steps, above the lower, and lined on three sides by a cushioned divan, on which we are seated. This is the drawing-room of the Chief Rabbi of Jerusalem. The floor is covered with matting; a few rugs are scattered here and there, and two small stands are set back against the wall. Besides these there is no furniture. The "kervasse," having taken our cards to his master, returns in four or five minutes, ushering in two old men. One, tall, and with traces of former dignity and comeliness, walks in advance of his companion, who is his inferior in appearance and in office. Both wear dark blue cloth gowns, lined and edged with coarse fur, and bands of like material trim the caps, which are round and flat on top. A moment later, a third man, similarly attired, enters, unannounced, and sits down upon the divan with the others, we facing them from the other side of the room.

After a few and ceremonious preliminary remarks, we come to the chief object of my call. I ask the master of the house through my interpreter if he attaches any significance to the influx, in late years, of the Jews from other lands into Palestine. Also, if he can give me an approximate idea of the number who have thus immigrated within ten years.

"If you would know how many have come in the past sixty years, I would answer that there were but one thousand Jews in Jerusalem and the vicinity in 1833. There are thirty thousand now."

"How do you account for the steady increase of immigration? Are all drawn by the same motive?"

"The Jews come to Palestine because they love it as the land of their fathers and their own country. Some have come expecting the Messiah. They are foolish. When he comes, he will rule the whole earth, not merely this little corner of the globe."

"You expect, then, his personal advent. What will preface it?"

"The Great Fight of Armageddon must come first. Gog and Magog will appear and be overthrown. There will be a terribly bloody conflict of all nations in the Valley of Decision."

"Where there is not room to deploy four regiments!" I heard Dr. Merrill say indignantly, last night, but I forbear to quote the sensible objection to the chosen battlefield. "Where is the promise of his coming? Do you see signs of the approaching gathering of nations?" I ask instead.

"Who can say? The political horizon is dark and may mean much. Since the prophets passed away there is no man who can read the signs of the times."

"Where will the Messiah first appear?"

"He will descend from heaven upon Mt. Safed, the highest point of Galilee. So say the holy writings."

(I recall that Safed is pointed out as the "city set upon a hill" to which our Lord, ever ready to illustrate his teachings by natural and present objects, may have referred in the Sermon on the Mount.)

"But," I say aloud, "We are told by Zechariah that when 'the Lord shall go forth and fight against those nations as when he fought in the day of battle, his feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the east.'"

"True. The Messiah will proceed from Safed to Olivet."

"I read further that the Mount of Olives shall 'cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley, and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south.' Will this prophecy, in your opinion, and in the opinion of other learned men, be literally fulfilled?"

My host inclines his head in grave assent. The colleague who sits next to him says, decidedly,—

"Certainly! no one ever questioned it."

A JEWISH RABBI OF JERUSALEM.

From a Photograph secured specially for "The Christian Herald."

"Where—may I ask—do you read the prophecy concerning Safed?"

"In the Talmud," with the air of a disputant ending a controversy.

But I am intensely interested, and my interpreter being altogether in touch with my mood and desire, conveys my meaning so faithfully that I cannot refrain from further researches.

"Tell him," I say to Mr. Jamal, "that some of the most learned Rabbis in America no longer expect a personal Messiah. They believe that the prophecies relative to his coming point to the perfectibility of human nature: to an advanced state of morality, and subjugation of whatever is base and vicious in man's nature and conduct; to the cessation of war and crime, the elimination from body and mind of all that engenders sorrow, pain, and death itself."

For the first time the old man gives signs of excitement as this speech is translated to him. He crosses one leg over the other nervously; his black eyes gleam under the white brows; his raised hand and voice shake with agitation.

"No devout Jew believes such a monstrous thing. The men who assert it are infidels—materialists. The Messiah will be a real person—great, holy, powerful, perfect, and he shall reign in the Mount Zion forever and ever."

"I return to the former question:—

"When will he come? Are there indications that the time may be near?"

My venerable interlocutor retires unequivocally into his shell of dignified and official reserve.

"Who can say? That is in God's hands—not in mine."

It is obvious that further catechizing would be unwelcome, and having partaken of the usual refectory of sweetmeats and coffee, we exchange conventional compliments and part amicably.

Our next visit is to a poorer Rabbi, living in a more lowly abode, but as genial as the former was politely frosty. He belongs to a sect whose business is the study of the law, and the shabby room is surrounded with book-shelves. So far from eluding such queries as I have put to his superior in office and worldly gear, he talks enthusiastically of his belief that the Kingdom of the Messiah is near at hand. He holds the same views with the Chief Rabbi as to the great Battle of Armageddon.

"Gog and Magog are, I am inclined to think, Russia. All nations will be engaged in the Valley of Jehoshaphat. The right will conquer, the God of Israel fighting for it. A Congress of nations will be held and decide to restore Palestine to the Jews, who will thenceforward possess it and cause the waste places to break forth into singing, the desert to blossom as the rose."

"But there is not room in Palestine—or in all Syria, for that matter, for one-half of the Jews now alive upon the earth."

He smiles benignantly, and with the calmness of his convictions:—

"You forget that they have never yet had all the Promised Land—from the river of Egypt—the Nile—unto the great river, the river Euphrates." The promise is "ordered in all things and sure." The whole world will then be at peace; nations shall learn war no more. All will worship one only and true God, the God of Israel."

I put out my hand impulsively, and we shake hands cordially upon this.

"You are a Protestant!" I declare.

"We serve the same Lord!" he answers.

After more sweets and more coffee, served by the Rabbi's wife—a motherly body—we are conducted by him into an amazingly small synagogue, one thousand years old, entirely underground, having been built when Jews were forced to worship in secret.

It is lighted from above by means of two grated windows, like "man-holes" let into the pavement. There is light enough to enable us to examine a curious old manuscript copy of the law, over six hundred years old, brought from Bagdad, and, at my request, the Rabbi reads the lesson of the day from it, in a quavering intone, such as we have heard at the Wailing-Place.

"It is a poor place," he says, running his eye around the dank den, "and must always have been very dark."

"Daniel prayed in a darker," I remind him.

"His eyes twinkle, good-humoredly: 'And Jonah in still less desirable quarters!' is the unexpected rejoinder."

MARION HARLAND.

A MISSIONARY SHIP LOST.

News has been received of the loss of the "Robert W. Logan," the missionary ship of the American Board, among the Pacific islands, nothing having been heard of her since August of last year. The Japanese government has instructed the commanders of Japanese vessels to search for the missing ship while on their voyages. The "Logan" is the fifth of the vessels built by the children of the United States for the use of the missionaries in the Micronesian Islands, the successor of the four famous ships called the "Morning Star," one of which is still afloat.

The "Logan" was built in San Francisco in 1890, and is a schooner of about fifty tons burden. Her headquarters were at Ruk, in the Caroline group, and her special mission was to ply between those islands and the Mortlocks, bearing missionaries and supplies. She was named after Rev. Robert W. Logan, a faithful missionary who lived for years in the Micronesian Islands and laboriously translated the Bible into the Ruk language.

Dr. Talmage in Australia.

The Lovely Lakes and Rich Botany of the Southern Continent—Idle Acreage—Lesson of the Post Office Bells.

IN a letter from Sydney, Australia, dated August 7, 1894, Rev. Dr. Talmage gives this eloquent description of the natural beauties and attractions of the great Southern Continent:

Have you ever realized that there is only one Being in the universe who can scoop out and mould and buttress and build a harbor? At Napier, New Zealand, where we sailed in and staved only long enough for an hour and a half's address, hundreds of thousands of dollars were expended in building a breakwater and so at Gisborne, and at different points on the Australian coast, harbors have been constructed by human hands, but the storms looked at these defiant ramparts and in a night tumbled the costly works into the Pacific. Harbor building is the reserved right of the heavens. Gates of palaces and gates of fortresses may be turned out from earthly foundries, or pounded together by hammers of human mechanism, but an ocean gate like that near which I am now seated needs omnipotence and omniscience and infinity to plan and construct it. No one but the Eternal knows where such a gate is needed. He sees the history of a continent before it is populated and he only can decide where its front door ought to be poised and swung. Beside that the gate must correspond with the size and greatness of the main building. The door of the Madeline Church would be absurd at the front of a Quaker Meeting House. Bronze and gold would make an inappropriate entrance to a rookery. Such an entrance to Australia as Sydney harbor would be something for all time and eternity to jeer at, if the country thus entered were not something immeasurable for wealth, resource, and grand opportunity. Had I known nothing of the history of Australia what I saw between the door-posts of this harbor and the wharf of our disembarkation would have convinced me of the present and coming pre-eminence of this fifth continent of the world. With such an ocean gate, I am not surprised that Australia is fourteen times as large as France and thirty-three times as large as England, Scotland and Wales. It has been estimated as capable of supporting one hundred millions of people. All wealth of mining and agriculture and commerce and art and scenery are here. Caves larger than the mammoth cave of Kentucky, Lakes like Como, Lucerne, and Geneva. A botany so rich in flowers that Captain Cook called one of the entrances "Botany Bay." Whole Pennsylvanias of coal mines, discovered by a shipwrecked sailor in 1797, but now defying the crowbars of the earth to take one half of their treasures, and having enough material to warm a continent and keep aglow the steamship furnaces of an ocean. Enough deep pasture in the vales and on the hills to clothe with their wool whole nations. So much of these Colonies is in the tropics that they will have a capacity, when fully developed, to yield enough sugar to sweeten the beverages of the earth, and use enough tea to soothe the nerves and emulate the conversation of the social couples of all zones, and produce enough cotton to clothe the hemispheres. Enough iron to be brought up from the cellar of these colonies to rail-track the planet. Copper and silver and gold, waiting for resurrection. Sapphires and rubies, topaz and chrysoberyls ready to flash and burn on the som of the world's beauty. Cope's Creek yielded in one year 25,000 diamonds.

Do you say that vast regions are not arid but a desert? Yes, but boring underneath the sand and rock discovered water which is only waiting to be called up to irrigate the surface. What irrigation has been done for Egypt and China, and is doing for the American desert, will be done for the idle acreage of Australia.

While dictating this letter to a stenographer in Sydney, and looking off upon its harbor, I hear the chimes of the bells from the tower of the Post Office. It is the only Post Office that I have ever known to be faced by such a charm of harmonies. How appropriate! for the Post Office of every city rings out more music or tolls more sadness than any other building. There are the piles of letters with joyful tidings and hilarious surprises and marriage announcements; and every Post Office ought to have a chime of Wedding Bells. But every Post Office has piles of letters with stories of sadness and bereavement and loss and death and burial, and therefore such a building ought to have bells to sound the knell and bells to toll the grief. Ring on ye bells of Sydney Post Office and sound over yonder harbor your merriment or sadness. Four times every hour that tower showers its chimes; at each quarter hour the air is stirred with its melodies, but at the close of each full hour the effect is very peculiar. Tinkle and clash, and jingle and roll go as much as to say "Be cheery while the moments go by. Move as briskly as you can and let the passing moments keep step with the sounding joy!" But while you are listening suddenly there comes in the mighty stroke of the Post Office clock in deepest and most reverberating tone, letting you know that one more hour of time is forever past, and it sounds solemn and tremendous as though at every stroke it said of the hour just departed "Gone! Gone! Gone!" The deep bass of that last sound overpowering the merry sopranos that preceded it. So the gladnesses and solemnities commingle. But, perhaps, I may have misinterpreted the utterances of that heavy and mighty clock in the Post Office Tower.

It seemed like the death knell of the hour and seemed to say, "Gone! Gone!" but now that I think it over, that bell might have been in a different mood from what I thought, for bells have moods, and they weep and they laugh and they dance and they groan. It may be that the resounding and overpowering stroke in that tower might have been one of invitation, and that because this harbor is the ocean gate of an almost infinitude of opportunity, and the mines are waiting for more crow-bars, and the pasturage is waiting for more flocks, and the hillsides are waiting for more cities, and the picturesque is waiting for more artists, and the fields are waiting for more ploughs, and the printing-presses are waiting for more authors, and the flora is waiting for more botanists, and the skies are waiting for more astronomers, and the churches are waiting for more worshippers, and these lands are waiting for more occupants, and this harbor is waiting for more merchantmen, that the bell of the Post Office Tower is really sending forth a welcoming word to the people of all lands and the voyagers of all seas, saying, "Come! Come! Come!"

ISRAEL AND THE NATIONS.

The Oppressed People to become a Blessing to the Whole World.

BY REV. H. M. PARSONS, D.D.*

THE general thought of the Christian church is, that Israel as a nation has been cast off forever. The many promises annexed to the denunciations of doom for disobedience, have either been spiritualized and applied to the church, or fitted to the resurrected individuals of the Jewish race. With many this question is valued but little, because of more important and pressing themes, which solicit immediate attention. The burdens of oppression which rest upon the whole race, are engrossing the thought and action of benevolent minds, and of the church of God, in the desire to adopt measures, and invent methods of relief, which shall remedy if not dispel the curse of sin.

With others, the preaching of salvation to the lost is regarded as the only way in which mankind can be delivered, and therefore they look for the conversion of the world under the present Gospel method. As against these interpretations of Scripture we turn first to see what God has said of this nation. The Old Testament is taken up with the relation of Israel to the earth. "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel," Deut. 32:8; and in the covenants of God with the patriarchs, the land, the portions of the earth they were to have and possess forever, is distinctly marked off by definite boundaries. This was without conditions.

Jehovah made another covenant with Israel, conditioned on obedience, relating to their position, character and office upon the earth. It is written in Ex. 19:5, "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then shall ye be a peculiar treasure unto me, above all people: for all the earth is mine."

The relation of Israel to the earth is declared in both Testaments, when we are exhorted in the Old Testament to "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem," connecting with it the promise, "They shall prosper that love thee," and in the New Testament the proclamation of the Gospel, "To the Jew first, and also to the Gentile." The continuance of the Jew upon the earth through this dispensation is thus distinctly shown in every part of the divine revelation.

And so from the position of Israel in the earth as stated in Ezekiel thirty-sixth chapter, the resurrection revealed in vision to the prophet in thirty-seventh chapter appropriately refers to the restoration of the scattered people, as one nation to their own land defined to them in the ancient and as yet unfulfilled covenant of God. The present awakening of large numbers of the Jewish nation to examine the claims of Christ and accept him as their Messiah, and the reviving spirit of persecution and ostracism of the ancient people seen in so many lands, together with the manifest increase of numbers and influence and power, under all these obstacles, are signs not to be disregarded by those who believe the words of our Lord, when he said, in the parable of the fig tree in Mark 12:28, 29, "When ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it is nigh, even at the doors."

The New Testament, while distinctly declaring the overthrow of Jerusalem, and the exile of the nation, does not affirm that this doom is perpetual. The terrific arraignment and denunciation of the leaders of the nation, with the pathetic lament over the city at our Lord's last appearance in the temple, is followed by a declaration at the close, which is certainly prophetic (Matt. 23:39): "Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye shall say blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." This Psalm here quoted refers to the future glory of Israel in the earth, and is so interpreted by our Lord in Matt. 22:42. The last words in the temple certainly imply that sometime Israel will say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," and when that time does come, they will behold their absent and rejected Lord. In the Psalm from which the text is quoted, Israel is represented as using the language of "blessing" after their rejection of the Messiah.

HELP IN DAILY TASKS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning Oct. 14.
Col. 3: 12-17.

NO greater mistake can be made as to Christianity than to regard it as a system of doctrines, or a collection of articles to be held and believed. Christianity furnishes all that, but if that were all, it would sink to mere philosophy. The essence of it is its life and that life is in Christ. The real Christian is he who has come to Christ and received life. We cannot explain the fact and all attempts at explanation fall short of the fact, but experience proves that life does come from Christ to the individual soul. Strength, energy, patience, forbearance, love, joy, peace flow from our Lord into our souls and make character. The Christian is conscious as he looks back on some ordeal through which he has passed, that he has acted unnaturally in it. He knows that left to himself, he would have behaved very differently. There was an influence, a force within him controlling him and holding him in the right direction and he knows whence he derived it. The presence of Christ with a man is no mere theory; it is an actual fact, as anyone who has felt it can testify, and that presence exercises a potent influence. We know from our ordinary relations how companionship does affect our conduct and even our thoughts. The presence of a child, or a refined woman will affect the conversation and conduct of a whole company of roystering, foul-mouthed men. In the presence of his mother, a young man, how ever depraved his talk may be with his male companions, will set a watch on his tongue. For the time it makes him decent if it does not make him purer. When love is added to such an influence there comes a joy and delight that penetrates deeper. The influence of proximity is not to be gainsaid. All have felt it and have been affected by it. Not long ago a young woman was noticed riding in a surface car in New York for several consecutive days. She always occupied the most forward seat next to the door and she went the whole trip. To a passenger who asked the conductor about her, a romantic explanation was given. He said that she was the wife of the driver. They were just married, and instead of going on a wedding tour, the wife had proposed that she should ride on the car every day. It was a curious kind of wedding tour, but both husband and wife seemed satisfied. It was sufficient for them that they were near each other. So it is that the Christian can be happy in his occupation, if he feels that his Lord is near. Christ gives life and gives it abundantly. He sympathizes, cheers, invigorates and encourages all with whom he comes in contact and so helps his people in their daily tasks.

INDIANS IN THE EPWORTH LEAGUE.

An interesting meeting was held recently at Perry, Oklahoma, to organize a district Epworth League. In the report of the proceedings furnished to the "Central Christian Advocate," this incident is mentioned: "Brave Chief, of the Pawnees, made two speeches in his own language which were interpreted by an educated young Indian woman. He said among other things: 'One reason I come here is to seek for more love and works of God. I wish to know more about the way and path heavenward, and to feel that if God should set the day of judgment I would be ready to go and be saved.' He afterwards asked for some word to take home to his people, and Mr. Delaplain through an interpreter made a short and appropriate speech which seemed to please the red man. Carrion, the Indian preacher among the Pawnees, also spoke, and gave a touching account of his work and religious experience."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR IN CHINA.

The first National Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies of China was held recently at Shanghai, and proved a very earnest and enthusiastic assembly. The Convention was somewhat in the nature of an experiment was the pledge. Many delegates were desirous of including in it pledges against opium, wine and foot-binding, but the decision of the convention was against making the pledge a matter of specific detail. The broad principles laid down would, it was felt, apply to those momentous subjects without explicitly specifying them. Another decision which shows incidentally the difficulties attending Christian Endeavor work in China was that there should be no badge worn. The Chinese officials and the people generally are so suspicious of the secret societies and so apprehensive of rebellion, that the badge might be misconstrued and might evoke prejudice against the Society. The Convention will probably be a triennial gathering in future as, wherever the place of gathering might be, the expense of attending it would be a severe obstacle to the native Christians, many of whom are very poor. There will be Provincial Conventions, which will not be attended by that difficulty and these will serve to keep the Christian Endeavor spirit in activity. A vice-President has been appointed for each Province and there are three corresponding Secretaries attached to the United Society who will receive their reports. The native delegates to the Convention showed remarkable intelligence and were very sagacious in their suggestions as to the best method of adapting the American idea to the peculiar conditions of Chinese society.

B. Y. P. U. SYSTEMATIC STUDY.

as the extent of the country and lack of means of transportation made it doubtful whether delegates could come. The same reasons rendered the organization of a United Society a subject of question. Dr. Clark, however, during his visit to China, described so forcibly the benefits of a national organization, that Miss Laura A. White of Chin Kiang and a few other prominent Christian Endeavorers made an effort and finally succeeded in organizing a United Society. This was about a year ago, and the National Convention just held is an outcome of the organization. On this page we give, by the courtesy of the "Golden Rule," portraits of Rev. John Stevens, the President, and Rev. W. P. Bentley, the General Secretary of the United Society and also a portrait of Mr. Ling, who is believed to be the first native to sign the Christian Endeavor pledge in China.

Mr. Ling signed the pledge at Foochow nine years ago. Since that time thirty-eight societies have been organized in various places in China, with an aggregate membership of 1060. The number seems small to an American, but it must be remembered that the native Christians in all China number less than fifty thousand. About one hundred delegates attended the Convention and all bore decided testimony to the value of the Christian Endeavor movement. Among the subjects discussed was that of a suitable Chinese equivalent for the word "Endeavor" and after mature deliberation a word was chosen and recommended to the local societies, some of which are working under other names. Another subject explanation of the system represented by the letters may satisfy the majority of inquirers, and a full detailed description may be had by any who want it from the headquarters of the Union, 122 Wabash avenue, Chicago. The Christian Culture Courses are the organizations represented by the cabalistic letters. They are three in number, each having its initial designation. The B. R. C. is the Bible Readers' Course, which proposes by the reading of one chapter a day on a classified basis to take the student through the entire Bible in four years. The C. M. C. is the Conquest Missionary Course. This also covers four years in a study of the Origin, Methods, Fields and Leaders of foreign missions. The S. L. C. is the Sacred Literature Course, which is practically a study of the History of Christianity. These three courses of study constitute the system familiarly spoken of as the C. C. C. There is no question about the advantages of such a systematic study over desultory reading, and the managers of the B. Y. P. U. are to be congratulated on the variety and interest of their arrangement of the courses.

AT THE CIRCLES MEETING.

It is not always easy to make a meeting of the King's Daughters interesting and useful. Here is a suggestion to that end, which is sent to the "Silver Cross," by Grace Duffield Goodwin: "Ask three girls each to write a ten minute paper, illustrating the work of our Order in various charitable fields. Let one take 'The King's Daughter in Hospitals.' This will include an account of the beds supported by different Circles in a number of the large hospitals, and perhaps items of interest concerning their inmates. To obtain your information, write or go personally to the hospitals for knowledge of the inmates. A second member might take the subject of 'The King's Daughter in the Day Nurseries,' and she will tell you, after some further search, all about the Silver Cross Day Nursery, in upper New York, and about the one established in Charleston, S. C., by the King's Daughters' Union. Give a third, 'The King's Daughter in the Tenements,' and let the New York Tenement House Chapter supply the material, or obtain your information from the same committee in any of our large cities where this work is being done. Sewing may go on in the Circle while the papers are being read."

AMONG THE ORDERS.

A Christian Endeavor Society in Iowa circulating among its members an anti gossip pledge.

Useful work and cheering progress in Christian Endeavor Societies are reported from Jaffna, Ceylon.

A considerable number of the Epworth Leagues are changing the time for the election of officers from January to the close of May. The reason given is that it is bad to make changes in the official staff in the middle of a season of work.

In India the constitution of the Christian Endeavor Society has been translated into six languages, and is being rendered into Canarese.

The week of universal prayer for young men will be observed by Young Men's Christian Associations throughout the world from November 11 to 18.

The work of the Bombay City Young Men's Christian Association, comprising agencies for European and native young men at some four or five centres, has so developed that the appointment of an efficient general secretary has become necessary.

An inspiring Epworth League Convention was held recently at Minneapolis, Minn. Delegates from fourteen Leagues of the S lina District were in session for three days. The proceedings terminated appropriately with a communion service followed by a Love-feast and Consecration meeting.

The Convention of the King's Daughters of the Dominion of Canada will be held at Montreal October 17-19. All particulars may be obtained by addressing Mrs. Elizabeth M. Tilley, 554 King St. London, Ont.

The Endeavorers of the Navy-yard Christian Endeavor Society of Brooklyn, N. Y. have been asked by Chaplain Boerum, the "San Francisco," now lying in the yard to assist him at the Sunday morning services on his vessel. So now this meeting as well as the one at Cob Dock, is well attended by sailors.

Mr. John Willis Baer, General Secretary of the Christian Endeavor Society reported that at the Cleveland Convention the number of Societies enrolled was 33,730, with total membership of 2,023,860. "We now have 34,691 societies in our world-wide lowship, with a membership of 2,681,460."

In working on the lines of a resolute for direct evangelistic work, the Epworth Leagues of the Olney (Ill.) District divided the field into three subdistricts, in each of which six young people, one for leader, were appointed to go among the chapters of the district whenever and wherever called working for souls.

Our Planetary Neighbors.

The Starry Heavens and How Best to View Them—Astronomy a Field with Especial Attractions for the Young.

One can study the stars in the heaven above us and remain an unbeliever," was the observation of one of the most famous astronomers of the present day. There is no field of scientific investigation in which the student is more deeply and irresistibly impressed with the splendor and magnitude of the works of the Almighty, or by the omnipresent fact that order and law, perfect beyond human comprehension, govern everything that relates to this great universe of which our own world forms a part. This conclusion the ancients reached as the result of their observations. It was doubtless one that was impressed upon the minds of the pyramid-builders, who represented all that was known of astronomy in the age in which they lived. Contemplation of the heavens and the myriads of planetary bodies that roll therein leads the mind to the Maker and Designer of the firmament. It was the distinguished Professor Agassiz who declared to his students that looking into the secrets of nature impelled him to turn to nature's God. Such, doubtless, was the spiritual fascination astronomy possessed for many of the ancient prophets and the sages, who, like Enoch, according to Arab traditions, dwelt in the highest places of earth and sought to trace the Almighty among the stars.

Astronomy and observatories existed long ages before telescopes were invented. Babylonia, Egypt, Greece, India, and China all possessed a knowledge of the heavens long before the Christian era, and they in turn are supposed to have learned the art from the Phenicians. Various passages in the Bible (notably Job 9: 9 and 38: 31, Psalm 1: 9, Amos 5: 8, Isaiah 14: 12, and Rev. 2: 28), prove that the names and positions of the leading constellations were then accurately known, and even those erratic visitors, the comets, seem to be referred to in Jude 13, as "wandering stars."
